THE CONVENTION.

REPORTED FOR THE CONVENTION

H. FOWLER, CHIEF REPORTER.

MONDAY, Oct. 7, 1850.

The Convention assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and was called to order by the Hon. CHARLES H. TEST, Secretary of State, in pursuance of an act of the last General Assembly, to provide for the call of a Convention of the People of the State of Indiana, to revise, amend, or alter, the Constitution of said State.

The names of the members of the Convention being called over by the Hon. CHARLES H. TEST, Secretary of State, by Senatorial Districts and Counties, the following gentlemen appeared, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and, to the best of their ability respectively, to perform the duties of their office as Delegates to this Convention, was administered to them by the Hon. The Delegates were all present but Messrs. JONES of Bartholomew, CONDUIT of Morgan, COLFAX of St. Joseph, RITCHEY of Johnson, TAYLOR of Laporte, HOVEY of Posey, and BLYTHE of Vanderburgh.

THE ORGANIZATION.

The SECRETARY OF STATE now announced that a quorum of the Convention was present, and ready to proceed to the business of organization, according to the pleasure of the Convention.

Mr. OWEN offered for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention now proceed to elect a President by viva voce vote.

The question having been announced by the Secretary of State—

Mr. PETTIT proposed the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Posey:

Resolved, That GEO. W. CARR, Delegate from the county of Lawrence, be chosen President of this Convention.

Mr. OWEN accepted the substitute.

Mr. BORDEN said, he saw by this proceeding that the Convention was likely to get into a difficulty at once, and inasmuch as they had adopted no rules for their government, it occurred to his mind that the only way by which the body could come to an understanding and a decision of the matter, would be to act directly upon the question of the adoption of the original resolution.

Mr. PETTIT said, he saw no difficulty in the way. The Secretary of State was authorized by law to organize the Convention, and the next step to be taken was the election of a President.

The question being upon the adoption of the substitute—

Mr. KILGORE demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. CHAPMAN suggested that there was no rule under which the yeas and nays could be taken.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he did not wish to precipitate business. He thought the original proposition offered by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) would meet the wishes of the whole Convention, unless, perhaps, some gentleman might object to the manner prescribed for the election—by a viva voce vote. If gentlemen were opposed to this manner of voting, the words might be readily stricken out.

Mr. STEVENSON said, he had no objection to Mr. CARR going into the Chair of the Convention, but he would suggest that as the usual mode of electing the officers of deliberative bodies of this State was by ballot, it might perhaps, be the better way for the gentleman to withdraw the proposition.

Mr. PETTIT said, he understood that his amendment had been accepted.

The SECRETARY OF STATE observed, that the amendment was accepted by the gentleman from Posey.

Mr. MORRISON, of Marion, said, he was very sorry that any discussion should arise upon such a question. He was in favor of the proposition as originally submitted, before the amendment was accepted, and the reason why he was in favor of the original proposition was this: if the Convention should now go into a viva voce vote, it would require but little more time than for the Secretary to take the mere passive vote proposed in the amendment.—Should the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe be adopted, Mr. CARR would be the President of the Convention—to all of which he was agreed; but if the original resolution was adopted each gentleman could vote for whom he pleased, and in this way gentlemen could give either complimentary votes or elective votes, as they should see proper.

Mr. OWEN said, that to save time he would withdraw the proposition as amended, and offer again the original resolution.

Mr. PETTIT also re-offered the substitute which he had before proposed. By the adoption of his proposition, he said, there would be but one vote and Mr. CARR would be President of the Convention—which would be the result of any vote that might be taken; but if the original resolution was adopted, the names of all the members would have to be called over to ascertain the vote.

Mr. KELSO said, he understood that the question was now upon the adoption of the amendment. He did not agree with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) that it would be better that there should be but one vote for this officer. For himself, however, he declared that he stood ready to vote for GEO. W. CARR—he intended to vote for him, but he was opposed to his appointment by resolution in this way. He was willing to vote for the first resolution, but if the amendment prevailed he should vote against it.

Mr. SPANN observed, that this was a mere matter of form; but upon examination of the law, with reference to the organization of this Convention, he found that it was expressly provided that the organization should be effected in the manner in which the General Assembly of the State was organized. He maintained that the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) was a fair proposition; it was common in the Legislature of the State and well understood by all. Whatever preference for this office gentlemen might entertain, could be as well expressed in this as in any other way.

Mr. STEELE said, if it was in order, he would move to amend the substitute by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting the proposition of the gentleman from Posey.

Mr. PETTIT said, that in order to give entire satisfaction to gentlemen on all sides, especially to those gentlemen who were desirous of recording their votes, he would withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn accordingly.

Mr. KILGORE proposed to amend the resolution by adding the words: "and that all other officers of this Convention be elected in the same manner."

Mr. PETTIT opposed the amendment. He could not think that gentlemen were seriously disposed to go into the election of all the assistant Door-keepers, the fire makers, and laborers that were necessary about the House, at this time.

The amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) was withdrawn, and the question being taken, the resolution of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) was adopted.

Mr. BORDEN said, that the Convention having decided to go now into the election of a President, he would take the liberty of proposing the name of Hon. GEO. W. CARR, one of the delegates from the county of Lawrence, for that station. In doing so, he desired to be allowed to say that the dignity and impartiality with which that gentleman had presided over the House of Representatives, of this State, for the last two sessions of that body, was a sufficient guarantee, that, by placing him in the Chair, the Convention would secure the services of a presiding officer well qualified for the station, and in every way worthy of it.

Then the roll being called by the Secretary of State it was ascertained that the whole number of members voting was 140—71 being necessary to constitute a majority.

The Secretary of State announced that Mr. GEO. W. CARR had received 134 votes (scattering 6)—as follows:

AYES. Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Besson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hadden, Holliday, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hiatt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of W., Kendall of Warren, Kilgore Kindley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Trembly, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolf, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum and Zenor—134.

The following gentlemen voted blanks, viz : Messrs. Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Hawkins, Helm, Howe, and Todd—6.

Mr. GEO. W. CARR, a delegate from the county of Lawrence, was therefore declared to be duly elected to the office of President of the Convention.

On motion by Mr. BORDEN it was Ordered, That a committee of two be appointed to wait upon the President, and conduct him to the Chair.

THE SECRETARY of STATE, accordingly reappointed Messrs. BORDEN of Allen, and SMITH of Ripley, and this service being performed by them—

The PRESIDENT rose and said :—

GENTLEMEN : I rise to tender to you my sincere and grateful acknowledgements for the distinguished honor you have conferred upon me in electing me to preside over this Convention. The memory of your partiality and this evidence of your confidence, will be carefully cherished by me to the latest period of my life.

GENTLEMEN, you are assembled here for the discharge of high and important duties ; and the fact that you have been selected by the people for the performance of those duties, is a sufficient guarantee to me, that your intercourse with each other will be constantly marked by that high-minded and liberal bearing which everywhere distinguishes a free people.

In entering upon the discharge of the duties of this place, I cannot but distrust my ability to meet your expectations ; but I shall throw myself upon your indulgence, and shall rely much upon the hope that I shall be constantly aided by your own wise counsel and experience.

With these assurances I accept the office to which you have called me, and promise, as far as my ability will permit, a faithful and fair discharge of its duties.

Mr. PETTIT said, that in consequence of the amount of business which it was desirable should be done out of doors, he would move that the Convention do now adjourn until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

Mr. KILGORE desired to amend the motion by striking out the words "to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock," and inserting the words "two o'clock this afternoon." He was proceeding to offer a reason for this modification, when—

The PRESIDENT interposed, and stated to the gentleman from Delaware, that the proposition was not debatable.

Mr. KILGORE contended that this motion to adjourn was debatable, because the Convention had not yet adopted rules—and being without any rules of government, anything and everything was in order.

Mr. BORDEN called the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) to order.

Mr. KILGORE having taken his seat,

The PRESIDENT requested the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) to reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. BORDEN said, that a motion to adjourn from day to day was not debatable. In reply to the argument of the gentleman from Delaware, that the Convention had no rules to govern their proceedings, he affirmed that the lex Parliamentaria was in force, and was the rule to govern the proceedings of every deliberative body in the country until such body had adopted rules for its own government ; that the lex Parliamentaria was as much the law to govern the proceedings of any deliberative body, as the common law was applicable to the government of proceedings of the courts of law. It was true that when any legislative body had adopted rules to govern its proceedings, those rules necessarily superseded the general parliamentary rules in all cases wherein they conflicted. But this body, not having as yet adopted any rules for its government, was necessarily governed by usages applicable to all deliberative bodies. For these reasons, inasmuch as the motion was clearly not debatable, he called the gentleman to order.

Mr. KILGORE said, he was aware that the gentleman on his left (Mr. Borden) understood parliamentary law very well. He doubted not that that gentleman had been studying this branch of knowledge very diligently during the whole of last summer. But the gentleman misunderstood his proposition. He had not offered a proposition for adjournment, but simply to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He now desired simply to say to his experienced friend from Tippecanoe, that he would like himself to know something about this informal business out of doors, to which the gentleman alluded. He threw himself upon the kind indulgence of that gentleman, and insisted that he should permit those who were not so much experienced—the within-door members—to have an opportunity afforded them of knowing how the officers of the Convention were to be elected.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that there were no special rules as yet, it was true, for the government of this body; but he understood it to be an universal parliamentary rule, that all questions of adjournment should be decided without debate.

Mr. FOSTER said, he was obliged to dissent from the decision of the Chair, for the reason that this body, being without rules, had as yet fixed no definite time to which the adjournment should extend. He appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN suggested to the gentleman from Tippecanoe to modify his motion, so as to take a recess until 3 o'clock P. M.

Mr. PETTIT declined to modify his motion.

The question being taken on the appeal, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

And the question recurring upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. Kilgore, it was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, being also agreed to.

The Convention took a recess until 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Chair to prepare and report rules of order for the government of the proceedings of this Convention; and until said committee report, and it be otherwise ordered, the rules of the House of Representatives of this State be adopted by this Convention, as regulations to govern its proceedings and deliberations, so far as the same are applicable.

The resolution was adopted.

The following delegates appeared, produced their credentials, and, being duly sworn by the Hon. HORACE P. BIDDLE, took their seats, to-wit:

JAMES RITCHEY, of Johnson,
SCHUYLER COLFAX, of St. Joseph, and
ALVIN P. HOVEY, of Posey.

Mr. KILGORE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That we now proceed to elect, viva voce, three Secretaries for this body, and that when elected, the President assign to each their respective duties.

Mr. KELSO said, that to his mind this seemed to be a very strange mode of proceeding—at one moment to adopt the rules of the House of Representatives, which require that all voting shall be by ballot, and in the next moment to adopt a resolution authorizing a viva voce vote.

The PRESIDENT said, he was not aware of any rule of the House prescribing that all voting should be by ballot.

Mr. PETTIT moved that the Convention adjourn until 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ROBINSON suggested whether it would not be better for the gentleman to make his motion to adjourn for a longer time—taking time enough for himself and his friends to retire and make a Constitution ready for submission to the Convention, so that the body would have nothing to do but to adopt it and go home.

Mr. PETTIT, (in his seat:) Oh yes, we will provide a Constitution in time.

The yeas and nays were demanded on the motion to adjourn, and being taken by the Secretary of State, were—yeas 37, nays 106; so the Convention refused to adjourn.

Upon the suggestion of Mr. SPANN, the county of Vanderburgh was called, and Mr. JAS. E. BLYTHE, delegate for said county, came forward, took the constitutional oath, and the oath of office, the same being administered by Judge BLACKFORD, and took his seat.

Mr. PETTIT proposed to amend the resolution of Mr. KILGORE by inserting after the word "duties" the words "and Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper."

Mr. KILGORE said, he would suggest to his experienced friend from Tippecanoe the propriety of keeping the election of these officers separate, for there were several candidates for each place.

Mr. KELSO said, he preferred the old plan of electing one officer at a time. He would prefer that they should first elect the Principal Secretary, a gentleman whom the Convention might look to as the head of that department, and after the election of the principal officers in the three departments named, he would have them to employ as many assistants as their business respectively might require. Nothing had ever yet gone wrong under this mode of proceeding. He objected to the resolution as entirely too broad, and the amendment, he said, would only make it worse.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. NAVE proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the word "three," and inserting the word "two."

[Several voices—"No, no."]

Mr. BORDEN demanded a division of the question; but subsequently withdrew the demand.

Mr. SPANN said, a resolution had just been passed, providing that we should proceed under the rules of the House of Representatives, of the last General Assembly, and he recollected no precedent for bundling up two, three, four, or five officers at a time in a single election.—He trusted that the Convention would not agree to such a course now, but that they would proceed to elect one officer at a time. He thought the rules ought to apply, with special strictness, to everything connected with the organization of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT said, he knew of no rule that would prohibit the election of more than one officer at a time.

Mr. NAVE modified his amendment, proposing to insert instead of the word "two," the word "one."

Mr. KILGORE suggested that such an amendment would be incongruous with the latter part of the resolution.

Mr. READ, of Clark, moved that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. KILGORE and Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN desired to know to what hour the Convention would adjourn under this motion.

The PRESIDENT: The rules adopted by the resolution of this afternoon, fix the hour at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The yeas and nays were then taken by the Secretary of State, who reported—yeas 37, nays 109; so the Convention again refused to adjourn.

Mr. RITCHIE rose and, stated that he had come up to the Convention to-day at a great sacrifice of feeling, on account of the indisposition of his son, and this would have to be his apology for returning home to-morrow. He came up merely to assist in the organization; and he wished to see the Convention organized to-night if possible. He hoped they would proceed with the election of the officers of the Convention, either by adopting the mode proposed by the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) or by ballot. He rather thought, from the votes of some gentlemen, that they desired to adjourn in order that some action or some understanding might be had upon this subject, out of the Hall. He was in the habit of subscribing to the doctrine of caucuses, and if the Democratic party thought proper to caucus, he should be pleased to vote to adjourn for that purpose; but if not, he should prefer to proceed to the proper business of the Convention. He saw the names of a number of gentlemen placed before the body as candidates for the different places to be filled, and he believed that almost any one of the candidates for the Secretaryship, would make a good Secretary. He was not acquainted with any of them, and he should neither regret or rejoice much at the defeat or success of any. He believed that in most cases an election might be made on the first ballot.

Mr. KENT proposed to amend the original resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following: "That the Convention proceed now to the election of a Principal Secretary."

Mr. NAVE said, that in order to perfect the original resolution more readily, he would withdraw his amendment, so as to give place to the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Kent,) still expressing his preference, however, for a viva voce vote.

Mr. FOSTER proposed to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd, by adding the words "two Assistant Secretaries, one Door-keeper, and one Sergeant-at-Arms by a viva voce vote, in the order in which they are named."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KILGORE proposed to amend the amendment by adding the words: "by a viva voce vote;" which was also rejected.

The question being taken on Mr. KENT'S amendment, it was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. KILGORE moved the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That in the election of Secretary, and other officers of the Convention, the vote be taken viva voce.

Mr. KELSO remarked that a proposition of that kind had been already voted down by the Convention.

Mr. KILGORE said, he did not understand this to be exactly the same proposition. It contemplated the manner of the election of officers besides the Secretary.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the resolution and amendments upon the table; but, before the motion was entertained by the Chair—

Mr. PETTIT interposed another motion for adjournment; and the yeas and nays being demanded upon this motion by Mr. KILGORE and Mr. ROBINSON, they were taken by the Secretary of State, who reported—yeas 53, nays 91.

So the Convention again refused to adjourn.

Mr. READ, of Clark, enquired: Whether, under the resolution just passed, the Convention was not compelled to go into the election of Principal Secretary immediately, unless that order was arrested by an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT replied affirmatively; but he added: That he understood that it was still competent for the body to prescribe the manner of voting, and, therefore, he had entertained the motion of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. KILGORE said, that in order to accommodate the views of gentlemen he would withdraw his proposition.

The Convention then proceeded to the election of a Principal Secretary; Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. KENT acting as tellers.

The votes taken, the Secretary of State reported the result of three ballottings as follows:

1st Ballot. 2d Ballot. 3d Ballot.

Wm. H. English,	- 47	64	76
Solon Turman,	- 27	41	66
Geo. L. Sites,	- 20	15*
Jas. S. Buckles,	- 14	9*
Francis King,	- 9	6
And. J. Boone,	- 12	5*
Benj. F. Myers,	- 4
John W. Spencer,	- 6	5
Scattering,	- 5	0	3

*The names of Jas. S. Buckles, And. J. Boone, and Geo. L. Sites, were severally withdrawn upon the determination of the 2d balloting.

The whole number of votes cast upon each ballot was 145—73 ballots being necessary to constitute an election, and it appearing, upon the determination of the third ballot that Wm. H. English, of the county of Scott, had received a majority of all the votes cast, he was declared to be duly elected to the office of Principal Secretary of the Convention, to serve in that capacity during the existence of the body.

And, therefore, Mr. English being called, came forward and, being duly sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD, the Senior Judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, proceeded to the discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. KILGORE moved to refer the election of the residue of the officers of the Convention to a select committee; pending which motion, at 40 minutes past 4 o'clock, on motion of Mr. WOLF, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY MORNING, Oct. 8th., 1850.

Mr. EDMUND D. TAYLOR, a delegate from the county of Laporte, appeared, produced his credentials and, being duly sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD, took his seat.

Mr. BORDEN introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert M. Evans, Herman G. Barkwell, and George L. Sites, be, and they are hereby appointed Assistant Secretaries to this Convention.

Mr. ROBINSON moved the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention one Principal and one Assistant Secretary will be amply sufficient to discharge all the duties growing out of the action of the Convention; and that the Convention now proceed to the election of one Assistant Secretary, and no more, who, together with the Principal Secretary elect, shall discharge the duties of Secretaries to this Convention.

The question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,)

Mr. BORDEN remarked, that as another proposition had been submitted upon this subject, he supposed the Convention could proceed to the consideration of the subject and decide upon it at the present time as well as at any other. He did not think that two gentlemen could perform all the labor which would be required at the Secretary's desk. Supposing the Convention were to approve of the amendment with an eye to economy, he apprehended it would be that sort of economy which might be described as "penny wise and pound foolish." He admitted that it might be shown that but two Secretaries had been employed at the first, in the service of some Conventions; but their numbers in most cases had subsequently been increased to five or six by the appointment of assistants; and this larger number of Secretaries had been found necessary in Conventions composed of a much smaller number of Delegates than was here assembled. Here were 150 Delegates, and he submitted whether any gentleman could seriously suppose that two or three men would be sufficient to perform all the clerical service that would be required. If gentlemen would turn to the 14th section of the act under which the Convention was organized they would find the following provision: "That the proceedings of said Convention shall be deposited by the President and Secretary thereof, in the office of the Secretary of State, who shall file the same." Here, it seemed to be contemplated that the proceedings of the Convention should be entered in a book, as a perpetual memorial of the action of the body. He apprehended that it would be necessary to employ one clerk to make this permanent manuscript record, and three others to discharge the duties at the desk. The Ohio Convention required this to be done, and so did the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, over which George Washington presided. It might be that two persons could do all the clerical labor here, but he did not think it possible. He had before him the journal of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of Indiana; and he found there, that Wm. Hendricks was elected Secretary, and that on the next day the Convention elected two Assistant Secretaries, Robert N. New, and Jas. A. Turnstall, and that afterwards they elected three additional Assistants, making six Secretaries in all, to serve in a Convention composed of 43 members. In view of this fact if gentlemen could be satisfied that two Secretaries could do the business, let them vote for the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON said, that he had offered his amendment because he believed it to be right and proper that such a provision should be adopted. He thought himself sufficiently experienced in legislation to be able to decide correctly in regard to this matter. He affirmed that there would not be one half the labor devolving upon the Secretaries of this body that was required to be performed by the clerks of any legislative body sitting the same length of time. He thought the experience of the Chair would amply confirm and corroborate this assertion. Besides it was manifest that the duty of the Assistant Secretaries was nearly all included simply in copying the journal of the Convention. It might be that the journal of this body would be swelled to some considerable extent; but the final result of the labors of the Convention, when it should all come to be condensed, arranged and printed, would hardly compose so large a volume of matter, as one of our ordinary corporation bills. The clerical labor of the Convention would consist chiefly in preparing and copying the journal, and in reading; whilst every year, in the Legislature, there were prepared and carried through all the forms of reading, engrossment, and enrollment, some twenty-five or thirty of those large corporation bills; and this was the reason why so many Assistants were required to be appointed. He considered this a correct view of the case, for he spoke more from experience than anything else. Every State in which a Convention had been held, save the State of New York, had taken precisely this course. A judicious economy could be practised here as well as in any other place.

Mr. BORDEN observed that if in the State Conventions which had been held in other States but two Secretaries had been elected, he would confess that he had been very much misinformed. But he was inclined to think that the gentleman from Decatur was mistaken. The New York Convention elected two Secretaries and in a few days authorized the appointment of one more. The Ohio Convention elected Mr. GILL principal Secretary, and Mr. CARROLTON his assistant; and, in one or two days afterwards, authorized the Principal Secretary to appoint another assistant, and then another..

Mr. STEELE moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "the additional Secretaries if required."

Mr. MILLER, of Gibson, moved to lay both the amendments on the table.

Mr. PETTIT said, that he supposed if this motion prevailed, it would carry the original resolution also to the table.

The PRESIDENT stated that such would not be the case under the rules of the Indiana Legislature.

The yeas and nays were demanded upon this question by Messrs. PRATHER and ROBINSON, and being taken, the Clerk reported—yeas 100, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Parke and Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Goo-tee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kindly, Lockhart, March, Mathers, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Millroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Trembly, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolf, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—100.

NAYS—Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Clarke of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gregg, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogan, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Robinson, Steele, Stevenson, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, and Watts—42.

So the amendments were laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENSON then moved to amend the resolution by substituting the following:

Resolved, That the Convention now proceed to elect two assistant Secretaries.

The original resolution, he said, contemplated a different mode from that practiced by deliberative bodies generally in the appointment of their officers. It contemplated the appointment of three at one time. If it proposed appointing only one individual, a proper selection might probably be made, but when it proposed to appoint three at one time, it would be but natural that men would be influenced in giving their votes in favor of one or more of the parties, by a desire to secure the election of their particular favorite and thus be lead to vote, perhaps, for the others without regard to the qualification or fitness for office of such others.

Thus it was that in legislative bodies sometimes an obnoxious measure was attached to a good one, in order to secure the passage of the former, which would not have passed if it had been left to depend upon its own merits. The principle was decidedly wrong. It was altogether a new one, and one which, he considered, it would be dangerous to adopt.

The business of the Convention differed materially from that of a State Legislature; there would be no memorials, petitions, or remonstrances, to be acted upon. They were called together for the purpose of forming a Constitution, an instrument occupying some ten or fifteen pages of the Statute Book. There could not then, he thought, be anything like the same amount of business to be done by the Secretary of the Convention, as by the Clerk of the General Assembly.

One hundred and fifty members would perform no more business than forty members would perform. One resolution only could be acted upon at a time, no matter what the number of members might be. In regard to the consideration of economy, he had only to say that he was not for going to extremes either way, either in extravagance or parsimoniousness.

He was of the opinion that two Secretaries were quite sufficient. He was not disposed to interfere, however, with any arrangement that had been made out of doors; and he was inclined to go for democratic appointees. He was willing that they should all be democrats; but he was opposed to adopting a new principle in reference to their elections. He trusted that the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. DOBSON said, that in his opinion the amendment did not go far enough. He moved an amendment to the effect that these officers should be elected and not appointed.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. KELSO hoped this matter might be compromised in such a way that the amendment by the gentleman from Owen might be adopted.—He was willing to vote for that. He hoped his friend would withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. STEVENSON said, he would accept the amendment leaving the number blank.

Mr. BASCOM withdrew the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. KELSO then moved to fill the blank with "three."

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe, moved to fill the blank with "two."

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first on the largest number.

Mr. FOSTER said he would remark to his Democratic friends that this would not be quite in accordance with the pledges they had given to their constituents. A great many pledges of economy had been given during the canvass.—He thought they ought to manifest their faith by their practice. He for one felt a disposition to manifest his faith by his works. But that was not all. He believed that two Secretaries were amply sufficient. He had had some experience in matters of this kind, and he believed that the clerical duties of the Convention would not be near as onerous as those of the Legislature. There was only the keeping of the journal to be done; there was no enrolling of bills, and he would venture to say that if they performed their work properly, the Constitution would not be equal in length to some of the enrolled bills of the Legislature. He should vote for the amendment.

Mr. BORDEN opposed the amendment. He could see no necessity for going into the election by ballot unless the object was to defeat those gentlemen who had been nominated. If the election were to be by a viva voce vote he had no objection; but he thought the best way was to make the appointments by resolution.

Mr. NAVE was in favor of the Convention electing at once a sufficient number of officers, without making it necessary, hereafter, for the Secretaries themselves to appoint assistants;—which was known to be the case in our State Legislature.

Mr. CLARK of T. said he rose to apologize to the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden) for making the motion to reduce the number of Secretaries. He was willing to concur in the edict of those who had decided on three Secretaries out of this body; but not having heard the arguments that had been advanced, he had to discharge a duty to his constituents by fixing on a number he thought sufficient. He thought a vote should be taken here on the officers, although the final decision might have been made elsewhere.

Mr. EDMONSTON favored the election of three Secretaries, as the number best calculated to advance the business of the Convention.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson, moved the previous question; which was not sustained.

The question was then taken on the motion to fill the blank with three, and it was agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WATTS moved the following amendment, "that Samuel J. Johnson of Dearborn County be declared Door-keeper of this Convention."

The question being taken the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COCKERLY moved to amend the resolution by inserting the words "by viva voce vote."

The amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment, as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative:

The question on the original resolution was then taken and decided in the affirmative.

The resolution as amended was adopted;—whereupon

The roll was called and the following gentlemen voted

FOR ROBERT M. EVANS:

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Parke and Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton,

The following gentlemen voted for

JAMES B. RAY:

Messrs. Hitt, Morgan, Robinson and Steel.—(4.)

Those gentlemen who voted blank were Messrs. Clark, Gregg and Todd.—(3.)

ROBERT M. EVANS, of the County of Fountain, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, was declared duly elected one of the Assistant Secretaries to this Convention, and being duly sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Indiana, proceeded to the discharge of the duties of his office.

The roll being again called the following gentlemen voted for

HARMON G. BARKWELL:

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Parke and Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Spencer and Warrick, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Miami, Kendall of Warren, Kindly, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stephenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Trembly, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Wheeler, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—(124.)

The following gentleman voted

FOR MR. STALLARD.

Messrs. Balingall, Davis of Madison, Hogan, Morgan, Rariden, Robinson, Steel, Walpole.—(8.)

Mr. Crawford voted for Mr. Lafferty.

The following gentlemen voted blank, to-wit:—

Messrs. Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax and Mather.—(4.)

HARMON G. BARKWELL, of the County of Perry, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given was declared duly elected one of the Assistant Secretaries of this Convention, and being sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Indiana, proceeded to the discharge of the duties of his office.

The roll being again called, the following gentlemen voted

FOR GEORGE L. SITES:

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, &c., Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Miami, Kendall of Warren, Kindly, Lockhart, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Trembly, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—120.

The following gentlemen voted blank—to-wit:—

Messrs. Balingall, Beard, Clark of Hamilton, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Hitt, Logan, Stephenson, Thomas, Watts.—10.

GEORGE L. SITES, of the County of Allen, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, was declared duly elected one of the Assistant Secretaries to this Convention, and being sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Indiana, proceeded to the discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. READ, of Clark, offered the following resolution.

Resolved, That Samuel McKenzie be appointed Sergeant-at-arms to this Convention.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. READ of Clark offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Samuel J. Johnson be appointed Doorkeeper to this Convention, which was adopted.

Mr. McKenzie and Mr. Johnson were sworn by the Hon. ISAAC BLACKFORD, and proceeded to the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

Mr. PETTIT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to have placed in this Hall suitable desks for the use of the Stenographers at such place and of such form as they may direct.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. READ of Clark submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary confer with the Clergy of this city, and request them to make such arrangements among themselves, as that one of their number open the Convention each day with prayer.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PETTIT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That three committees on the outlines of the Constitution shall be appointed by the President, to-wit:

One on the Legislative Department of the Government, whose duty it shall be to consider all matters which may be referred to it, and prepare and report provisions relative to that Department.

One on the Executive Department of the Government, whose duty it shall be to consider all matters which may be referred to it, and prepare and report provisions relative to that Department.

One on the Judicial Department of the Government, whose duty it shall be to consider all matters which may be referred to it, and prepare and report provisions relative to that Department.

Mr. BORDEN moved to strike out the resolution from the resolving clause, and insert the following:

"That a Standing Committee be appointed to consider and report on each of the following classes of subjects; and that the several parts of the existing Constitution, which relate to those subjects respectively, be also referred to said committee.

"1. The rights and privileges of the citizens and inhabitants of this State.

"2. The apportionment, election, tenure of office, and compensation, of the members of the General Assembly.

"3. The powers and duties of the General Assembly, except as to the public debt and matters otherwise referred.

"4. The election, tenure of office, compensation, powers, and duties, of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor.

"5. The election and appointment of officers of State other than Legislative or Judicial, their powers, duties and compensation.

"6. The election and appointment of all County officers, their tenure of office, powers, duties, and compensation.

"7. The Judicial Department of Government, the election of judicial officers, their tenure of office and compensation.

"8. The power of impeachment, and removal from office.

"9. The elective franchise, and the qualifications to vote and hold office.

"10. The militia and military officers.

"11. The future amendments and revision of the Constitution.

"12. The State University, County Seminaries, Education, Common Schools, and their appropriate funds.

"13. The State Bank, Currency and Banking.

"14. On such parts of the Constitution as are not otherwise referred.

"15. On corporations other than Banking.

"16. On canals and other improvements, public revenue and property, public debt and the powers and duties of the Legislature in reference thereto; and the restrictions proper to be imposed on the Legislature in making loans of money on the credit of the State.

"17. On the organization of County Boards, the granting of powers of local legislation to them, and the adoption of a uniform mode of doing county and township business.

"18. On reducing to a Code such parts of the laws of this State as may be found practicable and expedient; and also on reforming the rules and practice of the Courts of this State.

"19. On the Homestead Exemption, and on the accumulation, creation, and division of estates in lands.

Resolved, That each committee appointed under the foregoing resolutions shall consist of —members, except the committee on the judiciary, which shall consist of—."

Mr. REED of Monroe offered the following as a substitute for both resolutions:—

"That a committee of —be appointed to report a plan for the business of this Convention."

Mr. KELSO opposed all three of the propositions for the present, although the last one seemed to suit his views much better than either of the others. A committee had been appointed to draft rules for the government of this body, and until that duty was performed, the resolutions now introduced would be premature.

Mr. REED of Monroe saw nothing in the appointment of the committee on the rules that would conflict with the proposition now before the Convention.

Before the question was taken,

Mr. COOKERLY moved that the Convention adjourn until 2 P. M.

The motion was agreed to and the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the number of the committee on rules as proposed by him on yesterday, be fixed at thirteen—one from each judicial circuit—to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of Mr. Pettit's resolutions and amendments pending at the time of the adjournment.

Mr. BORDEN moved to refer the resolutions and amendments to a committee of the whole on the state of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BORDEN remarked, that the gentleman from Tippecanoe had offered a resolution that morning, providing for the appointment of three committees, to whom should be referred the existing Constitution of the State, for the purposes of revision and amendment. He (Mr. B.) had proposed as a substitute a projet, providing for the appointment of nineteen standing committees, to whom should be referred the several articles of the present Constitution, and also some other matters to which no allusion was made in the Constitution. And he thought that he could satisfy the Convention, that, under the circumstances in which they were then placed, the correct course would be to refer it to a committee of the whole Convention, as he had had the honor to propose. On yesterday a resolution had been passed raising a committee whose business it was to draw up rules and regulations for the government of this body. Now, with great deference to the judgment of others, it was his opinion that upon this committee properly devolved the duty of organizing the necessary standing committees, if it was the design of the Convention to entrust that business to a committee of the Convention rather than do it themselves. For instance, they had adopted the rules of the late House of Representatives of this State for their temporary government; and by referring to those rules, it would be seen that among them there was one providing for the appointment of seventeen standing committees: a committee on education, one on corporations, one on benevolent institutions, &c., &c. Now, the resolution already adopted included these committees, for it provided that the committee having charge of the subject of preparing rules and orders for their government, should organize these committees. A course similar to this was pursued in the late Convention in Kentucky, held to revise and amend the Constitution of that State. A committee was raised who reported the rules and regulations, and also the standing committees. The language of the resolution introduced by him and already adopted, was very similar to the resolution adopted there. He had the official report of the debates at hand, from which he could read, if required, to show that he was not mistaken. The committee there raised was composed of thirteen members. After they had reported, the Convention took up their report; some of the committees they proposed to raise being agreed to, and others stricken out, and their duties devolved on others differently designated.

Now, the proposition which he had submitted, provided, as he had already intimated, for the formation of some committees which were perhaps unnecessary. All they had to do, however, was to go into committee of the whole, and there to discuss this question. He had no pride of opinion in this matter; and if, on discussion, it was found that any of the committees proposed would be of no practical utility, they could easily be omitted. And if it was thought desirable to create any new committees, who should have charge of certain peculiar subjects which he had overlooked, that object also could be effected, by proposing resolutions to raise committees on those subjects.

The committee on rules had been ordered to consist of thirteen members, one from each judicial circuit; but, if it was thought proper, the number might be increased to two from each judicial circuit, as the committee had not yet been appointed. If the Convention had determined to send the Constitution to a committee of only a part of this body, for distribution, he could not but think that the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) to take the subject and refer it to another committee, would be, in effect, to revoke the order of yesterday, authorizing the Chair to appoint the first committee.

But, in his opinion, the best course now to harmonize the views of all parties, was to refer the subject to a committee of the whole, in the manner proposed by him. In submitting this proposition, he had done it with great diffidence, which arose as well from the distinguished talent by which he was surrounded, as from the fact of his being deficient in legislative experience, never before having been honored with a seat in a legislative assembly.

This Convention had assembled for great and important purposes. Their action was not to be of a temporary character, if the work of their hands was finally approved by the people. The decisions they made to-day were not to be repealed to-morrow. On the contrary, their action would, in all human probability, affect for good or evil, the interests of millions yet unborn, who were to come after them ; and as he hoped and trusted, would, for countless ages to come, occupy this noble State. He did not design to detain them from the great duties before them, in commenting on the magnitude of the trust reposed in them by their constituents. It was sufficient to say, that theirs was the task of laying the corner stone for the future political security of the people of Indiana, and especially to remove from the Constitution those defects which thirty-four years of experience had made manifest to the people. It seemed to him that this Convention stood, as it were, upon the foundations of their political organization, charged with the high duty of reconstructing the political edifice under which they all lived. And he thought it was not only proper, but highly necessary, that even the initiatory steps which they might adopt at the commencement of the session, with the view of beginning the work before them, should be such as would tend to harmony of purpose and unanimity of action. He felt convinced, unless they all set out, not only with a desire, but with a strong determination to pursue a course of conciliation, as he had already intimated, that the Convention would fail to realize to the fullest extent that it could, if so disposed, the expectations of the people in convoking it. And for one, he could aver that he was not wedded to any particular plan, and only desired to pursue that course having for its object the most effectual mode of carrying out this design. Nevertheless, he had, since his arrival here, taken some pains to examine the manner of proceeding adopted in the Conventions that had been held in the different States of the Union ; and he was convinced that the mode he had indicated would be attended with fewer difficulties, and productive of better results, than any other course that had been suggested.

He considered that the people had sent them there to accomplish a very important business, and the question now to be decided was, in what manner they should approach the subject—where they were to begin, and how they should progress with the revision of the Constitution. Whether they referred the Constitution to the consideration of a committee of the whole or to a select committee, as proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) was, in his estimation, merely a question of convenience. The matter to be decided was how they could best classify and arrange the different subjects embraced in the Constitution, and others upon which they would probably be called to act, so that each particular subject could be referred to its appropriate and peculiar committee. And he respectfully submitted, that the reference of the Constitution to a committee of the whole, would tend greatly to expedite the business before them. In this committee, any gentleman upon the floor, however humble his pretensions might be, could, if he desired it, have an opportunity to bring forward a proposition to raise a committee to enquire into and report on any subject he might deem worthy the attention of his associates in this body. But if this opportunity is not now afforded, they would have, probably, proposition after proposition, down to the close of the session of the Convention, to raise committees to investigate some matter which would and could be attended to now if a full and free opportunity were afforded for discussion. He thought it important, that before the Constitution was referred to a select committee for distribution, they should have the views of the members as to the proper distribution of the whole subject ; and if they thought proper, briefly their reasons for it. By adopting this course, they would undoubtedly have a more satisfactory and proper distribution than could be obtained in any other way.

The principle never to entrust to another that which they could do just as well themselves, he thought, should influence the minds of members in deciding this question. If the Convention believed they could do the work as well themselves as if it were referred to a select committee, he presumed they would prefer to do it, as he thought it would be but a poor compliment to this body to suppose that an equal, if not greater amount of intelligence and wisdom could not be found in the whole Convention than in a fractional part of it, however able and intelligent the committee might be who should be appointed under the resolution proposed by his friend from Monroe.

The committee of the whole was a mode of legislative procedure with which they were familiar, it being much used in the legislative assemblies of our country, both in the National and State legislatures ; it being usual to refer bills of great importance to a committee of the whole, where they received their first consideration and discussion. Could not the Convention take up the Constitution of Indiana and refer it to a committee of the whole, and in that committee act upon it, in the same manner that the House of Representatives of the Union acts on the President's message, and as both branches of our State legislature do on the Governor's message ? The first article respecting the rights and privileges of the citizens and inhabitants of this State usually called the "Bill of Rights," could be read and then a resolution offered that so much of the Constitution as related to that subject be referred to a committee. So with reference to the remaining articles and subdivisions of the Constitution ; and if any gentleman was desirous of having any particular subject investigated, not in the present Constitution, he had only to move the formation of a committee to have charge of that special subject. Thus the various topics embraced in the Constitution could be dissected, if he might be allowed the use of the expression, arranged in proper order, and by the committee of the whole reported to the Convention, and when the Convention had agreed to the report, it would then refer the various subjects to appropriate committees.

It would be recollected by gentlemen conversant with the constitutional history of the country from which they derived their language, and, to a great extent, their laws, institutions, and modes of parliamentary procedure, that the great legislative contest fought there between the friends of freedom and slavery, was in committee of the whole, then termed the Grand Committee of Supplies. And he could not but consider such a mode of procedure as one worthy of attention and respect, not only because of its antiquity, but for the good it had accomplished. For what purpose, he would enquire, had the people of Indiana, more than a year since, by an overwhelming vote, called this Convention? Was it to be supposed that they had convoked this assembly merely for the purpose of making one or two slight alterations in the organic law of the State? Certainly not. He believed that important reforms were needed in that instrument, and as in a committee of the whole, there was more freedom of debate and action, and less restraint of parliamentary forms and usages, he believed by letting it take that course every gentleman in the Convention would have an opportunity of showing to what extent, in the way of reform, his constituents desired him to go.

Another advantage resulting from the projet he had suggested, was, that the several subjects before them would receive a two-fold consideration, being first considered in committee of the whole and then in the Convention. Propositions would not only be freely offered, but with great freedom discussed; and they should obtain what was much to be desired, an open and free comparison of opinion. Thus, when they returned into Convention to act on the matter, they would understand each others' views much better than in any other mode they could adopt. If there was any evil to be deplored, it was that of hasty action, and this course would obviate it to some extent.

Let his suggestion be adopted, and they could commence, at once, the work they were sent there to perform.

He had heard it intimated since he had been here, that there was a proposition to be submitted by a distinguished gentleman on this floor, to raise a select committee of this body, to consist of some twenty-five or more members, to whom was to be entrusted the entire business of framing a new Constitution, and reporting it to this Convention; and the proposition now under consideration, and which he had moved to amend, proposed to raise only three committees, one on each of the great departments of government; and he presumed should it be adopted, not more than one-third of the members would be attached to these three committees. Now if this grand committee was to be appointed, he would ask, what was this Convention to be engaged in while that committee was deliberating? Must they sit there with their arms folded, meeting only to adjourn until this committee was ready to report. A sense of duty to his constituents, constrained him to oppose both propositions, as he desired to begin to-day the work they were sent to execute.

There was another subject to which he would allude before he took his seat, as it might save him the trouble of rising again to speak on the matter, and that was in regard to the manner of constituting these committees to whom the Convention should order the several subjects to be referred. After the committee of the whole had reported sundry resolutions to the Conventions distributing the various parts of the Constitution to different committees, and this body had agreed to the report, the question would naturally arise how the committees should be constituted. In the Convention that formed the present State Constitution, there were twelve standing committees raised, but the State had increased in all her great interests, to such an extent, as in his opinion to render it necessary to raise some six or seven more committees than was then deemed necessary. He proposed to organize nineteen standing committees, and to add a sufficient number of members to each committee to embrace in their deliberations every member of the Convention. His reasons for this was that he presumed there were some members of this body, who, like himself, never having had the honor of a seat in a deliberative body, were consequently, young and unfledged in the business of legislation. And even of those who might have heretofore served in our State Legislature, there probably were some who, though men of clear heads and sound principles, yet might not possess what was usually termed a talent for public speaking, and, unless they were placed on some of the committees, we shall lose the benefit of their intelligence and counsel in framing the Constitution. This feature in the organization of the committees he regarded as of paramount importance. It was a position every member was entitled to occupy, and the advantage was thereby gained of the entire wisdom and prudence of the whole body being directed the consideration of the subject before them. He apologized to the Convention for having so long and, perhaps, so unnecessarily, occupied their time, and observed he did not expect to occupy much of their time in debate, and would trouble them with as few propositions, as were consistent with the interest of those he was sent to represent.

Mr. T. SMITH observed that he did not profess to understand much about legislative proceedings, or the necessary rules for the government of legislative bodies—never having paid much attention to them—nevertheless, he considered the mode just suggested of referring the Constitution of Indiana to the committee of the whole, the most correct mode, and the one that should be adopted. The idea had been suggested to his mind some time since, by a gentleman residing in the northern part of the State, and he favored the plan because it afforded an opportunity for every member, at the outset, to present his views. It would lead to a more extended discussion, which was eminently desirable. He was opposed to any unnecessary consumption of time, and he regarded the formation of a number of large committees, as tending to that result. They could take up the Constitution, article by article, and it might be that they would agree upon those articles while in committee of the whole, thus making short work of the labor before them. It was a false idea that every resolution and subject that had been discussed in the Convention of Kentucky, and Ohio, and New York, had to be gone over again in the Convention of Indiana. He was opposed to any such course of procedure. The idea that a large book must be made of their proceedings was equally absurd; and he could not but think that if those proceedings were to go entirely unreported, the term of their session would soon be brought to a close.

Mr. BORDEN renewed his motion to refer the whole subject to the committee of the whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated, that it was not in order to refer the Constitution of Indiana to the committee of the whole—that subject was not now before the Convention.—The question pending was the resolution providing for the appointment of the standing committees.

Mr. BORDEN said, he would modify his motion, and move the reference of the resolution to the committee of the whole.

The question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) Mr. EDMONSTON said, he was far from setting himself up to be a judge of parliamentary law, but as he understood parliamentary usage, he certainly thought that upon the committee on rules and regulations, appointed yesterday, devolved the duty of drafting committees, and reporting their organization to the Convention. It then remained for the Convention to decide which were necessary and which were not.—Their number could be either diminished or increased. This had been the practice in all Legislative bodies. When these committees were appointed, then there existed something tangible to which references could appropriately be made. He trusted that under the resolution of yesterday, the chair would proceed to appoint a committee who should report rules and regulations for their government, and that he would also appoint the necessary standing committees.

Mr. KELSO said, that it seemed to be the desire of gentlemen to do up all the business of the Convention that afternoon; but for his part, he saw no necessity for being in such a desperate hurry to get through with the business before them. His friend from Allen appeared very desirous of getting into committee of the whole. This might be desirable, but as far as his experience went, he would say he had seen more frolics and waste of time occur during the sessions of such committees, than at any other time. How, he would ask, could a subject be committed, when there was no committees existing to which it might be referred. It was about as senseless a proceeding as for a man to search for the hole made by thrusting his finger into water. (Laughter.) They had adopted the rules of the late House of Representatives, and by these rules they should be governed. He would have the Chair, then, appoint the committee ordered to be raised on yesterday, and that committee report to the Convention the necessary standing committees. The Convention could then decide upon the requisite committees, and then his friend from Allen might bring forward his proposition to go into committee of the whole for the purpose of distributing the Constitution.

Mr. READ, of Monroe, said, he understood that on yesterday a committee had been appointed to draft rules and regulations for the government of the Convention; this was all the duty which that committee was required to perform. It had no authority whatever vested in it to raise the standing committees. In the New York convention, a committee was first organized who simply reported rules and regulations. So in the Ohio Convention. Then some gentleman came forward and presented a plan of action to the consideration of the Convention, which plan of proceedings was adopted. Now they had appointed a committee on rules and regulations, and thus completed the organization of the Convention. The next thing was to appoint a committee who should report a plan for the business of the Convention.—The amendment he had already offered, was not worded in the manner he would prefer; he would therefore withdraw that amendment, and offer the following as a substitute. "That a committee of — be appointed to report a plan for the business of this Convention, and to designate the number and functions of the different committees."

Mr. BORDEN said, he would withdraw the amendment he had that morning offered, for a season, in the hope that some general amendment, effecting the purpose he wished to attain, would be adopted. He would merely remark that the gentleman's attempt at ridicule was one thing, and sound argument another. The motion he had made was precisely the same in effect as one made in the Virginia Convention, by one of its most eminent members. He did not mean that the several resolutions were such as were brought up in that Convention, but that the proposition to go into committee of the whole, and then distributing the Constitution, was of like character to one offered in that assembly.

So the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. READ, of Monroe, moved to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and insert the amendment which he had just offered, as a substitute.

The question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Monroe,

Mr. PETTIT desired to say a few words before the question was taken on the pending amendment. It appeared to him that the natural divisions of government here and elsewhere were three—legislative, executive, and judicial; and these divisions were recognized in a provision in the present Constitution. These departments embraced every subject requiring their attention; for no gentleman had as yet attempted to bring forward a proposition providing for the addition of another division of the powers of government. Almost the first provision of their present State Constitution, as also of the Constitution of the United States, and of the several States of the Union, set forth those three divisions of the powers of government. Similar divisions were to be found in the acknowledged provisions of the unwritten Constitution of Great Britain. The appointment of these three committees would not of course debar any gentleman from moving the formation of other committees, if such an addition should be thought necessary. He was prepared to vote in favor of such an addition if gentlemen thought it absolutely requisite.

With reference to the proposition of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) he must say that he considered it of but little practical utility. It was true that if, as the gentleman proposed, nineteen committees were organized, a number of gentlemen would be gratified in being appointed Chairmen of those committees. For one he was willing to take the tail end of any committee.

Mr. PETTIT. Gentlemen say consent but it may be that a committee thus constituted would be like a Kangaroo—strongest in the hind quarters. (Laughter.) The effect of having so many different committees would be to retard action and confuse business. Each committee would be encroaching upon the proper duties of the other, for they could not fail, without mutual consultation, in reporting twenty different provisions of the Constitution, of offering some particular article that would conflict with another article.

From the statement of the gentleman from Allen, it was to be inferred that the proposition he had offered was the serpent that was to swallow up everything. This, at least, was the purport of the gentleman's statement. Now it did appear to him, (Mr. P.) that for a gentleman who had never been in any deliberative body before, to come there and ask to be made the head and front of a committee which was to have the distribution of the various subjects embraced in this Constitution, was a tolerably officious act, and one against which might justly be raised the charge of absorption. He had had some experience in legislative bodies elsewhere, and for one he felt bound to say that such a position as that taken by the gentleman from Allen, he was not desirous of occupying.

As the practice of referring the message of the President to the committee of the whole had been alluded to, he would state that such a reference could be made with all propriety, but that when before that committee for consideration no reference of certain portions could be made directly to any other particular committee. That committee simply resolved that having had under consideration so much of the President's message, they recommended the reference of this portion and the other to appropriate committees. The reference was never made directly from the committee of the whole. They must in the first place adopt a resolution appointing committees, and then the direct reference could be made.

The resolution adopted on yesterday provided for the formation of a committee which should report rules and regulations for the government of the Convention—the Convention in the meanwhile to be governed by the rules of the House of Representatives. Now if the resolution of the gentleman absorbed the resolution of yesterday, and embraced the power to raise the committees, they must, acting under the rules of the House of Representatives, adopt the same number of committees that existed in that body. They must raise similar committees to those organized by the House.—Were they then to have a committee on enrolled bills? He took it for granted that such a committee would not be raised because it would not be applicable to the Convention; that however, would be the effect of the gentleman's proposition. On the contrary there was no necessity existing for any such committee, and the true course to be pursued was to elect only such committees as were necessary and appropriate. If the proposition for organizing three great committees were adopted and carried into effect, how then would the business proceed? A friend at his left, for instance, might desire that some provision with reference to the judiciary should be engrafted on the Constitution. Then he would only have to move that the committee having charge of that subject be instructed to inquire into the expediency of engrafting said provision; and after the report of the committee had been presented a motion would have to be made that it be laid on the table and printed, and afterwards referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Commonwealth. They would then come to the most interesting period of the session—the period when the deliberations of the committee of the whole commenced. At that time every member should be in his place, attentive to the duties of legislation. If the committee of the whole should adopt the provision it would be reported back to the Convention and then the question come up as to whether the Convention would concur in the action of the committee of the whole. If it was concurred in, the provision would become a part of the proposed Constitution. If any amendment was made it was then to be re-referred to the appropriate committee in order that in a smaller body it might be carefully considered.

He had heard it suggested that but one committee should be appointed to have under their jurisdiction all the topics embodied in the Constitution. He had heard several gentlemen conversing about the propriety of such a plan, but as yet he had not obtained the approbation of his own mind, that such a course should be pursued. He did not think that with propriety or justice all the subjects coming under the supervision of the three different departments of this government could be referred to one committee. It appeared to him that the persual of such a course would be drawing into a very small vortex the power of the Convention, and also that the labors of these different committees could more harmoniously and beneficially effect the purpose designed in the calling of the Convention. To undertake to dovetail together the action of nineteen different committees would be a more fatiguing task than to travel over the most old fashioned railroad in Indiana. As a matter of course the various courts of the State would be at variance in their decisions upon the true meaning of the different articles of the Constitution. They could not of necessity give them the proper construction. He trusted that the resolution he had offered would be adopted.

Mr. OWEN said, he had been from the first in favor of passing the resolution of the gentleman from Monroe, and the remarks of the gentleman who had just taken his seat, further confirmed him in the opinion that it ought to be adopted. So far as he had considered the matter he thought that the number of standing committees should be more than three and less than nineteen, and their organization could more speedily be reported to the Convention through the medium of a select committee raised for that purpose.

Mr. EDMONSTON, of Dubois, moved to fill up the blank in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Monroe, with the words "one from each Congressional District."

The question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois.

Mr. BORDEN said, that he wished before the vote was taken upon the question before them, to allude briefly to the remarks made by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit.) He admitted that much deference was due to the more mature experience of Congressmen and Legislators; nevertheless, he thought that some degree of learning and wisdom might be found elsewhere than among those gentlemen who had served in Congress, and in State Legislatures. The gentleman from Tippecanoe had said that he (Mr. B.) had proposed a resolution—in character like the rod of Aaron's serpent that swallowed up all others. He did not design arousing the ire of any gentleman in the Convention, and therefore he would remind the House that in offering his resolution it was intended to operate temporarily, until the House had adopted their permanent rules. It was not his design to take anything out of the hands of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He would bow in deference to his superior knowledge and experience, nevertheless the opinions which he entertained conscientiously he should fearlessly express. It was argued that the distribution of the subjects before them did not belong to the Committee on rules already ordered. He thought differently. It was said that we should not refer to the proceedings of other Conventions; but he would ask, with great respect to his friend from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) if it was wrong to refer to the proceedings of the Convention which formed the instrument they were about revising. Upon the second day of the session of that Convention; Mr. Johnston submitted a resolution for the appointment of twelve different standing Committees—which committees reported the twelve different articles to that Convention that now comprise the existing Constitution of the State. Yet his friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) had said that such a course of procedure was incongruous—that it would inevitably produce confusion. Several of the leading members of the Convention to which he had referred, and who were considered at that time very able men, among them Judges Park and Johnson, and Mr. Noble, advocated the division of the Constitution into twelve different parts, and it was thus referred, each portion to an appropriate committee, and they only raised those committees that were applicable to the business of the Convention. For one, he would say that he represented the opinions of a portion of the people of this State, and he cared not whether it pleased gentlemen or not, he intended to perform the duty he was commissioned to execute. He felt it to be his duty, however, to bow to the will of the majority.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) had said that every part of the Constitution was embraced under one of three heads; now he would respectfully inquire of him, to which of these heads the bill of rights appertained.

Mr. PETTIT said, he thought he could readily satisfy the gentleman on that point. The rights set forth in the bill of rights were secured by the judiciary. The violation of any of them could easily be punished in any judicial district.

Mr. BORDEN said the gentleman from Tippecanoe, in the resolution submitted by him, proposed the appointment of only three committees. Now it was admitted by all that there was a great probability that several other committees would necessarily be created. This fact was admitted by the gentleman from Tippecanoe himself. Why then delay the formation of the necessary committees? why not pass a resolution for their formation at once? The duty had to be performed and it would be better that it should be executed immediately. He was satisfied that the proper plan was to authorize the mode of distribution he had suggested.

Mr. RASCOM moved that the Convention adjourn; which motion was disagreed to. The question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois, (Edmonston,) to fill up the blank in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Monroe,

Mr. RARIDEN remarked, that he was of opinion that the object set forth in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe had been misapprehended by gentlemen who had been engaged in discussing the subject. He did not understand that it would interfere with the rights of any member of the Convention. The three several committees were to act as presiding spirits over the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the government. It was a species of machinery for the purpose of bringing together in one harmonious whole, the discordant elements that prevailed in the Convention—for it was clearly evident that many of the members composing the Convention, would not be satisfied without making numerous amendments to the Constitution they were called upon to revise. There was an apparent necessity existing for the formation of a committee on elections, in addition to the three proposed, whose duty should be the examination of the credentials of the members; but if any other committee was desired, for instance a committee on banking, there was a manifest propriety in delaying its formation, until the time for action upon that subject arrived. When those gentlemen of the Convention, who were thoroughly acquainted with the various and important subjects coming under the consideration of the Convention, had become known to the President of the Convention, then would be the proper time for the appointment of other committees to consider such particular subjects as might be deemed worthy of consideration. It would be apparent to the mind of every member, that if there was anything wrong in the action of any of these committees, that action could easily be revoked by the Convention; as the formation of those committees was merely a commission of the House to expedite business and save time. He did not think that the appointment of these three committees—as the gentleman from Tippecanoe had stated—would interfere with the subsequent appointment of any other committees that might be thought necessary. All that was contemplated in the formation of these committees was that they should exercise the work of supervision.

They were not to over-rule the action of the Convention, but were to advise and point out those plans of action which they considered most advantageous to the Commonwealth.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said he had listened with great deference and pleasure to the speeches that had been delivered upon the subject before them; but he confessed they did not come up to his ideas of the duty which they, as delegates of the people, had to perform.

The idea of three great committees might please some gentlemen, because of the vast influence it would give those gentlemen in the Convention—if elected Chairman of those committees. He attributed no such motive to gentlemen; although such a construction might be placed upon their action. Suppose, said Mr. Morrison, that these committees be appointed and that they consist of fifty members each; I would enquire of any man who has ever done business in a committee, how so large a committee could speedily and impartially execute the business entrusted to them? If this plan were to be adopted, he said it was just as easy to organize one great conventional committee, to whom should be entrusted all the business arising before the Convention. There would be but little difference between the action of fifty and the action of a hundred and fifty men when they came to close work and scrupulous detail.

He would have the members look for instance at the subject of banking or finance. Such a subject would give ample scope to the most enlarged efforts of the ablest intellects in that body. There were fifty other subjects, perhaps not as important, but still demanding assiduous attention, which would require the investigation and attention of these committees. How could they all be deliberated upon, and reported to the Convention without jarring or confusion? There were subjects that would come up for consideration, that were not embraced in the Constitution; then why not at once organize the necessary committees of reference instead of waiting until the very moment for action had arrived? Suppose, (continued Mr. M.,) that the committees were increased to twelve or fifteen, and that each committee was composed of some nine or ten members, could not those committees act with more expedition upon the subjects referred to them, than if their number were diminished? They could report back to the Convention the result of their deliberations, and after those reports were received they could be referred to and acted upon, in the committee of the whole, and there they could easily be made to harmonize. For one he desired to have more discussion upon the subject, so that each member might understand clearly the position he occupied in the Convention. He wished that the members of all parties should be heard in the discussion of the body, as he wanted to make the Convention as democratic as possible—he wanted to make it a democratic republican whig Convention.

Mr. PETTIT said, that he did not desire to debate the question any further at this time, believing that it would be better for members to commune among themselves in regard to it. He would therefore move that the Convention adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn; it was not agreed to.

On motion, the resolution and pending amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN moved, that the Secretary of the Convention be instructed to ascertain, and report, whether a more convenient hall could not be procured, for the deliberations of the Convention, and upon what terms.

The PRESIDENT stated, that in connection with the subject just mentioned he would lay before the Convention, the correspondence that had taken place between the Governor and proprietors of the Masonic Hall, respecting the hiring of said Hall, for the use of the Convention.

The correspondence was read by the Secretary, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Oct. 7, 1850.

HON. G. W. CARR,

President of the Convention:

Please lay before the body over which you have the honor to preside, the accompanying correspondence. Having failed in procuring the Masonic Hall for the use of the Convention under the restriction of the Legislature, we have prepared the Hall of the House for their reception, leaving it to the Convention to take such action in the premises as may be deemed proper.

We have the honor to be, &c.,

JOSEPH A. WRIGHT, Governor,
JAMES P. DRAKE, Treas. of State.
E. W. H. ELLIS, Auditor of State.

INDIANAPOLIS, May 6, 1850.

WM. SHEETS, Esq.:

Dear Sir:—Under an act of the last Legislature the undersigned are authorized to contract with you for the Masonic Hall for the use of the State Convention to revise the Constitution, at a rate not exceeding one hundred dollars per month. We are authorized to close such a contract immediately if our proposition shall be accepted. An early answer is desired. Respectfully, &c.,

[Signed] J. A. WRIGHT, Governor,
J. P. DRAKE, Treasurer of State.
E. W. H. ELLIS, Auditor of State

INDIANAPOLIS, May 9, 1850.

MESSRS. ELLIS, DRAKE, and WRIGHT:

Gentlemen:—

Your note of the 6th instant, in relation to the use of the large room in the Masonic Hall, for the sitting of the Convention, has just been received. I cannot, in justice to the stockholders for whom I act, contract for the occupancy of the room at the rate you propose, viz: one hundred dollars per month; but I will agree to prepare the room as stated in a former letter, keep it in order during the session of the Convention, for $20 a day, or I will prepare the room for the use of the Convention, leaving the compensation to be fixed by the Convention itself.

Respectfully your ob't servant,

[Signed] WM. SHEETS, Com'r.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the communications just read on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the motion offered by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden.)

Mr. KELSO moved to strike out the word "Secretary," and insert the words "a committee of three."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. MILROY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be a committee of seven appointed, whose duty it shall be to enquire into and report to this Convention upon the legality of the claim of the present State Printer to do the printing for this Convention, and that in the meantime the Secretary of the Convention be authorized to cause the necessary printing to be done at the prices usually paid for similar work done for the General Assembly.

Mr. KELSO said, he had been told by a practical printer that the printing for the Convention could be done at least twenty per cent cheaper than the public printing had heretofore been done for the State. Whenever the matter should come to be decided upon he was for giving it to the lowest bidder, compelling him to give good security for the performance of the contract.

Mr. BASCOM desired to say, that he was entirely opposed to letting out the printing by contract. The public printing as it was now executed was done for as reasonable a price as it could be with justice to the printer. The men who offered to do it at twenty per cent below the present prices would have to employ "rats," as they were technically denominated. He would say for one that he was not there to act a parsimonious part towards any of his fellow working men. He had no intention of grinding the printers down to the lowest cent. He desired that some good Democrat should have the printing at fair prices; and as the Democrats had the majority in the Convention, the question of printing could easily be decided. He was ready to take the responsibility of electing printers at the usual rates of remuneration for printing. They might just as well let out the offices of Secretary and Doorkeeper to the lowest bidder, as to let out the printing. He thought that the Convention had a right to choose their own Printer; and that they should give him fair and reasonable wages for his services. He would move the following amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Carroll, viz: "That the Convention tomorrow at 10 A. M. proceed to the election of a Printer. The President ruled the motion out of order, and it was withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER moved, to amend by striking out all after the resolving clause, and inserting "that a committee be raised to inquire on what terms the printing can be done, and that until that be done the Secretary shall get the printing done at the prices now paid the State Printer. The amendment was decided to be out of order.

Pending the question, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, Oct. 9th, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment. The Chair announced the following as the committee on Rules, provided for in the resolution of Mr. Borden, adopted on Monday the 7th, viz:

From the 12th Judicial Circuit—Mr. BORDEN.
 From the 1st Judicial Circuit—Mr. PETTIT.
 From the 2d Judicial Circuit—Mr. READ of C.
 From the 3d Judicial Circuit—Mr. DUNN of J.
 From the 4th Judicial Circuit—Mr. HALL.
 From the 5th Judicial Circuit—Mr. WALLACE.
 From the 6th Judicial Circuit—Mr. SMILEY.
 From the 7th Judicial Circuit—Mr. STEVENSON.
 From the 8th Judicial Circuit—Mr. BIDDLE.
 From the 9th Judicial Circuit—Mr. WHEELER.
 From the 10th Judicial Circuit—Mr. DOBSON.
 From the 11th Judicial Circuit—Mr. March.
 From the 13th Judicial Circuit—Mr. Smith of R.

And the Chair also announced the committee of three provided for on the resolution of Mr. Rariden, on the subject of procuring a more suitable room for the sittings of this Convention, to consist of the following gentlemen, to-wit:—

MESSRS. RARIDEN, KELSO, and MORRISON of Marion.

The Chair submitted to the Convention, the following communication from CHARLES H. TEST, Secretary of State, to-wit:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
 Indianapolis, Oct. 8, 1850. }

HON. GEO. W. CARR

President of the Convention—

Herewith is transmitted, unopened, the proceedings and depositions of the contested election for Delegate to the Convention from the County of Union, wherein James Osborn contests the right of Benjamin F. Brookbank to a seat in said Convention.

Respectfully,
 CHARLES H. TEST,
 Secretary of State.

Which letter and the proceedings and depositions therein referred to, were, upon the motion of Mr. Edmonston, laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT announced the unfinished business to be the resolution offered by the gentleman from Carroll, on the subject of printing.

Mr. KELSO desired to enquire if a claim had been put in by any one as being entitled to do the printing for the Convention. If there had been no such claim advanced of which cognizance could be taken by the Convention, he was for having an investigation made by a committee. Perhaps some of the delegates of this Convention, he said, could inform the Convention in regard to this matter.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, he supposed it was known to the members of the Convention generally, that he was the State Printer. And being under contract as State Printer he of course considered himself bound to be prepared to do the printing for the Convention, and if he were not prepared to do it he had no doubt he would be liable to the penalty which the law imposed for the non-fulfilment of his contract. He could make no discrimination between printing ordered by the Convention, and that ordered by the Legislature, or by any State officer under the law. He held himself, therefore, in readiness to do the printing of the Convention as well as any other printing which might be necessary to be done on behalf of the State. He desired to know whether he was in error in supposing that the public printer had rights and privileges under his contract while under an obligation on his part to perform all the duty incumbent upon a public printer. That was the question.—He wished to know whether an officer of the State, commissioned by the Governor, could be turned out of office by this Convention, or be deprived of any of the privileges appurtenant to his office. It appeared to him that they might as well undertake to turn him out of the seat which he held there as a member of the Convention, though in this he might be mistaken.

Having made this explanation, he desired also to ask the favor of the Convention, to be excused from voting upon any question relating to this matter. He did not want to give a vote upon any question in which he might be supposed to have any personal interest. If he were to vote he should of course give his vote with the same degree of conscientiousness as if he were voting upon any other question. He had thought it right to say this much, in regard to the proposition now before them, and he would not detain the Convention further than to repeat his desire to be excused from voting.

Mr. KELSO said, he was satisfied that this resolution ought to pass, and an investigation be made. It was due to those who claim the right to perform this duty, that the investigation should be made. There would be, of course, a difference of opinion about that right, and the opinion he held in regard to it, might be erroneous, and it was the more necessary therefore, that an investigation should be made. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. BORDEN said, he had no objection to the first part of the resolution, that a Committee be appointed to enquire into the matter.— But the second part of the resolution, which directed the Secretary to employ a printer ad interim, appeared to him to be of more doubtful propriety under the circumstances. If they were to direct the Secretary to employ a printer, and, as had been assumed, there was already a printer legally authorized to do the work, by official appointment, then the employment of another printer by the Secretary, would be in effect a violation of the contract with the person appointed as State printer. It appeared to him, therefore, that it would be better to strike out the latter part of the resolution.

Mr. DOBSON said, he did not see the necessity of delegating the power to the Secretary of the Convention, to employ a printer. They had made no order for the printing of anything, as yet.

He hoped that so much of the resolution as authorized him to employ a printer, would be stricken out.

Mr. KELSO said, he was of the opinion that that part of the resolution ought to remain. It might be that the Secretary would not be required to perform the duty of employing a printer, but at the same time it was known to every member that there was work required to be done at this very moment. Printed lists of the names of members for taking the yeas and nays were required.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that he was informed by the Secretary that he was in want of such lists now.

Mr. KILGORE suggested, that the resolution should be modified so as to direct this work to be done at the office of the State Printer. His charges were regulated by law, whereas if the Secretary were directed to make a contract with some other printer they had, of course, no means of knowing upon what terms such contract could be made. He would, therefore, move to amend the amendment according to the suggestion he had made, that the work be done at the office of the State Printer.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the resolution provides that the work shall be done at the rate of charge fixed by law.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, let it done nevertheless at the office of the State Printer.

Mr. CLARKE, of Tippecanoe, said : he had very little objection to the resolution as it stood, but he thought it would be proper that the Convention should relieve the Secretary from responsibility, in regard to this matter. If those gentlemen who were appointed State Printers were entitled to do this work, the Convention had no right to take it from them. He did not wish to decide, however, that they were entitled to it ; but he was willing to vote that they should do this printing in order to relieve the Secretary from that which he would find to be a somewhat delicate task. Besides if those Gentlemen were entitled to do the work they would have a legal claim to compensation for it. He was unwilling to disturb any vested right.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware—and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KILGORE proposed to amend the resolution so as to authorize the Secretary to get the Printing done where it could be done the cheapest and the most expeditiously.

Mr. MORRISON said, that being a regular bred printer, and knowing that this matter had to go among his immediate constituents, he desired to say a few words in relation to it.

He was opposed to beginning a system of economy by reducing the wages of the mechanic who had to perform this labor, in order that they might show themselves the peculiar guardians of the Treasury of the people. He intended no demagoguism in relation to this matter, but he thought the laborer worthy of his hire, and he believed that no man who was at all conversant with the business of printing would say that the prices paid to the State Printer were too high; and he trusted that the Convention would not condescend to so small a business as to undertake to make a profit out of a few day's printing. Indeed, he thought it probable that there would be little or no printing done until the committee had time to report. He would not undertake to determine whether this Convention had the inherent right to elect its own printer, or whether the law creating a State Printer was obligatory upon the Convention. Under this view of the question he should most decidedly vote against striking out any part of the resolution.

Mr. KELSO said, that, according to his understanding, when a man made a bargain with his eyes open, his labor was worth just exactly what he undertook to do the work for, and he understood further that a printer was no better than any other mechanic, and that mechanics were no better than other people, except when they behave themselves better. It was probable that there would not be occasion for $10 worth of printing previous to the report of the committee being made, and he thought it would be quite as well to let the Secretary make his own bargain, and get the work done where he could get it done the soonest. He was for paying a fair price, and whoever was acquainted with his course ever since he had had the honor of occupying a seat in the Legislature of the State, in this end of the Capitol and in the other, knew that he would be the last man to undertake to undervalue the services of any man, or to reduce his pay below what those services were worth. He was, however, for admitting a fair competition, and for allowing printers to make their propositions, and for permitting the Secretary to get the work done on fair terms.

Mr. NAVE said, there were several points that ought to be understood before voting upon the proposition. They ought to be informed as to the legal rights of the present contractors for the public printing. It was important, before taking any step towards the employment of a printer, to ascertain whether the existing contract for the public printing was binding upon the Convention. If it was binding upon the Convention, the Public Printer would be entitled to be paid for the work, and if this was the case he took the ground that the Convention had no right to employ any other person for a single hour than the State Printer. Until this question was settled therefore, in reference to whether the contract was binding upon the Convention, it appeared to him that no other printer ought to be employed, because if they proceeded to appoint an individual to do the printing of the Convention before that question was settled, it might prove to be a violation of the contract made by the State with the State Printer, and he would have a right to institute a suit at law for the purpose of maintaining his legal rights, and thus the State would be involved unnecessarily in litigation. He was not for interfering with the rights of individuals, either those now employed by the State or any others, and it was perfectly immaterial to him who were the persons who had been elected State Printers. This was a question which required investigation, and no man ought to be employed to print for the Convention until the question was settled.

Mr. STEELE said, he should vote for the motion to strike out, and he desired to assign the reason for that vote. He was perhaps differently situated from almost every other member of the Convention: he had come here for the sole purpose of serving the country and had no predilection for any particular interest; he had no particular plan or scheme to advance. That being the position he occupied, he would go with his friend from Delaware, in the proposition he had made to give the printing of the Convention to the printer who would perform the work in the best manner and upon the most favorable terms. It was true that the honorable gentleman on his left (Mr. Chapman) had been appointed by the Legislature to do the State Printing; but he did not conceive that the Legislature in electing him to that office could have contemplated the performance of the work of the Convention, because in the act authorizing the call of the Convention, it was provided that the Convention should be entitled to elect their own officers. This was a Convention of the people, and it was their duty to act with a view to economy. He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. BASCOM said, he rose not to discuss the legality of the claim of the State Printer to do the printing of the Convention, but to combat in the outset, as he should do at all times, the system of letting out the public printing by contract. Gentlemen who had so great a regard for economy, were, in such a case as this, embarrassing themselves unnecessarily. He was in favor of economy, but not at the expense of the laboring community. In giving the work to the lowest bidder, they were but putting money into the hands of the contractors, at the expense of those who performed the labor. If gentlemen would turn to the House Journals they would find letters from practical printers of this State—and among others from Mr. Defrees—who appeared to be anxious to get a nibble at this printing, in relation to this subject. [Mr. Bascom read a brief abstract from one of the letters referred to.]

When they undertook to cut down the prices and to throw the printing into the market to be hawked about and given to the lowest bidder, they were acting in direct contravention of the interest of the laborer, and depriving him of a reasonable remuneration for his labor.

If the interests of any portion of the community are to be preferred to those of another, the interest of the laborer should be preferred. Wherever the contract system had been tried it had been found to be prejudicial to the laborer as well as to the Government, and the work had invariably been done in a very inferior manner—the material was necessarily inferior, and the work inferior. There was no man who understood anything about printing who would rise and say that too high a price was paid for the printing for the State. It appeared to him that it was not the proper policy to undertake to get the work done more cheaply than the Public Printer would do it. He was entirely opposed to the proposition.

Mr. KILGORE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. STEELE enquired if the resolution was still open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT replied that it was open to amendment.

Mr. STEELE said, he would renew the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware. He desired that the work should be done where it could be done the cheapest and most expeditiously. His understanding of the act authorizing the call of a Convention, was that it gave them power to elect all their officers. That being the case he was inclined to act directly in accordance with it.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he hoped the gentleman would withdraw the amendment for the present. He could renew his proposition if he thought proper after the report of the committee was made.

Mr. STEELE said, he had no objection to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER said, he was sorry that the amendment was withdrawn. He had himself proposed a Buncombe resolution yesterday and unfortunately the chair had decided that it was out of order for irrelevancy or incongruity, and consequently his resolution did not appear in print. He rose now merely to express his sorrow that it was not published, so that it might go to his constituents.

The question being taken on the resolution of the gentleman from Carroll, it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention the following communication from His Excellency, GOVERNOR WRIGHT:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, }
October 9, 1850. }

HON. GEO. W. CARR—

President of the Convention:

In pursuance of the act of the General Assembly, approved January 18, 1850, providing for the call of a Convention, I have appointed and commissioned HARVEY FOWLER, Stenographer, to report the debates of said Convention.

I have the honor to be,

Yours, most respectfully,
JOSEPH A. WRIGHT.

The communication having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. GREGG offered the following preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, It is desirable to complete the work delegated to us by the people with as little delay as possible, and with an eye to the strictest economy consistent with the honor of this body, and the interest of those whom we represent. Therefore,

Resolved, That we deem it inexpedient to report and publish the debates of this Convention at the expense of the State, and to this end we respectfully decline the services of a Stenographer tendered us by the Legislature.

Mr. OWEN offered the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Jefferson:

Resolved, That in compliance with the provisions of the act, providing for a call of the Convention of the people of the State of Indiana, to revise, amend, and alter the Constitution of said State, which directs the appointment of a competent Stenographer by the Governor of the State, to report their debates, the appointment made by the Governor, of Harvey Fowler, of Washington City, for that purpose, be, and the same is hereby, recognized and approved.

Resolved, That the certificate of the President of the Convention, as provided in said act, be from time to time issued to the said Harvey Fowler for his remuneration, which shall be at the usual rate of compensation for reporting the debates in the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that under the 32d rule of the House the proposition of the gentleman from Posey could not be moved as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. OWEN said he would withdraw the substitute, then, for the present, until the resolution of the gentleman was disposed of, and he thought there would be but little difficulty or hesitation about disposing of it by voting it down.

Mr. GREGG said, that, in offering this resolution, he begged leave to assure the Convention it was not intended for Buncombe, but was the result of a sincere and thorough conviction of duty. He believed that its adoption would tend greatly to facilitate our public labors here, while it would be the means of a very considerable saving of expense, and without working any, the least detriment to the public interest, or discredit to this body, either individually or collectively.

In the organization of this Convention, we have elected certain officers, whose duty it will be to keep a regular journal of all our proceedings from day to day; and this journal, together with that organic law which may result from our deliberations will necessarily have to be published and circulated at the public expense, that our constituents may know what we, their public servants, have been doing here; and if our works speak well of us, it is all that is necessary—further than this, I am unwilling to tax the public treasury for their enlightenment.

It is an old but true adage, that a man should cut his coat according to his cloth. It is equally true that a prudent man should always live within his income. This certainly holds good in matters of domestic economy, and why not apply it to public affairs? Now, the Legislature has undertaken to give us the whole cloth from which to cut the garment. They have shown us the size of our pile, and it becomes us as prudent husbandmen to graduate our expenses accordingly. They have appropriated the sum of $40,000 to pay the whole expenses of this Convention, including the pay of a Stenographer, the necessary printing and stationery—and doubtless they conceived this to be a most munificent and bountiful appropriation, altogether adequate to the ends to be accomplished. Now let us see how far this appropriation will carry us, under the most prudent and economical system that we can adopt. The daily expenses of this Convention will be over $500, exclusive of printing and stationery. This in sixty days will amount to $30,000. The mileage of members will be about $4,000 more, making $34,000—thus leaving but $6,000 of the appropriation to pay for printing the journal of our proceedings, a large edition of the constitution in pamphlet form, for circulation among the people, together with such other printing as may be deemed necessary in the progress of our labors; a sum which I fear will be found altogether inadequate to foot the bill.

Now this calculation, you will perceive, is based upon the supposition that our session will last but sixty days. And, although it is the opinion of many gentlemen, both in and out of this Convention, that we shall not be able to get through in less than three or four months, still, I undertake to say, that if we address ourselves to the work as we should do, without wasting too much of our time in making unnecessary speeches for home consumption, we shall be able to complete our labors in less than sixty days to the entire satisfaction of the people and to the credit of ourselves, and on the score of expense, within the appropriation made by the Legislature. But, sir, let us adopt the course plainly indicated by the Legislature. Let us admit upon this floor the Stenographer so kindly provided for us by his Excellency, the Governor, with the understanding that all the speeches made here are to be reported at large, and published in a book, for the benefit of our constituents, and the enlightenment of posterity—and I will not attempt to set bounds to the duration of our session, nor limit to its expense. I profess to be a practical printer, and know something about what it costs. And let me assure you that more than one half of the appropriation will be absorbed in paying for the publication of our speeches, and other documents, and we shall have little left to pay our current expenses here, without asking for a further appropriation, which I am unwilling to do.

But the matter of expense is not the only objection to be considered. I take it that the employment of one single Stenographer on this floor (and that is all the law provides for) would necessarily tend to protract the session—a result I most sincerely deprecate, as my private business demands my attention elsewhere, and I doubt not it is equally so with many others.

And do you ask, why the employment of a Stenographer to report our debates should necessarily prolong the session? You know, Mr. President, and so do every one of us, that mankind are naturally garrulous, fond of controversial debate and litigation—and give them a loose rein, and a proper incentive to action, and they will talk forever. There is a wonderful proclivity in the human mind for immortality; an innate grasping after fame and notoriety; an insatiable longing for a name to live when we are dead. Such is the phantom we are now following; and to most of us it will prove as evanescent and unsubstantial, as the "baseless fabric of a vision." But still we follow it—blindly pursue it, through all the devious windings of this mortal career.

Now here are at least 150 of us, all deeply imbued with the same perhaps laudable ambition to do something to immortalize our names, and transmit them to posterity; and it is quite natural that we should seek to avail ourselves of this golden opportunity, now offered us to do so. And how is this desirable end to be attained? Why sir, each of us have got to set our wits to work, to concoct a speech—no matter on what subject, nor how irrelevant it may be to the subject matter under consideration, so it be of sufficient length, and full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. These speeches must necessarily be reported by the Stenographer, and by him written out for the Press, for no one else but he can do it. And these speeches, I take it, will occupy about one day of the session to each, provided they be of sufficient length to occupy one hour to one hour and a quarter in their delivery. I say we will not be able to get through more than one of these set speeches per day, for that will be as much as any one Stenographer can possibly manage to take down and write out, and do justice to himself, unless he has a constitution like a steam locomotive, that can go ahead forever and never tire. Like the rest of us, he must have his hours of relaxation from labor, of recreation, and of rest, or he will soon wear out—and then we will be thrown back upon our own resources, and have to do our own reporting. The necessary consequence then would be, that we must accommodate our movements to his convenience, or some of our most brilliant efforts would be wholly lost to the world—a calamity! aye, a public calamity, not to be thought of for a moment.

Thus you perceive that to make but one set speech round on the general average, would require a session of 150 days, or about six months. And I fear, sir, that many of us will not be satisfied with any thing short of the round dozen. Why sir, I am told that in the Kentucky Convention where they employed a Stenographer to report, one member alone made 199 speeches, and would have made the even 200 if the previous question had not been sprung upon him. This was going it strong, but if some of the members on this floor, hold out to the end as they have begun, I would match them, for wind and bottom, against the best blood and chivalry of Kentucky.

Now sir, assuming that we make, during the session, the number of speeches indicated. These, when printed in ordinary sized type, will cover an area of at least 2,400 pages, making three volumes of 800 pages. The journal of our proceedings will make another volume of about the same magnitude. And thus, by following the promptings of our own personal vanity, will the names, the profound cogitations, and the wonderful works of this august assembly be forever embalmed in four huge octavos, perhaps beautifully embossed and bound in calf. And these precious documents will be distributed throughout the land, to adorn the shelves of our public and private libraries, or transmitted to our great grand children, as invaluable memorials of ancestral greatness; thus evidencing to posterity, that such distinguished bipeds as you and I were once, and that we left our mark. But at what a sacrifice of time and money will this be effected. I pray you to count the cost before you embark in it.

But seriously, Mr. President, we need not be under the least apprehension, that our constituents will be kept in ignorance of our doings, should we dispense with the services of a Stenographer, as contemplated by the resolution under consideration. Our doors are always open—our deliberations public. Many of the leading papers of the State have their reporters on the ground; and I doubt not they will be able to keep their readers well posted up in all matters essential for them to know. And should any of us be so fortunate as to make a speech worthy of being read and remembered beyond the current hour, doubt not for a moment that these ever wakeful sentinels on the watch-tower will be fully able, and altogether willing to do us justice. Away then, with your Stenography, and give us the unsubsidized jottings of the public press. Your scientific touches may do well enough for another meridian, where they can spend eight whole months in a single Omnibus, at $8 per day, eating canvass-back ducks, and drinking hock and sherry. It may answer well enough for such laggards in legislation, as are found about Washington, who can talk through a whole session of unparalleled prolixity without ever losing sight of the starting point. But for a working men's Convention, such as this, who receive but $3 per day, and live on common doings, and have no particular inducement to prolong their stay beyond the successful accomplishment of the work committed to their hands, I say, to such an unpretending body as this, the old fashioned mode of reporting will answer their purpose quite well enough, while it will cost their constituents less.

Sir, I once took a lesson in practical stenography, that will last me as long as I live. I remember it the more vividly, because it was at the time the source of much chagrin and mortification to me. And it is this circumstance, perhaps, which has tinged my mind with a degree of acerbity towards the whole profession. It was on the occasion of Mr. Clay's visit to this city, in the summer of '42. Among the many thousands who came up hither on that occasion to see and to hear the great Commoner, were several of the leading whig editors of the State, your humble servant among the number, for I was at that time the editor of the Political Beacon, published at Lawrenceburg. We came here not only to see and hear Mr. Clay, but to report his speech as far as we were able, for the benefit of our readers. The meeting was held in a beautiful grove adjoining the city. Near the speaker's stand was a large table prepared for the express accommodation of the gentlemen of the Press who might be present, and several of us availed ourselves of the proffered courtesy. I soon found myself comfortably seated in an easy chair, with paper before me and pencil in hand, ready to commence the important work of reporting Mr. Clay's speech, while around me were several other gentlemen of the tripod in a like state of preparation. Well sir, just before Mr. Clay commenced his speech, a stranger, whose name I never knew, pressing his way through the crowd, came to me and introduced himself as a regular bred Stenographer, saying that he had reported for many years in Washington City, for the National Intelligencer and Congressional Globe, and that he had often reported after Mr. Clay, in Congress. The gentleman's appearance, it is true, was not very prepossessing. But as I had no time to stand upon ceremony, or examine credentials of character, and being withal rather an indifferent reporter, I gladly availed myself of his kind offer to take my place and report the speech for me. And so giving up my comfortable seat, I took my place behind him, and for two mortal hours I stood upon my feet, protecting him from the external pressure of the crowd, lest they should jostle his arm, and thereby cause him to lose a single word or thought of the great speech. But I felt this privation as nothing, when I reflected upon the great advantage it would give me over the rest of my cotemporaries of the Press. Through the kindly aid of this gentleman I should now be enabled to spread before my readers Mr. Clay's speech in extenso, while they would be able to give but a mere skeleton of it, a birds-eye view of some of the leading thoughts. And big with this reflection, I stood at least three inches taller in my shoes, and looking down upon my co-editors with a sort of patronizing air, as much as to say, "I am sorry for you gentlemen, but it can't be helped. I have got the vantage ground of you this time, and no mistake." Well sir, the speech being concluded, I took my gentleman by the arm, and marched him down in town, and, after some refreshments at my expense, repaired to my room to re-write out the speech. After laboring over it for more than an hour, he finally succeeded in writing out about one page of foolscap; and on glancing my eye over what he had written, I found it but a miserable caricature of the able and eloquent address I had just been listening to. But consoling myself with the reflection that I should be able to draw upon the resources of my own memory, to dress it up and make it passable, I urged him to continue his labors. He soon, however, complained of lassitude, and of being nervous, in consequence of the heat and labors of the day, and proposed to adjourn to some restaurant or coffee house, to recruit his strength, by the application of proper stimulants. I remonstrated with him, and proffered to go myself and bring him whatever he might want. But my remonstrances were all in vain. Go he must, and go he did—but he never returned;—and that was the last I saw of him.

Now, was ever editorial wight in such a fix, before or since? There I was, with Mr. Clay's great speech before me, reported at large, by a practical Stenographer of large experience—partially written out, but the great body of it still in hieroglyphics. Of what avail would it be to me or my readers? Neither the one nor the other would ever be any the wiser for it. It was to me all Pottawattamie, and I doubt whether the genius of Napoleon himself, would have been able to decipher it, and render it into intelligible English.

The next morning I heard of my worthy friend in one of the lowest doggeries of this city, gloriously drunk, and hallooing, "hurra for Van Buren!" Being deeply mortified at the result, and knowing that I should be bored to death by my brother editors, who enjoyed the joke amazingly, I ordered my horse and buggy, and left the town, fully determined in my own mind never again to employ a Stenographer to report a speech for me.

And here, Mr. President, allow me once for all, to disclaim any other than the kindest feelings towards the worthy gentleman, who has been selected to report the debates of this convention. I would not for the world, for I could not, insinuate any thing derogatory to his character or qualifications. I doubt not he is a gentleman of eminent qualifications in the line of his profession; and that he is able to render entire satisfaction to any deliberative body, where talents of a high order, joined to a gentlemanly deportment are properly appreciated. But somehow or other a burnt child will dread the fire, and the wary bird will shun the Fowler's net.

I hope, Mr. President, that the few desultory remarks I have had the honor to submit on this occasion, may not be construed into a desire on my part to cover up or hide from my constituents, anything that I may do or say as a member of this Convention. No sir, I have nothing to conceal from them, and in all I may do or say, will endeavor to act as though they were present, and looking in upon me from every quarter of this lobby, scrutinizing my conduct with a jealous eye. The place I occupy here was wholly unsought by me. My election to a seat in this body was the unsolicited and free-will offering of as noble and generous a constituency as any gentleman on this floor has the honor to represent. And as such I esteem it the more highly; and so long as I sustain my present relation to them, will endeavor, in all things, to prove myself worthy of their generous confidence.

And what better evidence need be adduced of their noble generosity, their political magnanimity, and as some would doubtless infer, of their sterling good sense, than is to be found in the presence on this floor of my worthy democratic colleague, now sitting on my right, representing as he does a county claiming a popular political majority of at least 500 against that party to which he belongs? And why did they send him here? Why, casting aside all political considerations, and overleaping all the great barriers of party, why did they endorse him up hither, clothed with the high and responsible functions of a representative delegate? It was, sir, because they had great and important interests to subserve, reaching far beyond and above all the mere political and party conflicts of the day. It was that they believed he would look to the subservance of those interests with the broad and comprehensive eye of the patriot, and not with the narrow and contracted vision of the mere partizan. It was that they believed, in his representative character, he would rise superior to the behests of party, and frown indignantly upon every attempt that might be made to sow the seeds of political dissension in our midst, come from what quarter it may. Sincerely do I trust, that neither he nor I, political antipodes though we are, may never for a moment lose sight of that duty which we owe to our common constituents, or forfeit that confidence which they have reposed in us, by lending ourselves here to the accomplishment of political or party ends, either present or prospective.

Now sir, I do not pretend to know what course my honorable colleague has taken in those informal meetings of the party, out of doors, alluded to on yesterday, by the honorable gentleman from Tippecanoe; (Mr. Pettit.)

nor have I any desire to penetrate the secrets of that inexorable inquisition, where the budding hopes of some of the young democracy were cut down so ruthlessly and withered in an hour. I do not know what agency, if any, my democratic colleague had in these ultra movements of the party; but this I do know, that his constituents and mine will be gratified to learn that the weight of his influence was thrown against the attempt made to rear the standard of political intolerance in the organization of this body, by which the few whigs upon this floor were virtually disfranchised in the election of our officers.

And why was it necessary for the Democratic party to meet in secret conclave, in their star-chamber court below, to determine who should or who should not be candidates before this Convention? The whigs did not pretend to offer a single candidate for any office whatever, not even as a hewer of wood and drawer of water. They were perfectly willing to concede to you all the offices of honor and profit which it was within the power of this Convention to bestow. Nor were they found acting with any degree of concert, as between the various rival candidates of the democratic party who were pressing their claims upon our consideration. Then why drive this unpretending minority into a position of political antagonism? Why treat them as though they had no political rights upon this floor, but were mere interlopers, having no interest in common with our democratic friends in the election of good and faithful officers? Why, I say, thus needlessly arouse their just indignation and resentment, by forcing them into a position where they must necessarily feel and acknowledge their political inferiority?—Nay, that is not exactly what I mean—but their numerical weakness on this floor, for that is all the inferiority they are willing to admit. The whigs of this body, sir, claim to be your equal in intelligence—your equal in patriotism—your equal in a high and holy regard for the best interests and honor of our common country—your equal in all the essential elements that go to make up the man. In short, sir, your equal in all and everything but mere brute force. And let me admonish you, that before this Convention closes, you may have occasion to learn that they are fully your equal in a proper vindication of their rights upon this floor.

Sir, I came up to this Convention, determined to forget, as far as it was possible for me to forget, that I was a whig. I came here determined to forget that I ever had been a warm political partizan—and to know nothing save the great and paramount interests of the people about which we have assembled here to deliberate. But, Sir, when I am met at the very threshold with the rallying cry of democracy—when the bibroch of party is sounded in my ear.

(Mr. BORDEN rose to a question of order.

He desired to know whether the gentleman's remarks were in order? Cries of go on, go on—hear him out.

Mr. GREGG continuing. Doubtless the gentleman from Allen is becoming a little restive. But I hope he will bear it patiently. When I was interrupted, Mr. President, I was going on to remark, that when I see gentlemen rising on this floor, and hear them talk about forming democratic constitutions—when I hear them talking about employing none but democratic printers, at democratic prices—which being interpreted means 25 per cent, above what it is intrinsically worth! in short, sir, when I see honorable gentlemen who have filled high places in the councils of the nation, rising upon this floor, and with unblushing effrontery proposing to take the election of our officers from this body where it rightfully belongs, and commit it to the arbitrament of an irresponsible cabal out of doors, wholly unknown to our laws and political institutions; when I see such things as these enacted in the broad light of day, I confess, sir, that it stirs the old Adam in me—it warms up my whig blood, as of yore—and I feel somewhat as did Fitz James when he encountered Rhoderick Dhu and his clan upon the mountain. But I trust that the effervescence of party, which has manifested itself here, will soon subside, and we shall hear no more of it. And although some of the old Hunkers of the party may endeavor to keep the political cauldron boiling, still I hope there may be found among the young democracy a sufficiency of genuine salt to preserve this body from political putrescence.

Before leaving this subject, allow me to make a single suggestion to our democratic friends, and that is this. They should by all means hold another grand pow-wow in the court room below, in order to settle the important matter as to who should wear the collar, and take precedence in the order of business here. Upon this subject there seems to be a very active rivalry going on, especially between the gentleman from Tippecanoe, on my left, and the gentleman from Allen, on my right. It is therefore highly important, if not necessary to the future harmony of this body, that this question should be settled at once. Let us know upon which of these rival candidates for honors present and prospective, the mantle of greatness is to fall. (Mr. Pettit remarked that he surrendered to the gentleman from Allen.) Well, sir, I think he has somewhat the advantage of you, if the frequency of his appearance upon the stage is to form any criterion by which we are to judge. In the light of the great future to which we are looking, he will doubtless have the advantage of you.—For when the antiquarian shall take down from its shelf the ponderous volume containing the debates of this Convention, and begin to turn over its ample leaves in search of the great man of this body who figured most conspicuously, his eye will incontinently fall upon the gentleman from Allen, as not occupying a prominent position in the foreground of the picture, but throughout the whole, from Alpha to Omega, from the beginning to the end, as being singularly conspicuous in all things.

But, to return to the question under consideration. I believe, sir, the adoption of the resolution I have had the honor to present, will meet with the entire concurrence, not only of my immediate constituents, but of the whole people throughout the State. I honestly believe, sir, with me, they will regard the employment of a Stenographer here as a useless expenditure of money, and the publication of the debates of the Convention in an embodied form, as the consummation of human folly. Neither the one nor the other is at all necessary. For, as I before remarked, the newspaper press of our State, having able and efficient reporters here, will be competent to the task of keeping the people posted up in regard to our doings, and I, for one, am willing to trust my reputation in their hands.

But it may be argued that the publication of the debates of this Convention will be found eminently useful for future reference, in order to explain the meaning of certain provisions of the Constitution, which, to some, may appear dark and ambiguous. Why, sir, I would as soon think of looking into the Koran of Mahomet, or of consulting the sublime and beautiful vision of John in the Isle of Patmos, for an elucidation of the meaning of the ten commandments—a code of morals that adapts itself to the capacity of every mind, and fully explains itself without the aid of a commentator. And so I trust it will be with the instrument that may emanate from our hands. Not that I would compare the frail works of man with the perfect works of the great Law Giver of the Universe. Not that I would be so irreverent as to compare the crude and imperfect Constitution which we may deliver to the people, for their future governance, with that divine and perfect Constitution delivered to Moses amid the thunderings of Mount Sinai. No, sir, this would be like bringing down the full orb'd glories of the sun to the common level and lustre of a farthing rush-light. But, sir, speaking relatively, after the manner of men, and comparing things temporal with temporal things, may I not hope that our Constitution, when fully digested, will be found so perfectly free from all ambiguity as to require none of those factitious aids to render it intelligible? May I not hope we shall all labor, with one mind and one spirit, to make it, as it should be, so perfectly plain, and simple, and consistent, in all its parts, that any child may understand it? And he who thinks it will be otherwise pays but a poor compliment to the common sense understanding of this intelligent body.

Mr. KELSO said, he believed the proposition now before the Convention was to dispense with the services of a Stenographer.—He was inclined to the opinion, however, that the gentleman from Jefferson, was more in jest than in earnest in offering this resolution. He could not believe that a man of his well known ability, and sound understanding, and experience, would, for a moment, desire to dispense with the services of such an officer in this body; and more especially, after the appointment had been directed by law, and made in conformity with that law. He apprehended that the gentleman wanted, merely to get a sly hit at the democratic members in this hall, and sought, rather ingeniously, to whip the democrats over the shoulders of the Stenographer. He did not blame the gentleman, for he had certainly been treated somewhat badly, he would confess, in the matter of the appointment of officers of the Convention—not having been allowed to have the selection of a single officer. On that ground, he was willing to accord to the gentleman, all the satisfaction that he could derive from administering to the democrats a sound castigation.—He confessed they deserved every word of denunciation that the gentleman had bestowed upon them.

Now, said Mr. Kelso, a word in regard to the Stenographer. I am in favor of retaining that officer. I believe that we ought to have his services, and I regard it as a wise provision of the Legislature, that his appointment was provided for. The gentleman seems to think that by retaining that officer, we shall prolong the session of this Convention. I want that officer to remain here for the very opposite purpose; for I think the gentleman from Jefferson will want very few of such cayenne pepper speeches published as the one he has just made, and this, perhaps, will be the last one he will make, for I have no doubt that when he sees what he has said, published, he will be rather ashamed of it. He has done more in that speech to stir up party feeling, and set the cauldron, that he speaks of, boiling, than any other gentleman in this Convention. He may have done it, however, without feeling the force of what he was saying. Now, my opinion is that when we know that our speeches are to go forth to the public, we will be a little more careful what sort of speeches we make.

I insist on retaining this officer for a further reason. It is provided by law that the instrument which is to be the work of our hands is to go forth to the people; and that they are to pass their judgment upon it, to decide whether they will accept or reject it. It is necessary, therefore, that the people should be advised from day to day of our proceedings and of all the arguments advanced here, for or against such propositions as may be presented to us; so that they may, when the constitution is pre-mented to them, act understandingly in regard to it. This is, in my opinion, a sufficient reason why this officer should be retained, and I hope that at an early day, provision will be made for the publication of our debates in the newspapers of this city, that they may go forth and be read by the people; so that by the time we shall have finished our work, they may be as well advised concerning it, as we are ourselves. I want him retained for that purpose, and I will risk the publication of what little I have to say, and let it go for what it may be worth.

I hope this resolution will be voted down. I would move to lay it on the table, were it not that I despise such a motion, besides I want to hear all that may be said on either side.

Mr. STEVENSON said, that the Convention had a specified duty to perform, which was to form a Constitution, and they were not called on to regulate such matters as the pay of their officers, or their own pay; that was done by the Legislature. The Legislature had also authorized the employment of a Stenographer, that Stenographer was not an officer of this body, but an officer of the Legislature, or more properly speaking, an officer of the State.—He had been appointed under authority of an act of the Legislature, and this Convention had no right to interfere in any way with that appointment. If it was right that the State should incur this expense, the Legislature alone was responsible. He did not believe that the Convention had any right whatever, to fix the amount of compensation to be given to this officer. That was a matter for the Legislature to determine. They having provided that a Stenographer should be appointed for the purpose of giving the debates of the Convention to the country; it was their act and they alone were responsible, and not the Convention. This being the case, he for one was willing that the people, should have the benefit of the services of this officer; but he contended that it was the duty of the Legislature to pay him, and he had no doubt they would do so with liberality.

The Stenographer was here by virtue of his appointment and they could not get rid of him except by expulsion. He trusted he would discharge his duties faithfully.

Mr. OWEN said, he should not have added a word to what had been said by the gentleman from Putnam, were it not that an argument had been made against retaining the Stenographer who had been appointed, on the ground of expense. The gentleman from Putnam had very properly stated that the Stenographer was a commissioned officer of the State, and that he was here in virtue of his commission. He conceived they would have as good a right to dismiss the Secretary of State or any other officer, authorized by law, and commissioned by the Governor, as they would to dismiss this officer.

In regard to the question of economy, perhaps it would be well for them to look, as practical men ought to look, at the actual cost which this work was likely to entail upon them. Now, continued Mr. Owen, a Convention to amend the Constitution of the State does not meet every year, nor once in ten or twenty years. A generation has passed away since our present Constitution was made. A generation will, in all human probability, pass away before we make another. Without going into a close examination of the actual cost of reporting our debates at the rate that is paid for reporting Congressional debates, let us suppose that the debates of this Convention will be about equal in length to the debates of the New York State Convention;—the expense of reporting will be, according to my calculation, about twenty-five hundred dollars. Now, this sum, it will be recollected, is to be distributed over a space of at least twenty-five years—for it is not to be supposed that another Convention is to be held and another Constitution framed within a less time than twenty-five years. This will give an expense of one hundred dollars a year, to be borne by the people of this State, for a work which is to remain throughout all time, and to be read at each man's hearthstone, and in every dwelling within the State. Now, let us see how much each inhabitant of the State will have to pay for this work. There are about a million of inhabitants in this State at present, and suppose that at the end of twenty-five years there should be only the same number. One hundred dollars a year divided among a million will give to each individual the one-hundredth part of a cent. To a family of ten persons it would be the tenth part of a cent. I certainly do not think that the inhabitants of the State will regard this expense as very burthensome in view of the advantage they will derive from the proposed publication.

Besides, by paying this expense we obtain a copy-right of the book, which we may sell if we choose; and I am not sure but the copy-right will sell for one-half the price that we shall pay for the work; then, instead of the hundredth part of a cent, it will be but the two-hundredth part of a cent for each individual.

Now, I am not in the habit of recommending a thing because others have done it; on the contrary, I generally have some good reason for what I propose. But I know of no State in which a Convention has recently been held, which has not provided for the reporting of their debates; and I doubt very much whether any publication will be read with more interest by the people of this State than the reports of our debates. It cannot be denied that they will be eminently useful, as a commentary upon the Constitution which we are about to form. The debates which occurred in the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, are always read with much interest. I will not say that ours will be as valuable as those debates are, but they will be as important to Indiana as those are to the United States. I repeat, sir, that I think, in the first place, we have no right to reverse the decision of the Legislature in regard to this matter; and in the second place, if we have the right we ought not to exercise it.

Mr. PETTIT moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN then offered the resolutions which he had before proposed as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Gregg.)

Mr. KELSO said, he doubted whether they had a right to fix the compensation of the Stenographer; he would therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out so much as related to the price to be paid for reporting, so as to leave it to the Legislature to fix the price.

Mr. PETTIT said, he would suggest that a difficulty would arise in case the proposition of the gentleman should prevail. How would the President of the Convention know how much to certify for, unless the price should be determined?

Mr. KELSO. I move, sir, to strike out the second resolution. I do not think it can be shown that we have the power or the right to fix the amount of remuneration which the Stenographer shall receive.

Mr. DOBSON said, that, from the reading of the act, he supposed the Governor had the power to make a contract for the reporting; if so, he could see no necessity for the resolution.

Mr. OWEN said, that there was no contract, as he was informed, and it was quite evident that there must necessarily be some resolution or specification in regard to the compensation to be paid to the Stenographer, for it was necessary that he should be paid from time to time as he did the work. If the gentleman considered the compensation here proposed to be too large, he would be glad to hear some proposition from him in regard to it. He would have been glad if the Legislature had determined the amount of compensation, and relieved the Convention from all responsibility upon that point; but as they had not done so, if the work was to be executed, it was certainly incumbent on the Convention to make the necessary arrangement for the payment. As to their power to do so, he thought there could be no doubt. A committee had been raised yesterday upon the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) to negotiate for hiring a more commodious hall for the use of the Convention; and if such a hall should be procured, he supposed they would have a right to pay for it under the general powers conferred upon them. If it could, without practical inconvenience, be left to the Legislature, he should have no objection; but he did not think it would be a proper treatment of this officer, who had come a very considerable distance to discharge the duties he had been appointed to perform, if the question of his compensation should be delayed. He supposed the proper plan would be, for the President of the Convention to inform himself what was the price usually paid for reporting by Messrs. Blair & Rives, and Gales & Seaton, of Washington City. So far as his own recollection went, he believed that the compensation of a stenographer for taking notes and writing out his report and preparing it for the printer, was five dollars per column of two thousand words.

Mr. REED of Clark said, he believed it would be agreed upon all hands that some action in reference to the compensation of the Stenographer should be taken, and he thought the better way would be to let the question be determined by a committee. He would move, therefore, that the subject be referred to a select committee of seven.

Mr. KELSO withdrew his motion to amend, and

The question being taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Clark, it was agreed to, and

The resolution was referred to a select committee.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to take from the table the resolution of Mr. Gregg on the subject of the Stenographer, and refer the same to the select committee of seven;

Which was decided in the affirmative.

Whereupon the Chair announced the committee of seven on the resolution of Mr. Gregg in regard to a Stenographer, and the resolution of Mr. Owen on the same subject, to consist of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. Owen, Morrison of Washington, Maguire, Pepper of Ohio, Nofsinger, Clark of Tippecanoe, and Niles.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, it was Ordered, That three hundred copies of the Constitution of the State of Indiana be printed for the use of the Convention.

PUBLICATION OF THE AUTHORIZED REPORTS.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the President, and authorized to make such arrangements with the publishers of newspapers in this city, as will insure a correct daily published report of the proceedings of this Convention, for the use of the members and for distribution among the people.

Mr. KELSO said, he was in favor of the proposition in the main; but before binding themselves by any contract for the publication of the proceedings, he hoped some provision would be made with regard to postage. It occurred to him that the committee appointed under this resolution could go to the Post Master of the city and make the necessary arrangements about the postage, so as to relieve members of the Convention from the burthen of paying the postage from their own pockets. Unless some such arrangement could be made he considered it idle to talk about taking the papers. He offered the following amendment:

"And that said committee ascertain and report to this Convention what arrangement can be made with the Post Master in this city concerning the postage and the payment thereof, on such letters, papers, documents, &c., as may be sent to and from the officers and members of this Convention, during its session."

Mr. MORRISON of Marion accepted the amendment.

Mr. SIMS said, he would like to know by what authority the Convention could take newspapers in this way and send them off through the mail by the cart-load, and throw the expense upon the Treasury. He would like to know what amount of light these newspapers would throw out. Not one citizen of the State, out of ten, would ever see one of them. He contended that the operation of the resolution would be partial. He knew that the Legislature, some years ago, were in the habit of buying and distributing newspapers, but the practice, he believed, had gone down on account of the objection that he had stated. But where, he would ask, was the law to authorize this thing on the part of the Convention? He knew that the Legislature had authorized the members of the Convention to receive three dollars per day, as a compensation for their attendance, but there was no more authority of law for the purchase of newspapers for the Convention, than there was for the payment of the expense of boarding. He knew that the people where he resided were opposed to this practice, not that they were wanting at all in liberality or a disposition to patronize the press, but because they were opposed to all useless expenditures; because they knew that the State was in debt, and because they believed that, like every honest man, the government should pay all its just debts. For these reasons they had instructed him to employ his influence toward clipping off and cutting down every useless public expenditure, and he was determined to go for this principle heart and hand.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion, said that as the mover of the resolution, he felt it incumbent upon him to answer the objections which had been urged by the gentleman from Clinton, (Mr. Sims.) This resolution had been advised by many gentlemen of the Convention. The common argument in favor of it was this: Every morning, and from day to day, members would like to review what might be passing before them; and by the proposed arrangement each morning they could see precisely what had been done on the preceding day. There was an additional argument. It was provided by law that the deliberations of this Convention, in the shape of a new Constitution, should be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection, and if the Convention should go on and publish nothing but the volume of debates, not one man in a hundred, when the time for its submission should come, would be at all informed with regard to what had been done in connection with the changes and modifications of the existing Constitution; whilst, on the other hand, if they were to take such newspapers as would print the daily reports of their proceedings they would go abroad amongst the people as their work progressed, and give them opportunities by memorial or petition to make such suggestions with reference to changes and general principles as would aid them in their work, and materially diminish their responsibility. But there was another matter: Should they refuse to purchase these papers, the publishers could not afford to incur the expense of publishing the lengthy daily reports, or even an intelligible condensation of them. But past experience assured them that they would publish the reports at as cheap a rate as possible. The Legislature for twenty years past had taken this course, and the people had sent men back here, year after year, who had constantly advocated this course. He believed, also, the people every where in the State were in favor of it, except it might be, as the gentleman had affirmed, in the county of Clinton. He considered that this was not, by any means, an expensive mode of giving correct intelligence to the people. He was aware that there was no law to authorize the specific appropriation, only that there was a general fund appropriated to be used for defraying whatsoever expense might be necessarily incurred. He held the doctrine that this Convention was sovereign; that they were the people, and had a right to do, in a reasonable manner, everything that the people could do, were they here in our places. He held that the Convention had the right to call upon the Treasurer for an amount sufficient to defray every necessary expense of the body, even if it should require a hundred thousand dollars beyond the amount appropriated by the Legislature. He could not think that so intelligent a gentleman as the Delegate from Clinton would be willing to light his candle and put it under a bushel. He thought that every act here should be as open as the day to all the people.

Mr. SIMS said, he did not wish to be understood as opposed to taking newspapers, but he meant to say that because we get three dollars a day, which enables us to eat and drink well while here, that is no reason why we should tax the people for our newspapers or our postage. He was not for taking money out of the treasury in this manner. He thought it might be better applied to the payment of the public debt, which he hoped would be soon in such a course of payment that we could see a clear sky. But even if we were out of debt, had we not occasion to foster common schools? He considered that the economy of the government should be as rigid as that of a man on his farm. He had a resolution which he desired to offer by way of amendment.

The PRESIDENT said, the gentleman's amendment could not now be entertained.

Mr. BASCOM said, he came here pledged to send back all the papers and documents which he could procure. He had on his desk the names of two hundred of his constituents, who were desirous of knowing what the Convention were doing. They were men who took an interest in the subject which brought the Convention together, and they wanted information of their doings. It would be impossible for him to send to all these persons at his own expense. He concurred with the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) in the opinion that there was no portion of the people in this State, except, perhaps, the county of Clinton, who would not be happy to receive the reports of the proceedings of the Convention. He had never heard, in his part of the State, any complaints about receiving too many papers; on the contrary, the complaint, as far as he had heard, was, that they did not get enough—that their members were delinquent. The people were willing that the money of the public treasury should be used for this purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Scott, said, it occurred to him that the post-master of the city must act according to law, and that he could make no such arrangement as was proposed. As to taking the papers, he was perfectly willing to do that, and he could say that the people from his part of the State would be glad to receive them. According to the law, the postage must be pre-paid, unless sent from the publishers' office. But from the terms of the resolution, it seemed to him that the Convention was to make some arrangement for the payment of the postage, and his object was to enquire whether it was intended that this postage should be paid out of the treasury or out of the pockets of members? or whether the papers were to be sent from the publishers' office?

Mr. READ, of Clark, said, he was in favor of the resolution, and had always been in favor of taking and distributing papers; but there had been a change in the post-office laws, interfering with this matter, so that it had come to be almost wholly neglected by the General Assembly, for the reason that members had to send round, every day, a new list to the publishers' office. He would be in favor of any arrangement by which members could send their packages directly to the post-office.

Mr. KENT suggested, that the difficulty might be obviated, in part, by requiring one of the publishing establishments to distribute all the papers.

Mr. READ, of Clark, said, that the post-master had refused to receive them in that way.

Mr. KENT. He did not refuse last winter.

Mr. MORRISON, of Marion, asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Convention, to add to his resolution the following clause:

And that said committee report to this Convention the result of their arrangements, for approval or rejection.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Whereupon the Chair appointed the following gentlemen said committee:

Messrs. Morrison, of Marion, Kent, Colfax, Owen, Gregg, Bascom, and Pettit.

On motion of Mr. EDMONSTON,

The Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALL offered for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That no part of the present Constitution of Indiana, nor any proposed amendment thereto, shall be referred to any committee other than the committee of the whole, until the same has been considered and approved by the Convention as proper to be inserted in and made a part of the new or amended Constitution.

Mr. HALL said, his object in offering this resolution was to arrive at some point in relation to the manner in which business should come before the Convention. A committee had been appointed on Monday for the purpose of preparing rules for the government of the body, and it was thought to be a part of the duty of that committee to recommend the number and character of the standing committees. He proposed this resolution as part of the ground upon which that committee might predicate their action. There were several propositions before the Convention in relation to the manner in which business should be brought up for consideration, and there were objections to all of them. He had taken this resolution from the proceedings of a late convention of an adjoining State, which he thought to be better than any other which he could select. It proposed that all general principles which came up to be considered in the formation of a constitution, should be considered in committee of the whole before they were referred to any subordinate committee—it being more especially the business of subordinate committees to arrange the details of business than to settle general principles; for example, there was the proposition that all officers shall be elected by the people. Could any man think of inserting that proposition in the Constitution before a decision was had upon it in committee of the whole Convention? But after discussion and decision by the whole Convention, it would be proper to refer the proposition to the appropriate sub-committee, to prepare the matter in detail. Much time would be gained in this way, according to his opinion; because, after the sense of the Convention in committee of the whole had been taken, the sub-committee would have only to shape the proposition and prepare it for a place in the Constitution. But if the proposition should be first referred to a sub-committee, it must afterwards come before the Convention in the same manner as an original proposition. He had taken his resolution from the proceedings of the convention of a sister State, and it struck him with force, as a better proposition to facilitate business than any which had yet been proposed here. The Convention could not have the benefit of the discussions in the sub-committees, and the time taken up in these discussions would be comparatively lost. But in committee of the whole, each member would have a chance to express his opinion, and to give his vote, upon every proposition; and after that the several propositions would be ready for the action of sub-committees, which would be merely to perfect them in all their details.

Mr. READ of Clarke proposed a resolution similar to that offered by Mr. READ of Monroe.

He then said, he was satisfied that whatever time might be occupied in preliminary discussions in committee of the whole, would be lost to the Convention. He preferred that the standing committee should be appointed, and the Constitution blocked out by them, and reported to the Convention, and then to let these reports, as they come in, be referred for consideration to the committee of the whole. So far as legislative matters were concerned, a committee of the whole had scarcely been known in this Hall the last five years; not two hours of all that time had been occupied here in committee of the whole. It had been found that after debate for several days upon a proposition in committee of the whole, it would have to return to the House, and there the very same proceedings would have to be gone over again. If it were not that the Constitution provides that all questions embracing matter connected with revenue shall be considered in committee of the whole, he could almost say that that committee was useless in legislation, and he appealed to the experience of old members of the Legislature to say, whether the reference of subjects to the committee of the whole, did not always induce a great waste of time.

Mr. EDMONSTON observed, that with regard to the amendment, he would take occasion to say, that he saw no necessity for another resolution upon the subject embraced in it, since the committee on rules were bound to report the number of standing committees. Then why encumber the journal with such proceedings? He desired to say one word with regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall.) He could see no necessity for referring the consideration of every question which might be presented to the committee of the whole. The chief objection against this course, to his mind, was that the action of the body in committee of the whole, was never journalized. He supposed when any gentleman introduced a proposition, it ought to be journalized, that it might be laid before his constituents. For this reason he should oppose the resolution. He supposed that the committee on rules would report the number, and designate the character of the standing committees; upon which the Convention would afterwards take its own action, and adopt, reject, or amend the proposition.

Mr. READ of Clark said, that the only difference between the committee which he proposed to constitute, and the committee on rules was, that the members of the latter committee were not taken equally from the various parts of the State, whereas the members of the committee which he proposed would be.

Mr. BORDEN, (in his seat.) They are taken one from each judicial circuit.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he would suggest that a resolution similar, but involving rather more than the amendment of the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Read,) was offered the other day, by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read.) It seemed to his mind not strictly in order to have two propositions of the same nature pending at the same time. The proceeding might be in order; he did not pretend to say that it was not, nor had he any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Clark; but the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, being a little more complete, he should give it the preference, and intended to support it.

Mr. READ of Clarke said, he was aware of the pendency of the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe; but apprehending that the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall) might succeed, and so supersede the former proposition, he had thrown in his amendment.

Mr. DOBSON said, the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) had offered a proposition which had been adopted, and under which there had been created a committee on rules. The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) had offered a proposition for a separate committee to designate the standing committees. It had been thought by some, that the committee under the resolution of the gentleman from Allen, was charged not only with the matter of reporting rules for the government of the Convention, but that they should also report the number, and designate the character of the standing committees. Herein, as it occurred to him, consisted all the difficulty. For himself, he supposed that both the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, and the proposition of the gentleman from Clark, were entirely unnecessary. He was gratified, however, to see them brought forward, because the action of the Convention upon them would settle this difficulty. He was gratified, also, to see the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson, though he was opposed to it, because he desired the whole of the proceedings here to be open to all the people, which could not be the case with proceedings in committee of the whole. Besides, if they were to go into committee of the whole, with everything, they would have no occasion for standing committees. He thought that every subject should first be considered by the standing committees; and then the proposition which they might report could either at once be considered and disposed of by the committee, or referred to a committee of the whole. This was a question which should be determined, one way or the other, soon. Being himself named upon the committee on rules, he would be glad to have an expression of the sense of the Convention upon it, in order that they might know how to act.

Mr. NAVE said, he thought it could scarcely be possible that gentlemen were ready to determine that no proposition should be referred to any subordinate committee. If they were to decide this question in the affirmative, they might as well neglect altogether, the appointment of standing committees. If he understood the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson, nothing was to be voted upon or reported by any committee, except what the Convention had first considered the Convention was to reserve to itself the power to decide upon every thing first, as in committee of the whole. If this course were to be taken, it was his opinion that the business of the session could not be terminated in three months. He considered it the better course to refer distinct propositions to separate committees, and after they report, let the Convention act upon their report, as in committee of the whole. He would like to know who first discovered the wisdom of this proposition, depriving the Convention of the liberty of sending anything to a committee. It must have originated in the State of Kentucky, where everything was built up and sustained by stump speaking. He conceived the proposition to be contrary to the genius of our institutions—antagonistic to the free spirit of investigation; he was, therefore opposed to it. He was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Clark, while he made no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe. It made little difference with him, which should be adopted; but, since the former was under consideration, he would like to see it adopted.

The PRESIDENT declared the proposition of the gentleman from Clark to be out of order, under the thirty-second rule for the government of the last House of Representatives.

Mr. BORDEN explained, that the resolution authorizing the appointment of the committee on rules, was in substance the same which he had read from the proceedings and debates of the Kentucky Convention. He derived the intimation that had been made, out of doors, that the committee on rules was to swallow up all other committees, and said that nothing of the kind had been thought of. He said he understood the duty of that committee to be to compile something like rules for the government of the proceedings of this body, but he perceived that the committee on rules in the Kentucky Convention, had reported the number of the standing committees. For himself, he would prefer that this matter should be referred to some other committee, especially since the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, had been offered. This committee would naturally feel a delicacy about reporting the number of standing committees, without special instruction. He referred briefly to the immediate necessity for the formation of various standing committees. The proposition of the gentleman from Gibson, was, first to refer the consideration of every proposition to the committee of the whole; another gentleman had proposed the appointment of a committee to be composed of seventeen or eighteen members, and that all matters should be referred to it. Another gentleman's position was, that there should be no more than three standing committees.

Mr. PETTIT interposing, said, that the gentleman was mistaken. He did not propose that there should be no more than three committees.

Mr. BORDEN (continuing) asked why it was considered improper for him to propose to raise more. There are, said he, a number of conservative gentlemen here, who like the present Constitution—who think it a very good one, and who would like to make it the groundwork of action, by taking it up in articles or sections, and proceeding to improve and amend, adopt or reject them. These gentlemen might very properly go into committee of the whole, with their work. But there was another portion of the Convention, he said, with whom he himself stood, who did not think the old Constitution a very good one. A majority of the Convention had come up here from constituents who demanded important changes in that instrument; and this was the reason why they thought the whole subject ought to be divided, and appropriately distributed amongst several standing committees, with the view of introducing such amendments as might be deemed necessary. He desired the most mature deliberation on every division of the subject; first, before the standing committees, and then in committee of the whole Convention. He relied upon the standing committee for the most important duties. He recollected a gentleman speaking to him of the Louisiana Constitutional Convention, which met several years ago, in April, at a small town somewhere in the interior of the State; and in the warm weather, rather than occupy their convention room, they were in the habit of going out by committees into the adjoining groves to hold their consultations. Reclining there in the shade, they would talk over the business before them; and, he was assured by the gentleman, that some of the best features of the Louisiana Constitution were proposed and drawn up in this way; and that when, afterwards, they spent several months in the city of New Orleans, where they were attended by Stenographers, with ready nipped pens, every thing was done for Buncombe, and nothing could be affected for the people, worthy of the occasion that brought them together.

Mr. HALL said, that he was one of the committee appointed by the Chair, to aid in drafting the rules; but he was totally unacquainted with the reasons which induced the appointment of that committee. He confessed that he neither understood the resolution under which the committee was appointed, nor the explanation just given. The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) seemed to think that under the resolution which he (Mr. H.) had offered, they were to dispense with everything like the labor of standing committees. The gentleman was wholly mistaken; such was not the object, nor the language of the resolution. The object was that no subject should be referred to any standing committee, until after it had been discussed in committee of the whole. It was certainly contemplated by all, that there should be several sub-committees appointed by the Convention, for the purpose of taking the various matters into consideration, after they should have been considered in committee of the whole. He was not wedded to any particular proposition, but this discussion had only the more convinced him of the necessity of the rule he had suggested. He gave an instance of its operation: the people of the county of Gibson, whom he represented here, had been in convention upon the subject of amendments to the Constitution, and one of their resolutions of instruction to him was, to recommend the proposition that the Legislature should prohibit lotteries in this State; now, this proposition, under the rule he had suggested, would be referred, first, to the committee of the whole, and after their action in reference to the principle, it would be referred next to the appropriate sub-committee to arrange the principle in its details. But according to the rule preferred by the gentleman from Hendricks, the proposition would be first referred to a sub-committee—that committee would report upon it to the Convention. After that the Convention would have to decide upon the principle, and if the principle were rejected in whole or in part, the work of the sub-committee would be useless. According to his notion, it would be a waste of time to take this course. It was his proposition, that the opinion of the Convention upon every principle should be first had in committee of the whole, in order that the standing committees might know distinctly how to act.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, he could not see the force of the reasoning of the gentleman from Gibson. Was it not the gentleman's proposition, first, that every subject should be referred to the committee of the whole Convention, then to be returned to the Convention, and then to be referred again to the standing committees?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that a subject may or may not be referred. The Secretary, if the gentleman desires it, will read the resolution.

The resolution was accordingly read by the Secretary.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, that if he understood the meaning of words, the resolution proposed that, after the discussion of a proposition in committee of the whole, it was to be returned to the Convention, and then referred to a standing committee. He was unable to make anything else out of it; and this he considered would be occupying more time than there was any necessity for. He preferred the practice by which the Convention might refer any part of the Constitution to a standing committee, and instruct them particularly in relation to it; for when a committee received instructions from the Convention it became their duty to act according to those instructions.

This, it seemed to his mind, was the more correct, and it certainly was the shortest way of doing business. By the new rule proposed, the same ground might have to be fought over as many as two or three times upon every proposition.

Mr. PETTIT said, he did not intend to delay the business of the Convention, and he would detain them but a very few minutes. Before he sat down he thought he should move to lay the subject upon the table, with the view of taking up the resolution offered by him on yesterday and the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read,) with reference to the transaction of business. He doubted not that the design of the gentleman from Gibson was a good one. If it had been his design that no subject should be reported upon until after the principle had been discussed and decided by the Convention, that would have certainly been proper and correct enough. But the gentleman seemed to think the Convention should raise a committee of the whole, in which every proposition should be first considered. That would not be parliamentary. The committee of the whole could have no control over the standing committees of the Convention. The gentleman's doctrine was, that no subordinate committee should report upon any subject until it should first be discussed in Convention. That sub-committees should be organized upon various subjects and then instructed by the Convention as to the matter upon which they were to report. He took for illustration, the proposition that there should be no Grand Juries in the State. That would be a subject to be reported upon by the legislative committee. He would suppose this subject to be appropriately referred, and then that the question should come up for discussion in the Convention upon a proposition to instruct the committee upon that subject by resolution. It was not requisite that a subject should go to the committee of the whole and be there discussed and reported to the Convention and there take a tangent route and go to a sub-committee to be considered and reported again to the House? The committees were bound to act in conformity with such instructions; and after their reports were made to the Convention every subject would still be open to discussion and amendment; or they might be discussed and amended in committee of the whole, and after that go again into the Convention for final action. But he wished not to detain the Convention; he desired to have the committees organized, and then it could be determined whether it should require two-thirds or a majority vote to adopt a resolution of instruction. A majority, he supposed, should always carry a question. But this resolution was out of order at this time, entirely; he should, therefore, without intending any disrespect to the gentleman introducing it, presently move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table. He should make this motion for the purpose of taking up the resolutions to which he had before referred and which had been temporarily laid on the table on yesterday. It would be recollected that one of these propositions proposed three standing committees; it did not preclude a large number. Every one knew from the structure of this government that it was expedient to have at least three standing committees—one upon the legislative department, one upon the executive department, and another upon the judiciary. He cared not how many more there might be. This course was first suggested by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and he thought there was great propriety in adopting this resolution, for, as it had been already suggested by that gentleman, as the business of the Convention progresses they would become acquainted with the habits of each other, and know better the aptness and fitness of men for places upon these committees; and they would also know better how many and what kind of committees they would require. And for the purpose of taking up this resolution, to which he had referred, he moved to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Gibson on the table.

Mr. PETTIT then moved to take from the table the resolution submitted by him on yesterday, with the pending amendments, on the subject of committees; which motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. READ of Monroe, observed, that in offering his resolution on yesterday, it was with no desire to be appointed chairman of the select committee proposed to be raised. On the contrary it was his intention, had his motion prevailed, to have had himself excused from acting in that capacity. They had secured their organization on yesterday, and had raised a committee on rules and regulations; and as the next thing to be done was to arrange some definite plan for the business of the convention, he had brought forward the resolution that had been so liberally commented upon. He had found upon examining the proceedings of conventions held in other states, that a similar course of procedure had been adopted.

The first thing that had been done in the convention held in New York, in 1821, was to appoint a committee on rules and regulations—the committee being instructed simply to report rules and regulations for the government of the convention. This was the mode also adopted in the convention held in the same state in 1846. Another committee was then raised to determine upon the best plan for revising the constitution. This mode of proceeding was also adopted in the Ohio convention. It appeared to him, therefore, that the first business after they had secured their organization and appointed a committee to draft rules for their government, was to organize a committee who should report some definite plan of action. In the convention of 1821, this committee was regarded as the most important committee that could be raised, and its members were composed of the ablest men in the convention. It should be borne in mind, that in adopting a plan of that kind, they were determining the character and extent of the business itself, and therefore, the sooner such committee was constituted, the more speedily they would be enabled to enter upon the business they had to transact.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that he was in favor of adopting the amendment. It was true, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe had said, that three committees, having supervision respectively, of the judicial, legislative, and executive departments of the state government must be appointed, but it was equally certain that more than that number would be required. They would require a committee on the Militia, one on Education, one on Currencies and Banking, and one on Corporations other than Banking. While acting upon the subject, therefore, he thought it would be better to pass a resolution providing for the organization of all the committees that were necessary. It appeared to him that a committee thus empowered to raise the standing committees could bring in their report easily in the course of two or three days.

While up he would suggest to his friend from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) for whose judgment he had very great respect, that if any proposition at all similar to his were adopted, it would exclude a very laudable custom that was prevalent in all conventions, one which as far as he was concerned, he could not consent to yield or dispense with; he referred to the practice of voting resolutions of enquiry. It struck him very forcibly that there would be found to be ten subjects that were worthy of investigation to one that was worthy of adoption. To present resolutions of enquiry upon particular subjects was always customary. He would not oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson, if he had made provision that no resolution should go before any of the standing committees, until it had first been submitted to the Convention. This would prevent any delegate from going to a committee with a proposition he desired to offer, so that it would come before the convention either as a resolution of enquiry or instruction. With a modification to that effect, he would be content with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PETTIT said, that in order to test the matter, he would move that the amendment offered to his resolution be laid on the table.

The question being taken upon the motion to lay the amendment on the table, it was decided in the negative.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. FOSTER remarked, that a great deal had been said that day with reference to the committee of the whole; and a great deal also, that had no connection whatever with the business before them. Some fifteen or twenty years ago, said Mr. F., when Foote's celebrated resolution was under discussion in committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives of the United States, it was remarked in the course of the debate, that they might talk about anything in God's earth, above the earth, or under the earth—they might talk of anything in the animal, vegetable, or mineral kingdom, but that nothing should be said with respect to the question under consideration. (Laughter.) It was altogether out of order to touch upon the subject before the House. This remark, he added, had been practicably exemplified in this convention on yesterday and to-day. He was considerably amazed at the observations which had been made from the path of strict argument yesterday and to-day—they reminded him very forcibly of an anecdote of a methodist preacher, a man of considerable talent, who upon one occasion, while he was traveling in Kentucky, stopped in a certain neighborhood and delivered a sermon to the white residents. In the evening he agreed to visit a meeting of negroes, where some celebrated negro preachers were to hold forth. He went there without any intention of preaching, but the negroes found out who he was and insisted that he should give them an exhortation. He accordingly took the stand and occupied the evening in a manner very acceptable to himself, for he considered that he had preached a very excellent sermon. After he had sat down, one of the negro preachers arose and made the remark "dat de white brudder had talked away a long time in a blundering manner, after a fashion." He would not undertake to charge gentlemen with talking in a "blundering manner," but he would say that they had been talking "after a fashion."

The gentleman from Tippecanoe was desirous of raising three committees; his colleague from Monroe wished to raise only one. The amendment offered by his colleague met with his (Mr. F's.) hearty concurrence. If, as was proposed, three mammoth committees were to be appointed there would be a general scramble for the office of Chairman of those committees, and, he was inclined to think that there was talent enough in the Convention to authorize the appointment of a larger number of committees and consequently a more general and equitable division of the offices. He could not but think that the best mode of expediting the business of the Convention, was, to adopt the amendment offered by his colleague.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois (Mr. Edmonston) on the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) to fill the blank with the words "one from each Congressional District;" and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit.)

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to amend the amendment by filling the blank with the words, "two from each Congressional District."

The question was taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Maguire) and it was agreed to.

The question then being upon the amendment as amended.

It was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. KILGORE offered the following resolution.

WHEREAS, In the opinion of this Convention, the people of Indiana, under their present wholesome Constitution, have obtained an enviable position amongst the States of this Union, and now enjoy a degree of prosperity and general happiness, of which they may well be proud: AND WHEREAS, we are admonished by the elements by which we are surrounded, and which are apparent in our midst, that there is great danger in an effort to amend the organic law, of deranging our present wholesome system, or supplanting it by one less acceptable to the people of the State; Therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend to the people of the State the present Constitution, as proposed by their Delegates in A. D. 1816, and adopted by the people. And that this Convention now adjourn sine die.

A motion being made by Mr. WOLFE to lay the resolution on the table; the ayes and noes were demanded by two members.

Those who voted in the affirmative were

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, of Jackson, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, of Hamilton, Clark, of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis, of Madison, Davis, of Parke, Davis, of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn, of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham, of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall, of Wabash. Kendall, of Warren, Kindley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller, of Clinton, Miller, of Gibson, Miller, of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison, of Marion, Morrison, of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper, of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read, of Clark, Read, of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith, of Ripely, Smith, of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Trembley, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President.—126.

Those who voted in the negative were

Messrs. Borden, Bowers, Chenowith, Frisbie, Kelso, Kilgore, Prather, Steele, Tannehill Todd, and Watts.—11.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

DOORKEEPER.

Mr. SHERROD moved, that the Assistant Doorkeepers be appointed by the President.

The PRESIDENT expressed the wish that he might be relieved from the responsibility of making these appointments—considering that their appointment was a power legitimately vested in the doorkeeper.

Mr. PETTIT inquired, if the Doorkeeper, under the present rules of the House, did not possess the power of appointing his Assistants.

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

The resolution of the gentleman from Orange (Mr. Sherrod) was then withdrawn.

Mr. HALL offered the following resolutions:

1st. That Judges and all other officers, shall be elected by the people.

2. That corporations shall be created under a general law, individual liability, to the extent of stock, shall be imposed. The issue of bills of credit for general circulation shall be prohibited. No banking privileges shall be granted except to a State Bank, and a limited number of Branches, properly restricted.

3. That special legislation shall be prohibited. No act shall embrace more than one subject—and that shall be expressed in the title. Upon the final passage of every bill in either House, the “yeas” and “nays” shall be entered upon the journals, and no act of the General Assembly shall be in force until after its publication in print and distribution among the people.

4. That the Legislature shall be prohibited from granting divorces, and from establishing lotteries.

5. That the Legislature shall be prohibited from borrowing money upon the faith of the State, without the consent of the people expressed through the ballot-box.

6. That the Legislature shall meet biennially, but may be convened by the governor in cases of emergency.

7. That all fines aforesaid, for any breach of the penal law, shall be applied to the support of common schools.

8. That all distinction between proceedings in courts of law and equity, shall be abolished; as also all distinction between different kinds of action.

9. That the House of Representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and the Senate shall be composed of fifty members: Provided, the members in either House may be diminished by Legislative enactment.

10. That all elections by the General Assembly or either branch thereof, shall be determined by a plurality of the votes given; which resolution was laid on the table by consent.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KELSO offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is hereby made the duty of the President of this Convention to appoint messengers to this Convention, of whom the duty of one shall be to see and attend to mailing all letters, papers, documents, &c., designed for the mails, from the members and officers of this body, and to receive and deliver to said members and officers, all matters sent them through the post office during the sitting of this Convention; which was referred, on motion of Mr. Clark, of Tippecanoe, to the committee on rules.

Mr. SHOUP offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the State Librarian be directed to procure three copies each of the following works: The Debates or Journals of the New York, Kentucky, and Wisconsin Conventions; also three copies of the American Constitution, and when procured, to be placed and kept at the Clerk's desk in this Hall, for the use of the members of this Convention; which was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Edmonston, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning 9 o'clock.

THURSDAY, Oct. 10, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

A communication was laid before the Convention by the President, announcing the acceptance by the Clergymen of the city of the invitation of the Convention to open the same each day with prayer, and announcing the order in which they would attend.

The Chair announced the select committee provided for in the resolution of Mr. Read, of Monroe, adopted on yesterday, on the subject of committees to consist of the following gentlemen:

Mr. READ, of Monroe,

1st. Congressional District—Messrs. OWEN and EDMONSTON;

2d. Congressional District—Messrs. KENT and CARR, of Jackson;

3d. Congressional District—Messrs. BERRY and HOLMAN;

4th. Congressional District—Messrs. NEWMAN and TREMBLY;

5th. Congressional District—Messrs. TANNEHILL and MAGUIRE;

6th. Congressional District—Mr. TERRY;

7th. Congressional District—Messrs. COOKERLY and DAVIS, of Parke;

8th. Congressional District—Messrs. BRYANT and PETTIT;

9th. Congressional District—Messrs. NILES and MILLER, of Fulton;

10th. Congressional District—Messrs. KILGORE and MAY.

The Chair also announced the select committee as provided in the resolution of Mr. Milroy, on the subject of Printing, adopted on yesterday:

Messrs. MILROY, DUNN of Perry, BIDDLE, LOGAN, THORNTON, LOCKHART, and RARIDEN.

Mr. PETTIT gave notice that he would on Monday next, or on some subsequent day, introduce a resolution instructing the committee on the Judiciary to bring in a provision abolishing the Grand Jury system, and substituting public examinations in its place.

Mr. PETTIT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall not be in order to move any resolution of instructions to any standing committee requiring any provisions of the Constitution to be brought in, without first giving at least two days previous notice of such resolution.

(Objection was made by several gentlemen.)

Mr. PETTIT said, he thought that a moment's reflection would convince gentlemen of the propriety of such a resolution. If such a rule of proceeding were adopted, when an important proposition was to be introduced, it would not be sprung upon them, at a time when there would be no opportunity for reflection, but gentlemen would be apprised in advance, and be enabled to prepare themselves for opposition to it, if it were such a proposition as they disapproved. It did not prohibit resolutions of enquiry from being moved at any time, but applied only to resolutions positively instructing a committee to report certain provisions, altering the Constitution. He thought that its operation would have a wholesome effect and that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, he agreed with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that notice ought to be given of all propositions of that character though he was of the opinion that two days was longer than was necessary, and with the permission of the gentleman, he would move to strike out two, and insert one.

Mr. PETTIT said, that if any considerable portion of the Convention desired to change the time to one day, he would consent.

Mr. EDMONSTON suggested that his object in making the motion was to save time.

Mr. DOBSON said, that this resolution seemed to be anticipating the action of the committee which had been announced this morning, and of which the gentleman from Monroe was chairman, whose special business it was to announce the committees.

Mr. PETTIT said, if the gentleman will allow me, I will move the reference of this resolution to the committee on rules.

The question being put upon this motion it was agreed to.

Mr. DOBSON. The gentleman has anticipated me. I rose for the purpose of moving its reference to the committee of which the gentleman from Monroe is chairman. I now move that it be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT stated that the resolution had been referred, and that the gentleman's motion was not now in order.

Mr. PETTIT. The resolution contemplates the establishment of a rule, and I think, therefore, that it ought to go to the committee on rules.

Mr. DOBSON. I supposed, Mr. President, that I was in possession of the floor when the gentleman made his motion.

Mr. PETTIT. I am certainly willing to accommodate the gentleman by giving him an opportunity to introduce his motion.

Mr. DOBSON. I move, then, sir, to refer the resolution to the committee that I have indicated.

The question being put, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PETTIT then moved its reference to a committee on rules; which motion prevailed.

The resolution was referred to the committee on rules.

Mr. MILLER, of Clinton, gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, or some subsequent day, submit a resolution instructing the committee on legislation to bring in a provision prohibiting the emigration of negroes into this State.

Mr. COOKERLY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Auditor of State be instructed to correspond with the clerks of the circuit court in each county, and ascertain, as far as possible, the cost of each session of the court in their respective counties, inclusive of the cost of the grand jury and associate judges, and report the same to this Convention as soon as practicable.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the resolution as follows:

Strike out from the resolving clause and insert,

That the Secretary of State be requested to address a circular to the clerks of the several circuit courts in this State, and request from each of them immediate answers to the following questions, viz:

1st. How many terms of the Circuit Court and Court of Common Pleas were held in your county during the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine, and how many days did each court sit, naming each court and term separately.

2d. How many Chancery cases and civil and criminal causes were on the docket at each term? How many were tried or otherwise disposed of? How many were appealed from Justices of the Peace, and how many brought up on certiorari?

3d. On Probate Courts—How many terms of Probate Court were held in your county in the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine, and how many days did it sit at each term?

4th. What was the number of causes on the Probate Docket during the year, and what the total number of Probate wills, and grants of letters testamentary, administrative, and guardianship? What the number of settlements made on the estates of decedents, minors, idiots and lunatics? And what the number of petitions for the sale of real estate by executors, administrators and guardians during the same period?

That the Auditor of State be requested to address a circular letter to each of the County Auditors in this State, and request them to answer the following interrogatories, to wit:

1st. What was the amount allowed during the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine, in your county, to the Probate and Associate Judges, and of the County Treasury, as compensation for their services?

2d. What amount was allowed and chargeable to the county for fees or compensation during said year in said county to Grand and Traverse Jurors, Sheriff, Bailiff, and other officers, for services rendered in the courts of said county?

That on receiving the information above requested, the Secretary and Auditor of State be requested to condense and arrange the same, and report it to this Convention in a convenient tabular form, adding thereto the whole number of polls and free white male persons over twenty-one years of age, in separate columns in each county, according to the returns made by the county Auditor in June of this year.

Which amendment was accepted by Mr. Cookerly.

Mr. BORDEN moved to lay the resolution as amended upon the table, which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. READ of Clark offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the Supreme Court be requested to inform this Convention of the number of causes upon the calendar for argument at each of the terms of said court during the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine, the number of such causes whose issue bears date in the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine, and the number whose issue bears date in each preceding year.

Which resolution was adopted by consent.

Mr. OWEN gave notice that he would on this day week, or some subsequent day, introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property, to their sole use and disposal, and that laws shall be passed, securing to them equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterward, by purchase, gift, devise or descent, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the plan of business and standing committees be instructed to enquire into the expediency of reporting the following plan for organizing the standing committees of this Convention, viz.:

1st. The rights and privileges of the citizens and inhabitants of this State.

2d. The appointment, election, tenure of office, and compensation of the members of the General Assembly.

3d. The powers and duties of the General Assembly, except as to the public debt, and matters otherwise referred.

4th. The election, tenure of office, compensation, power and duties of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor.

5th. The election and appointment of officers of State, other than Legislative and Judicial, their powers, duties, and compensation.

6th. The election and appointment of all county officers, tenure of office, and compensation.

7th. The Judicial Departments of Government, the election of Judicial officers, their tenure of office, and compensation.

8th. The power of impeachment, and the qualifications to vote and hold office.

9th. The elective franchise, and the qualifications to vote and hold office.

10th. The militia and military officers.

11th. The future amendments and revision of the Constitution.

12th. The State University, county seminaries, education, common schools, and their appropriate funds.

13th. The State Bank, currency, and Banking.

14th. On such parts of the present Constitution as are not otherwise referred.

15th. On Corporations other than Banking.

16th. On canals and internal improvements, public revenue and property, public debt, and the powers and duties of the Legislature in reference thereto, and the restriction proper to be imposed on the Legislature in making loans of money on the credit of the State.

17th. On the organization of county roads, the granting of powers of local legislation to them, and the adoption of a uniform mode of doing county and township business.

18th. On reducing to a code, such parts of the laws of this State as may be found practicable and expedient, and also on reforming the rules and practice of the courts of the State.

19th. On the homestead exemption, and on the accumulation, creation, and division of estate in land.

That each committee appointed under the foregoing resolution shall consist of — members, except the committee on the judiciary, which shall consist of — members.

Mr. FOSTER moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was decided in the negative.

Mr. BORDEN, moved to refer the resolution to the committee "On the plan of business and the member and functions of the different committees." Which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken, which was decided in the affirmative.

The vote being reconsidered,

Mr. HARDEN moved to lay the resolution on the table—which was decided in the negative.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. BORDEN renewed his motion, to refer the resolution to the committee "On the plan of business and the number and functions of the different committees," which motion was agreed to; and the resolution so referred.

Mr. EDMONSTON, gave notice that he would, on Monday next, or some subsequent day, introduce a resolution instructing the committee on legislation to prepare a provision in the Constitution, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature instead of annual sessions.

Mr. KENT gave notice, that on Tuesday next, he would introduce a resolution instructing the committee on education to insert a provision in the Constitution at the expiration of the charter of the State Bank of Indiana, that the fund set apart in the one hundred and fourteenth section of said charter, as a permanent fund to be appropriated to the cause of common school education, shall be divided in the proportion of the taxable polls among the counties of the state.

Mr. HARDIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns this morning, it will adjourn until two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MAY moved to amend the resolution by striking out "two o'clock," and insert "nine o'clock, A. M.;" which was decided in the negative.

The question recurring upon the original resolution,

It was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. TAGUE gave notice, that he would on Monday introduce a resolution, requiring a provision to be inserted in the Constitution, providing for triennial sessions of the Legislature, instead of annual, as now provided for.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion gave notice, that on Monday next, or at some convenient day thereafter, he would introduce a resolution enquiring into the necessity of so amending the Constitution of this State, so as to allow an additional amount of banking capital, and providing that such a system of banking may be created as will allow a healthy competition in banking, establish a safe, direct, and judicious general banking law, under which all banking operations shall hereafter be managed in the State.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe enquired, if all these notices were to be placed upon the journal. It appeared to him that there was no authority to place them there, and the journal ought not unnecessarily to be swelled with the notices; they ought to be given verbally.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the rules of the House did not require a notice to be given of the introduction of any proposition except a motion to change the rules. The Chair would, as a matter of course, direct the Secretary to conform to whatever course the Convention might direct.

Mr. CLARK said, he had made the suggestion in order to relieve the Secretary from the labor of spreading all these notices upon the journal.

Mr. PETTIT said, he would suggest to his colleague the difficulty which would present itself. His purpose of saving the labor of the Secretary would not be accomplished by giving notices verbally; in fact, his labor would be increased, because the notices must necessarily be recorded upon the journal for the information of members, that they might not be taken by surprise; and if given verbally, the Clerk would have to write them out instead of having, as in other cases, to incorporate the written in the journal. It was necessary that the notices appear upon the journal, because a question might arise upon the introduction of a proposition, as to whether it corresponded with the notice that had been given.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that in the absence of any instruction by the Convention, it had been considered the duty of the Secretary to enter the notices upon the journal.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, he thought it a wrong course of proceeding, to record upon the journal notices of propositions that were intended to be introduced, for by so doing, they were duplicating every proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said, that he, for one, objected to the placing upon the journal these notices. It was unauthorized by the rules. He objected upon their being recognized as a part of their proceedings. If such a rule of proceeding should be reported by either committee on rules, he would vote against it for the reason stated by the gentleman from Marion, that such a course of practice would double the size of the journal. To obviate the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that the Convention might be taken by surprise, there was a resolution which authorized them at any time to lay the proposition upon the table. He thought, therefore, there was no danger of being embarrassed by the sudden introduction of a proposition.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that he differed with the gentleman last up. He thought that the observance of the practice of giving notice of the introduction of propositions was very essential in the progress of their proceedings. It was certainly due to those members who were opposed to a proposition, that they should be apprised before hand of the intention to introduce it. It was objected that it would have the effect of increasing the size of the journal. He did not consider that a sufficient objection. The people of Indiana were not averse to having the journal extended so as to include all the necessary proceedings of the Convention. There would be no objection to it on their part, and it was essential that it should be full and perfect, in order that each day's proceedings might be traced with certainty.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley was opposed to placing these notices on the journal. He thought there was no necessity for it. When a proposition was introduced, if objected to, it must lie over one day, and gentlemen would then have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. PETTIT suggested, that the debate was out of order, inasmuch as the subject had been referred to a committee.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the discussion was entirely out of order, but it had been tolerated by the Chair, in order that the Convention might come to some conclusion in regard to the question. The Chair understood that the Convention had decided this morning that these notices might be given.

Mr. OWEN expressed the hope, that until rules were established for the Convention, no objection would be made to the giving of notices.

Mr. CLARK withdrew his objection.

Mr. FOSTER gave notice, that on Wednesday next, or some subsequent day, he would introduce a resolution to amend our present State Constitution so that fines heretofore appropriated for the use of county seminaries, should be appropriated for the use of common schools in the different townships where such fines are assessed and collected.

Mr. KELSO offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of seven members, be appointed by the President to enquire into the expediency of abolishing capital punishment by Constitutional provision; and that they report the result of their deliberations to this Convention.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MOORE offered the following resolution:

1st. Resolved, That there shall be a provision in the Constitution prohibiting free blacks from emigrating into this State.

2. That the pay of the members of the Legislature be fixed at two dollars per diem for the first six weeks, and one dollar per diem for any length of time thereafter.

3. That no officer shall be elected or appointed for a longer time than four years.

4. That clerks, auditors, treasurers, and sheriffs, shall be ineligible to more than two terms in succession.

5. That the technicalities and special pleading in our courts of justice be abolished.

6. That the funds arising from the sale of all our public works, water rents, &c., be sacredly applied to the liquidation of the State debt.

7. That the grand jury system be abolished.

8. That all elections shall be by viva voce.

9. That our general elections be held on the first Monday in October.

10. That no man shall hold more than one office of trust and profit at the same time; which resolution was laid on the table by consent.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Kilgore for ten days.

On motion of Mr. WOLFE, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, P. M.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1850.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev Mr. COOPER.

The journal of the preceding day was then read.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on —— be instructed to report a section requiring that each General Assembly shall provide for all the appropriations necessary for the ordinary contingent expenses of the Government until the next regular session, the aggregate amount of which shall not exceed the amount of revenue authorized by law to be raised in such time: Provided, the State may, to meet casual deficits in the revenues, contract debts, never to exceed fifty thousand dollars, and the moneys thus borrowed, shall be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained and to no other purpose, and to no other debt except for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, or defending the State in war, shall be contracted unless the law authorizing the same shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of all the votes cast for members of the General Assembly at such election. The General Assembly shall provide for the publication of said law, for three months, at least, before the vote of the people shall be taken upon the same, and provision shall be made at the time for the payment of interest annually as it shall accrue by a tax levied for the purpose; and the law levying the tax shall be submitted to the people, with the law authorizing the debt to be contracted.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. PEPPER moved that it be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. EDMONSTON asked for a division of the question.

The question being taken first on laying the resolution on the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on ordering the resolution to be printed, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN, from the committee on rules, submitted the following report:

"The committee to which was referred the subject of reporting rules and regulations to govern the proceedings of this Convention during its session, beg leave to submit the following report, and to respectfully recommend it for adoption:

[The report was read by the Secretary.]

Mr. BORDEN from the same committee asked leave to make another report.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that if it did not form part of the first report, it would not now be in order.

The question would be, first, on adopting the rules which had been reported from the committee.

Mr. KELSO said, he did not wish to enter upon the consideration of the rules now, for he apprehended they would give rise to some debate, and for the purpose of giving the other committees an opportunity to report, he would move that this report be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. PETTIT said, he hoped the gentleman would withdraw that motion for a moment that he might make a suggestion.

Mr. KELSO withdrew the motion.

Mr. PETTIT said, that before acting upon the rules, he thought they ought to be printed, but first of all he would state that there was one of them that he desired to amend. He meant the rule which authorized the yeas and nays to be taken upon the demand of any ten members. He thought that number was too small to be permitted to demand the yeas and nays in a deliberative body, consisting of 150 members. He thought that it ought not to be in the power of so small a number to vex and harrass a body of that size, with repeated calls for the yeas and nays. It would be much better to say that it should require one fifth of the members present to demand the yeas and nays. He perceived that the committee had changed the rule of the House in this respect, and made it to require ten to demand the yeas and nays instead of two, but ten he thought was not enough. He would move to strike out "ten," and insert "one-fifth of the members present."

[Cries of "No," "No," "No."]

Mr. KELSO said, that about one-third of these rules, on an average, deserved the name of gag laws. About one third of all the propositions that were to be permitted by them to come before the Convention at all, were to be decided without debate. To that he did not so much object, but he did claim the privilege, if his lips were to be sealed, at least, to record his vote. He desired that one of the two privileges should be allowed. Either that the old rule that had stood ever since the birth of the State, giving to two members the power to call the yeas and nays should stand, or the privilege of debating all propositions that might come before the Convention, should be allowed. He hoped that the motion of the gentleman would not prevail.

Mr. PETTIT said, that, to accommodate the gentleman, he would withdraw his motion and let the question be taken on the motion to print.

Mr. KELSO then renewed his motion, that the rules be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAPMAN asked for a division of the question.

The question was, accordingly, first taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it was agreed to.

The question on the motion to print (one hundred and fifty copies) was also agreed to.

Mr. MILROY, from the committee appointed to investigate the legality of the claim of the present State Printer to do the printing of this Convention, made the following report:

"The undersigned, members of the committee appointed under the following resolution, viz.:—

Resolved, That there be a committee of seven appointed, whose duty it shall be to enquire into and report to this Convention, upon the legality of the claim of the present State Printer to do the printing for this Convention, &c.,

Beg leave to report that they have had the matter referred to them, under their consideration, and are unanimously of opinion that the State Printer is not ex officio the Printer to this Convention, and has no legal claim by virtue of his office to do the printing for this Convention.

R. H. MILROY,
H. P. THORNTON,
JOHN P. DUNN,
HORACE P. BIDDLE,
EZEKIEL D. LOGAN,
JAMES LOCKHART, Committee."

The report having been read,

Mr. NAVE said, as it involved a legal question, in order that members might have an opportunity of examining it, he moved that it be laid on the table for the present.

Mr. KELSO desired permission to enquire of the chairman of the committee whether any documents connected with the contract had been laid before the committee? If so, he desired that copies should be furnished to the Convention, that they might be examined.

Mr. MILROY replied that there had been some documents before the committee.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the report on the table, and upon a division—ayes 61, noes 63—it was not agreed to.

So the report was not laid upon the table.

The question then being upon concurring in the report,

Mr. BORDEN said, he supposed there was no desire on the part of the Convention to hasten the decision until a full opportunity for examination had been afforded, and it appeared to him, therefore, that it ought to be permitted to lie over until to-morrow. He hoped that by unanimous consent it would be permitted to lie over.

The PRESIDENT remarked to the gentleman, that he might accomplish his object by moving to postpone the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BORDEN then moved to postpone its further consideration until 10 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN, from the committee on rules, made the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee, to which was referred the subject of reporting rules, &c., for the regulation of the proceedings of this Convention, and to whom was also referred a resolution proposing "that it shall not be in order to move any resolution of instruction to any standing committee, requiring any provision of the Constitution to be brought in without first giving at least two days previous notice of such resolution," have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report rule 37, of the rules this day reported to the Convention, in lieu of said resolution, and respectfully ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was concurred in, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. BORDEN, from the same committee, submitted the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on rules, &c., to whom was referred a resolution of this Convention, requiring them to enquire into the propriety of appointing messengers whose duty it shall be to attend to the mailing of all letters, papers, &c., of the members and officers of this body, and to receive and deliver to said members and officers, all matters sent them through the Post Office, would respectfully report, that your committee have enquired of the Doorkeeper of this Convention and from him ascertained that he has already appointed eight persons to assist him; your committee have not been able to find any authority vested in the Doorkeeper to make such appointments; should this number be retained, we are unable to see the necessity for the appointment of messengers, and are of the opinion that the number appointed is already too large.

He would respectfully suggest to the Convention to take immediate measures to determine the number of assistants the Doorkeeper shall have, and who shall make the appointments.

We respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to employ one assistant doorkeeper, one messenger, one attendant on the committee rooms, and one person to make fires in the Hall.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay it upon the table. The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KELSO opposed its adoption. There was an absolute necessity, he said, for the services of all these messengers. They could not be dispensed with without serious inconvenience. As to the assertion of the committee that no power was vested in the Doorkeeper to make the appointments, he would ask to whom the power did belong, if not to him.

Mr. BORDEN observed, that it was proper that he should state that he did not himself entirely concur in the resolution, but that he had submitted it in obedience to the instructions of a majority of the committee. He would state, however, that he was satisfied that too many officers were employed.

Mr. KELSO moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. KELSO withdrew the motion.

Mr. FOSTER said, he was decidedly of the impression that there were too many persons employed. He rose however, he said, for the purpose of moving to amend the resolution by adding two additional messengers.

After some conversational debate the question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Some further conversation ensued, and the yeas and nays being demanded, were taken with the following result, yeas 84 nays 47, as follows:

AYES.—Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr of Jackson, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Harbott, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hiatt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Logan, March, Mather, Mathis, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Trembly, Vanbenthussen, Walpole, Wheeler, Wolf, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—yeas 84.

NAYS.—Alexander, Bascom, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Gootee, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Holman, Johnson, Kelso, Kindley, Maguire, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—nays 47.

So the resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. READ, of Monroe, chairman of the committee on standing committees, made the following report:

"The committee appointed to report a plan for the business of this Convention, and to designate the number and functions of the different standing committees, beg leave to make the following report:

That the standing committees shall be the following, to whom shall be referred all such matters touching the Constitution as properly belong to each, and that they report, without argument, the provisions, alterations, or amendments required."

[The list of committees was here read by the Secretary.]

Mr. READ of Monroe moved, that the report be laid upon the table and printed.

It was suggested by several members that there should be three hundred copies printed.

Mr. BORDEN said, that in view of the fact that the report might be amended when it should come to be considered, he thought a hundred and fifty copies would be enough.

Mr. KELSO desired that the motion to lay on the table might be withdrawn; and the motion being withdrawn accordingly, he said: If the Convention were satisfied with the report, as he was himself, perfectly, it would be well enough to print the three hundred copies proposed, but if a majority should demand alterations and amendments, then the printing of any number would be an entire loss. He did not know but it would be proper at this time to put the question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. COOKERLY. It seemed, to his mind, that the Convention ought to adopt or reject the report at once. It seemed to him to be high time for the Convention to be getting to work. They had been sent here to work, and he was weary of idleness.

Mr. WOLFE. He also hoped the Convention would either adopt or reject the report now. He was himself agreed to it in every particular, except as to the number of members of the committee on phraseology, which was to be composed of the chairmen of all the other committees. He thought the number too great entirely, but would give way to the opinion of others.

Mr. OWEN said, he thought the printing could surely be obtained by to-morrow morning; and, as there were some gentlemen who had doubts about the propriety of adopting the report now—and as it was, in fact, a very important one, for upon it, to a considerable extent, depended the after-business of the Convention—he thought it prudent to postpone final action. Assured, as he was, that the printing could be had in the morning, it seemed to him that the Convention would be ill-advised if they were to increase the number of copies. He thought that the report which proposed to carve out the business of the Convention, should be printed and examined with the utmost care. He found that, in New York, they did not get through with this report until they had been in session some ten days; and than it was some fifteen days afterwards before they proceeded to consider it. He believed that he should be disposed to favor this report, with one single amendment, and that was: he thought he should propose to transfer to a special committee the consideration of the matter of apportionment of representation. He considered this question of apportionment to be one of the most important in the government. But if the printing could be had to-morrow morning he would rather wait. He had great confidence in the select committee; but the report had been drawn up in a hurry. It was a very important report—certainly the most important report which had been made to the Convention; therefore, every man, as he thought, should carefully read and consider it before adopting or deciding upon it. After getting through with the consideration of the report, then he would be in favor of printing more, but now he thought a hundred and fifty copies would suffice.

Mr. READ of Monroe then renewed his motion, which was agreed to, and accordingly it was Ordered, That the report lie on the table, and that one hundred and fifty copies be printed for the use of members.

PUBLICATION OF THE PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion, from the select committee to which had been referred the subject of furnishing newspapers containing the proceedings and debates of the Convention, made the following report:

The report was here read by the Secretary. It concluded with recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the principal Secretary order, from the publishers of the Indiana State Journal, the Indiana State Sentinel, the Indiana Statesman, the Indiana Volksblatt, and the Locomotive, such numbers of each as are named in the foregoing estimate, and that the Convention hereby authorize the payment of the postage on such of the above named papers as may be sent by mail, and upon all public documents ordered to be printed by this body and mailed at the Indianapolis post office.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon the adoption of the resolution, and the yeas and nays were demanded thereupon.

Mr. WATTS said, he did not like to oppose the resolution, yet he could not vote for it. He had some experience in this newspaper business. He had seen wagon loads of packages which had been ordered in this way, in the cellar of the Post Office in this city. He had passed coffee sacks full of them in the mud-holes on the Michigan road, which the stage could not carry away. But he had another objection: If these papers were taken and distributed at the expense of the State, a paper would be sent to one man to-day, containing a detached portion of the business of this body—say the business of one day—and he would not get another paper, perhaps, during the session of the Convention, and of course by this means alone he could know nothing about the proceedings here. Whereas, if the papers were given to him during the session, at the close he would know something about what had been done; but in the way they were proposing: to send to one man to-day and another to-morrow, and perhaps no one getting more than two or three papers during the session, the knowledge of their proceedings would amount to absolutely nothing. If arrangements could be made to send correct accounts of their proceedings to the various county papers, he thought that might be a better plan. At all events he felt bound to go against this proposition; and he thought it due to himself to say thus much.

Mr. KELSO said, he was desirous that we should get as much information as possible before the people; the only question was whether we could get the same amount of valuable information before the people on any cheaper plan than the one proposed. He did not like the proposition so far as it respected those publishers who proposed to furnish only a part of the proceedings. It occurred to his mind that their papers would be almost entirely useless upon our hands; but there were three papers proposing only to publish the debates as prepared by their own reporters. He would take only those papers which published the debates as prepared by the authorized reporters.

Mr. SHERROD was opposed to the adoption of the resolution as reported. He admitted that the people ought to be furnished with the proceedings of the body, but he was opposed to the plan here proposed. He considered it anti-Democratic; for how could all of their constituents be furnished with these papers? In the district which he had the honor to represent there were three thousand voters. How many of these would he be able to furnish? Last winter he took three papers and distributed them as well as he could among his constituents, and when he returned home they complained that they had scarcely received any papers at all.— Besides this, he contended, that if there ever was a deliberative body that should practice economy, it was this body. They should set an example that would last for years to come. He thought the people would be better satisfied with the publication of these reports in the various county papers throughout the State.

Mr. MURRAY said, he considered that there had been no period since the adoption of the present Constitution, in which the dissemination of information with respect to the affairs of the State was more imperiously demanded. This information should be sent forth, in order that they might have the will of the people expressed with regard to their proceedings, in time to direct their action. For when the Constitution should have been perfected, then there would be but one issue before the people. The work would then have to be either adopted or rejected. Errors could not be corrected then. But now, whilst the body were in session, if their constituents should be dissatisfied with their action, they would be able to hear from them, and be corrected by them. For this reason, he thought it altogether expedient that they should send abroad their daily proceedings as early as possible.

Mr. BASCOM said, that the committee was not a little astonished when they came to look at the cost of publishing the reports in these papers. They had first made their calculation to take ten papers of each publisher for each member; but the cost appeared so great that they were constrained to cut it down to the lowest estimate possible. He was in favor of adopting the resolution, for the reason that the people wanted information of our doings; they wanted knowledge upon every subject likely to be considered here. If it was anti-Democratic to diffuse knowledge among the people, he would renounce the name; if such a thing was going to break down the party, he would not belong to it. But he looked at the matter in a different light. If the people had made any demands of him he was bound to comply; and that he was doing when he supported the report of the committee. The people wanted not only the results of the deliberations here, but they wanted the whys and the wherefores. And if gentlemen were diligent in distributing the papers proposed to be taken, by the time they were through, he had no doubt that the people would be pretty well informed of our doings. The gentleman from Orange, (Mr. Sherrod,) gave his preference to the plan of publishing our reports in the papers generally throughout the State. But need that gentleman be told, that, without the resolution, these country papers could never get those reports? But when published in the city papers here, the full reports would go forth, and copies would be multiplied in every part of the State, so that the people could not but be well informed of all that was done. Their acts should not be kept from the people. They should be spread broad-cast over the land, that every man might see and judge for himself, and judge understandingly. How could he act understandingly unless the light of knowledge be placed before him? But the wonder with him was, how any man here could be so parsimonious as to refuse four thousand dollars for that light. He could not but think that gentlemen would be standing very much in their own light if they refused to support this resolution.

Mr. SHERROD said, he had no wish to continue the debate, but desired merely to reply to a reference which had been made to him. He had remarked that, in his opinion, it would be anti-democratic to support the report of this committee, and he would still contend that it was anti-democratic to tax the many for the benefit of the few.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, he was in favor of taking the papers, but he thought the number proposed might be reduced to three for the daily papers. That would be eighteen papers weekly for each member from each of the daily publishing establishments, and he thought that number would be sufficient. With respect to the distribution of his share, instead of sending to lawyers, and doctors, and leading politicians, as had been intimated, he intended to send his papers to the hard-fisted yeomanry of the country. He would move to strike out "five," wherever it occurred in relation to the Journal, Sentinel, and Statesman, and insert "three" in lieu thereof.

Mr. READ of Clark said, he was in favor of the amendment. He should have voted, however, for the adoption of the resolution without the amendment, but he would have done so with some objections relative to the amount. Like the gentleman from Orange, he had concluded never to vote for taking the papers in this way, as long as the arrangement of which he complained should be continued in the Post Office Department. But since that difficulty was removed he was ready to support the proposition.

Mr. SHOUP thought it but right that all the papers in the State should be allowed the same price that was allowed the city papers here for publishing the proceedings of the Convention. The city publishers had already pledged themselves in their prospectus that they would publish these proceedings—they were obligated to do so. Where, then, was the propriety of coming in and paying for that service. He would move the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois

(Mr. Edmonston): to insert in the proper place that all the local press within the State be allowed the same rates for publishing the proceedings of the Convention.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, that, as chairman of the committee raised under the original resolution, perhaps he might, from his intimacy with the question, be able to give some information which would be of service to gentlemen in determining their votes. He would say that he was neither anxious nor interested about the matter, any more than as he considered it a public duty to give to the people the needed information. If the correspondence sent up with the report had been read, the reasons would have been apparent why the Convention should give a considerable amount of money to enable these publishers to print the report of the proceedings of this body. These publishers proposed to give detailed reports, literally, of what transpired in this body, on the succeeding day. To do this they would have to fill seven columns of print, of three thousand ems each, in their several papers daily. This amount of labor it was impossible for any set of printers to perform without additional compensation or subscription. But if the publishers did not proceed to make these detailed reports, he would ask how were the country papers to get hold of correct copies of their doings here? Not a single speech, perhaps, would appear in their columns. They would barely give such an amount of proceedings as would show that the members were here engaged in the performance of their duty. That being the case, the sources of information to the local press would be very limited.

Hence, continued Mr. M., when we pay the city publishers for this amount of printing, we multiply one hundred fold the amount of reports of our proceedings here, to be sent to the papers throughout the State. It had been said that it was anti-democratic to take the people's money to do the people's work. Why no Democrat or Whig in the State would hesitate to do so when it was demanded by the people. The committee had not blinked the argument. They thought the enterprize was worth the expense. For, what substitute would gentlemen furnish for the plan of the committee? Would they set in, all of them, and write their own reports in the shape of letters, and send them all over the State? Or would they ask the local editors to send up reporters to do this work? If such counsel was followed, upon returning home, gentlemen would meet their constituents asking them—"what have you been doing?" and they would have to reply, each for himself—"Why, don't you know? then I will tell you." And they would find it a story that would take up a good deal of time. The common cry would be—"They stayed there till they got all the pay they could, and then came home without doing anything." He was for removing the cause for such a cry, as far as this small expenditure of money would go. If the compensation proposed in this amendment of the gentleman from Dubois (Mr. Edmonston) would be sufficient to remunerate these editors, he would go with him, for it did not curtail the item of compensation. He was for acting reasonably in regard to this matter.

Let us, said he, calmly and coolly consider whether it would be doing well by the people not to furnish them with the proceedings, or whether it would not be acting the part of demagogueism. Would gentlemen say to the people—"We were so careful of your interest that we were constrained to vote against sending you these papers?" He would like to meet such economists before their constituents in any part of the State, for he believed the people of Indiana to be a reading and intelligent people.

The committee had submitted the project which they thought to be the most feasible. They considered neither the amount of papers too large, nor the price too high. It was precisely such a course as the people of Ohio and Kentucky had pursued, only they carried it to a much greater extent; and was it to be conceded that our people were less liberal or less intelligent than the people of Ohio or Kentucky?

Mr. HOVEY said, he was opposed to the resolution and amendment. He represented a county containing about 2,300 voters, and under the resolution before the Convention, the papers that would be given to him for distribution, would scarcely furnish one apiece for his constituents. Such, he thought, would be but poor light to guide them in forming their opinions in regard to the instrument the Convention might frame. Such broken parts of their discussions would have a tendency to mislead rather than enlighten. He was opposed to the amendment and resolution for other reasons. A Stenographer to the Convention had been appointed, whose duty it was to report their debates in full, and those debates, he understood, were to be published for distribution among the people. The opinions of members, thus circulated, would be far preferable to the fragments that might reach their constituents through the medium of the newspaper press. The gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) had affirmed that opposition to the resolution and amendment might do well enough for the demagogue upon the stump, but that it was out of place here. With due deference to the opinion of that gentleman, he thought it savored more of demagogueism to pay $4,300 of the public money for the paper and postage mentioned in the report, to be used by delegates for the purpose of courting political favor at home. If the resolution should be adopted, the wind-worth of this Convention, including the Stenographer, stationery, publishing debates, &c., &c., will cost nearly $20,000. He should vote against any proposition of a character similar to that now before the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN said, it struck him that there was a question behind this subject of publishing, which ought to be considered and decided first; and that was the subject of reporting. For if the Convention did not retain the reporters, of course they need have nothing to do with printing the debates. If he understood this matter aright, it was arranged in the Ohio Convention so that the types used for printing the proceedings and debates in the newspapers, were transferred from the columns of the newspaper, to the page of the library edition of the proceedings, which very materially lessened the expense of the volume. But urging, again, that in his opinion the question of reporting should be decided first; he moved that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

So the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the report, resolution, and pending amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved an adjournment,

Which motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion, from the select committee appointed to enquire into the practicability of providing a more comfortable and convenient house for the use of the Convention made the following report.

[The report and accompanying correspondence was then read by the Secretary.]

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the report and communications on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREGG submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to ascertain whether a room can be obtained in the city of Madison, of sufficient capacity to accommodate the sessions of the Convention—and if so, upon what terms—together with such other information on the subject as may be of interest to this body. And that said committee report all the facts in relation thereto, as early as practicable.

Mr. PETTIT offered the following amendment:

Insert after the word "Madison," as follows: "or any other town in the State."

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit).

And it was rejected.

Mr. BORDEN moved an adjournment.

Which motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. KENT offered the following amendment. Strike out "Madison," and insert "New Albany."

The amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the original resolution of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) it was adopted.

The CHAIR appointed the following gentlemen as members of the committee:

Messrs. Gregg, Bright, Wheeler, Kelso, and Bourne.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn sine die on the 7th day of November next.

Mr. CARR of Jackson moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS submitted the following resolution.

Resolved, That the committee on Legislation be instructed to enquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution that one branch of the Legislature shall consist of only seventy members, and the other branch, to-wit: the Senate, shall consist of only thirty members.

Mr. MILLER of the Gibson moved to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Clinton (Mr. Sims) on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BORDEN the Convention adjourned until to-morrow, 9 o'clock.

~~~~~ SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. C. L. Mills.

The journal of the preceding day having been read,

Mr. STEELE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a provision be incorporated in the Constitution of the State of Indiana, to restrict the Indiana Legislature from granting a license to vend spirituous liquors in the State.

And be it further resolved, That a provision be incorporated in the Constitution of the State of Indiana, to instruct our representatives to provide, by law, the right of petition to all white females, of the age of eighteen and upwards, to the Indiana Legislature, for such laws as will tend to protect their best interests, and that of their posterity.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the resolution on the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. S. JONES, a delegate from the county of Bartholomew, appeared in the Convention, produced his credentials, and was sworn according to law, by the Hon. HORACE P. BIDDLE, one of the Circuit Judges of the State of Indiana, and took his seat.

Mr. BORDEN submitted the following resolution, which was laid on the table by consent:

Resolved, That the committee on elective franchise inquire into the expediency of providing in the Constitution for the exercise of the right of suffrage, so that in no instance shall the exercise of that right depend upon the naturalization laws of Congress; and, also, to inquire into the propriety of allowing persons of foreign birth, who shall have resided one year in this State, declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, (or denizens of this State,) and taken the oath of allegiance to our own, and abjuration of all foreign governments, the privilege of voters.

Mr. DICK submitted the following resolution, which was laid on the table by consent:

Resolved 1st. That no State bank shall hereafter be created, nor shall the State, directly or indirectly, ever become a stockholder in any incorporation or association, created for the purpose of issuing paper money of any description; nor shall the State give or loan her credit, in aid of any individual or incorporation, for banking purposes.

2nd. That no person, association of persons, or corporation, shall put in circulation any bill, certificate, promissory note, or other paper, or the paper of any other bank, to circulate as money, without first having satisfied the Legislature, with good and sufficient pledges, that such paper money shall be redeemed in specie, on demand. And every such person, association, or corporation, shall be individually liable for the redemption of the whole amount of such circulation; nor shall any such person, association of persons, or corporation, issue note or paper money of less denomination than ten dollars.

3d. That the Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the suspension of specie payments, in behalf of any individual, association or incorporation, issuing paper money of any description.

Mr. READ of Clark submitted the following resolution, which was laid on the table by consent:

Resolved, That the committee on currency and banking be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting in the Constitution, the following sections, to-wit:

SEC. 1st. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act, granting any special charter for banking purposes; but corporations, or associations may be formed for such purposes, under general laws.

SEC. 2. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any law sanctioning, in any manner, directly or indirectly, the suspension of specie payments, by any person, association, or corporation, issuing bank notes of any description.

SEC. 3. The Legislature shall provide by law, for the registering of all bills or notes, issued, or put into circulation as money, and shall require ample security for the redemption of the same in specie.

SEC. 4. The stockholders in every corporation and joint stock association, for banking purposes, issuing bank notes, or any kind of paper credit, to circulate as money, after the first day of January 1852, shall be individually liable to the amount of their respective share or shares, of stock in any such corporation or association, for all its debts and liabilities of every kind, contracted after the said first day of January.

SEC. 5. In case of the insolvency of any bank or banking association, the bill holders thereof shall be entitled to preference in payment over all other creditors of such bank or association.

Mr. FOLEY submitted the following resolution, which was laid upon the table by consent:

Resolved, That the following reforms ought to be engrafted in the new Constitution:

1st. A provision for biennial, instead of annual sessions of the Legislature.

2nd. All officers to be elected by the people.

3d General elections to be held on the first Tuesday in October, instead of the first Monday in August.

4th. The Legislature to commence its session on the first Monday in January.

5th. The Gubernatorial office extended to a four years term, and a Governor to be ineligible for a second term.

6th. No person to be allowed to hold two offices of honor and profit at the same time, as is now the case to the clerk's and recorder's office.

7th. Associate judges of circuit courts dispensed with.

8th. Local and special legislation wholly prevented.

9th. No tax to be levied by an act of the Legislature, except to carry on and support the State Government, unless such tax is first submitted to a separate and direct vote of the people, and by them authorized; existing charitable institutions to be excepted from this rule.

10th. An express provision against allowing the Legislature to borrow money, excepting in time of war, or for public defence, without first submitting it to the people.

11th. Fines and forfeitures, now appropriated to county seminaries, to be distributed for common school purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was laid upon the table by consent:

Resolved, 1st. That the legitimate object of a constitution is to declare the natural and inherent rights of the citizen, to fix and establish the several departments of government, and declare and limit the powers to be exercised by each.

2d. That no subject of a merely legislative character, and not fundamental in its nature, should be engrafted on the Constitution.

3d. That it is anti-republican to restrain the exercise of the public will, through the Legislature, by unnecessary restraints on the legislative department of the government.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. READ of Monroe moved, that the report of the committee on the organization of standing committees, be taken from the table by consent.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. READ of Monroe stated, that, by a mistake of the copyist, a standing committee on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representation to consist of nine members, had been omitted. He would move that it be inserted among the committees as No. 10, and that the numbers named be changed so as to correspond with the increase of one.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the Convention proceed to consider the organization of the standing committees, in the order in which they were numbered in the committee's report.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number one, on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State, to consist of nine members,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being upon the adoption of committee number two, on the legislative department, to consist of nine members,

Mr. BORDEN moved to strike out the whole provision, and insert the following substitute :

On apportionment, election, and tenure of office of the Legislature, to consist of ten members, one from each congressional district.

On the powers and duties of the legislative department, except matters otherwise referred, to consist of nine members.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,)

It was decided in the negative.

The question recurring upon the adoption of number two,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number three, on the executive, to consist of nine members,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number four, on the State officers other than executive and judiciary, to consist of seven members,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being upon the adoption of committee number five, on the organization of courts of justice, to consist of one member from each judicial circuit,

Mr. PETTIT said, that as the subjects embraced in this resolution and the two following were properly connected, and could be more appropriately acted upon by one committee, he was in favor of the question being taken upon them unitedly. He was of opinion, that in proportion as the committees were increased, in the same ratio the final consummation of the object of their formation would be retarded and embarrassed. This was more particularly the case when a division was made of subject matter that was necessarily combined, as in the three resolutions before them, the fifth, sixth, and seventh. There was no possibility of making a clear line of demarcation with reference to this subject, one department being so necessarily interwoven with the other. This, of course, would lead to embarrassment in the action of the committees. He was very glad to see that the committee on rules had reported a committee on the legislative department, also one on the executive department. But so far as the judiciary was concerned, other committees had been proposed to be raised upon that subject. In view of this fact, he would respectfully inquire of gentlemen whether the organization of the courts and the practice of law were not as naturally connected as were the various duties and powers of the Governor? They might as well have a committee on the election, a committee on the tenure of office, one on the veto power, and one on the pardoning power of the Governor, as to have a committee upon every branch pertaining to the judiciary. The division thus made was one that would lead to the formation of a half a dozen committees that might more properly be consolidated into one.

He would ask if the organization of criminal courts did not involve the exercise of criminal law in these courts? And with reference to law reforms and the practices of law, were they not necessarily connected with the organization of courts. It was very desirable that a provision should be made in the Constitution with reference to reform in the practice of law; but this object could be accomplished by a committee organized as he had suggested. All these legal subjects should be under the jurisdiction of one committee, as they were necessarily connected together. Law reforms could not be carried out if courts were not organized in which those laws could be put in practice. The division of these legal subjects among three committees would inevitably produce confusion. The question would arise: how far shall one committee go upon the practises, and how far should another go with reference to law reforms, and how far should a third go with regard to the organization of courts? These committees would be deliberating in different rooms as so many different bodies, without any mutual harmony in their action. It was for the purpose of consolidating these subjects, and having them harmonize, that he had proposed bringing them under the jurisdiction of one committee.

But with reference to law reform, he would enquire if there was any gentleman in the Convention who supposed that anything more than a clause of a few lines would be added to the Constitution? Who was going to dovetail into the Constitution provisions having reference to law reforms and practices. All that it was proposed to do was to insert a clause in the Constitution, making it the duty of the Legislature to provide for the appointment of three or five of the ablest lawyers in the State as commissioners to simplify the practice of law. Was it necessary to raise a committee for that purpose? With regard to criminal law, it was not expected that a committee should report an elaborate and learned code on the subject. The subject of the grand jury would probably be considered, but that subject also properly belonged to the judicial department. He had heard it mooted here and elsewhere, that in the matter of a prosecution, where the whole power of the State was brought to bear upon the one prosecuted, it was designed to make a provision whereby the defendant shall have the privilege of the closing argument to the jury. He was willing to consider the question, and to what committee could it be more appropriately referred than an old-fashioned judicial committee?

In what body, he would enquire, had this subject ever been so divided?

A VOICE—In Ohio.

Mr. PETTIT. It was a piece of great folly.

Mr. P. concluded his remarks by saying that, believing it would tend to harmony in the action of the Convention, he would move to strike out the fifth, sixth, and seventh provisions, and insert the following:

"On the judiciary, to consist of one member from each Judicial Circuit."

Mr. EDMONSTON asked for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT decided the question could not be divided.

Mr. REED of Monroe said, that it was plainly evident to him, that a committee on the organization of courts of justice—a committee that should fix the organization of the supreme court, which performed nisi prius duties, and, also, the organization of the probate courts, would have as much business before it as it could properly attend to; and such a committee should be composed of the ablest lawyers in the Convention. With regard to the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law—the sixth—he would say, that the subjects of the grand jury, the abolition of the death penalty, and a house of refuge, would all go to that committee, and any one of them would be sufficient to occupy the attention of a committee.

How was it in regard to the committee on the practice of the law and law reform? What subjects would go to that committee? Gentlemen would probably bring forward resolutions for the abolishment of special pleading; also for the doing away with the distinction between law and equity proceedings. There were other subjects, also, to be acted upon, and he had no doubt there would be plenty of work for the three committees. The gentleman from Tippecanoe had said that no such divisions, as now proposed, had been made in other Conventions. He would inform the gentleman, that in the Michigan Convention, which was composed of only ninety members, there were twenty-four committees; in the New York Convention numbering one hundred and twenty-eight members, there were eighteen committees; and in the Ohio Convention, numbering one hundred and eight members, there were eighteen committees. The gentleman from Tippecanoe had further stated that the organization of these committees would tend to produce confusion, and that they would intrench one upon the work of the other. Allowing this to be true, what difficulty would arise? Had they not provided for a committee of revision and arrangement? These three committees he was of opinion should be retained and in fact, with great propriety, another committee having charge of legal questions not otherwise provided for, might be added to the number already proposed. At all events he should be very reluctant to have either of these committees at present proposed stricken out.

Mr. NAVE said, that it appeared to him that the proposed organization of so many committees, was only a plan for conferring honor upon gentlemen desirous of being made chairmen of those committees. Gentlemen should consider seriously of the embarrassment in the business of the Convention, that would result from the organization of so many committees. There was an act passed in the reign of Charles II, of England, drawn up by one of the ablest jurists of the land, Lord Bacon, and was known to all lawyers as the Statute of Frauds. That statute had been incorporated in the laws of the State of Indiana, as it had been in the laws of every other State of the Confederacy. And he would respectfully ask, how the different branches of that statute could be acted upon with celerity and without perplexity, if it was parceled out among different committees. He merely cited this as an illustration of the difficulties that would arise from the division of subjects that properly came under one head. He was in favor of having as few committees raised as possible.

Mr. NILES stated, that he was a member of the committee to whom was referred the organization of the standing committees, and that he had acquiesced in their report, in opposition to his first impressions respecting it. He thought there was evidence of a disposition among the members of the Convention, to raise only those committees that were strictly proper; and he would here express his regret that the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) had seen fit to throw out insinuations with reference to the motives of the gentlemen who advocate the organization of a large number of committees—insinuations that appeared to him wholly unjustifiable. He was fully satisfied that the committee in preparing the report presented, had done so with no desire of pandering to the ambition of any other member of the Convention. He had no doubt that such was the opinion of the Convention, and that such would be the opinion of the people. He was of opinion, that the organization of two of these committees could very properly be consolidated into one; and he would suggest to the gentleman from Tippecanoe, a modification of his resolution, viz.: To strike out the proposed committee on the organization of courts of justice, and insert a committee "on the organization of courts of justice, the practice of law, and law reform." This would leave the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law still standing.

Mr. PETTIT would accept the gentleman's amendment as a substitute for his resolution.

Mr. PETTIT would simply state to gentlemen, that he had been informed that in the Kentucky Convention, three committees were raised similar to those now proposed, but finding upon trial, that they worked incongruously, they were consolidated.

Mr. BASCOM remarked, that perhaps it was useless for him to contend with the ablest lawyers of the Convention in reference to this matter of organizing committees; but, notwithstanding all the arguments that had been advanced, he could not see any necessity for consolidating these committees. It appeared very plain to him that the committee on the organization of courts of justice, should be retained. This committee would decide as to the number of judges to be employed in the supreme and probate courts, and the number of circuits, &c. These subjects bore no analogy to the subject of law reform. They were of a different character and should be kept separated; and he further desired that they might be so divided out to appropriate committees as that they might receive a thorough investigation.

He could not see how the views of the several committees were going to conflict with each other, when their duties were plainly laid down, viz.: one to have charge of the subject of the organization of courts of justice—one to consider matters pertaining to criminal law, and a third to consider upon the practice of law and law reform.

The question being taken upon the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit,) as amended by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) it was rejected.

The question recurring upon the adoption of committee number five, as reported by the select committee,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number six, on matters pertaining to criminal law, to consist of seven members,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number seven, on the practice of the law and law reform, to consist of one member from each judicial circuit,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being upon the adoption of committee number eight, on special and local legislation and uniformity of laws, to consist of seven members,

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend by striking out the word "seven," and inserting the word "nine," so that the committee should consist of nine members.

The amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of committee number eight, as reported by the select committee,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number nine, on impeachment and removals from office, to consist of five members,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being upon adopting committee number ten, on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representation, to consist of nine members,

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend, by striking out the words "nine members," and inserting the words "one from each judicial circuit."

Mr. FOSTER said, that he was in favor of augmenting the number composing the committee because he regarded the committee as a very important one, and he would state his reasons for so thinking. Our Congressmen would be elected only one term more on the basis of the present apportionment of representation. After that term had expired they would be elected in accordance with the apportionment of representation furnished by the census taken last June. Congress had passed a law changing the present form of Congressional Districts, making so many Congressmen for the State, instead of dividing them in proportion to the number of inhabitants. The number of Congressmen had been fixed at two hundred and thirty-five, thus making the Congressmen the divisor instead of the inhabitants. This subject then would appropriately come under the consideration of this committee, and to them would fall the duty of dividing the State into Senatorial and Representative districts.

In view of the importance of the committee, therefore, he thought it should consist of thirteen members, one from each judicial circuit.

Mr. BORDEN said, that the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) had fallen into a very great error in supposing that the Convention would district the State for Congressional purposes. That was a power conferred upon the State Legislature, and he apprehended that they would exercise it at the proper time. He concurred with the gentleman from Monroe, however, as to the propriety of an increase in the number of the committee. In the Ohio Convention, a committee of like character to this consisted of twenty-one members. After the subject of taxation, the most difficult question to settle was the one fixing upon a proper representation; and he would remark that, in his opinion, they were not confined in their apportionment of the representatives in Congress to the census taken in June last. Congress had fixed the number of Congressmen for all the States, to be sure, but it was for the Legislative bodies of the States to decide upon the mode of apportionment among their citizens.

He was in favor of increasing the committee to thirteen members, one from each judicial circuit.

Mr. FOSTER said he wished to make a few remarks in reply to those just delivered by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden.) Either that gentleman or himself, had made a very great mistake. The act of Congress, upon this subject, as gentlemen could readily see upon examination, provided that whenever the subject of apportionment was taken up, that apportionments should be made upon the basis of the census taken last June.

Now, if the Convention had the right to make an apportionment of State Senators and Representatives, they had the same right to apportion their Representatives in Congress. This was a precedent that had been established by other States heretofore; at least, when they emerged from territories into States, this had uniformly been the practice. They were to be governed, then, in the apportionment of representation by the census taken the first of June last.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) and it was concurred in, and committee number ten as amended was adopted.

The question being taken

Upon the adoption of committee number eleven,

On county and township organization, power and officers, to consist of one member from each Congressional District;

Of committee number twelve,

On currency and banking, to consist of eleven members;

Of committee number thirteen,

On corporations other than banking, to consist of nine members; and

Of committee number fourteen,

On state debt and public works, to consist of seven members;

They were severally adopted by consent.

The question being upon the adoption of committee number fifteen,

On finance and taxation, to consist of seven members,

Mr. HOLMAN moved to strike out the word "seven," and insert the words "thirteen, one from each judicial circuit."

The amendment was concurred in, and committee number fifteen as amended was adopted.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number sixteen,

On the militia, to consist of five members;

Of committee number seventeen,

On education, to consist of nine members;

Of committee number eighteen,

On future amendments to the Constitution, to consist of five members;

Of committee number nineteen,

On public institutions of the State, to consist of five members;

They were severally adopted by consent.

The question being upon the adoption of committee number twenty,

On salaries, compensation and tenure of office, to consist of five members,

Mr. BORDEN enquired if this committee on the tenure of office would have charge of the subject of biennial sessions of the Legislature? Also, if it would fix the time the judges would serve, and the tenure of state and county officers—or were these matters to be referred to other committees? Unless these references were made clear, the committees would be encroaching one upon the other.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe was of opinion, that the Convention could settle the question of these references when the proper time arrived.

Mr. WATTS said, he regarded this one of the most important committees on the catalogue. It was one that absorbed the greatest portion of the revenue of the State, and should therefore be increased. He would move to strike out the word "five," and insert "nine," so that the committee should consist of nine members.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the committee, number ten, as amended,

Mr. HOLMAN of Dearborn moved to strike out after the word "compensation," the word "and tenure." The committee on the organization of committees of courts of justice, he said, would, as a matter of course, fix upon the number of judges, and the tenure of office of each one; and the committee on State officers would have the same duty to perform with reference to State officers.

The amendment was concurred in, and committee number twenty, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. BORDEN here moved the appointment of the following additional standing committee: On the rights of married women and exemptions, real and personal.

Mr. READ of Monroe remarked, that he would prefer raising a committee having a wider jurisdiction than over the two subjects the gentleman from Allen had referred to. He would have a committee raised on legal questions not otherwise provided for, and upon the divisions and limitations of the powers of government. To such a committee the subject of Homestead Exemption was properly referable, as was also the subject of the legality and validity of claims against the State, and several other matters of that description. He was particularly desirous, also, of having a committee that would define the limitation of the powers of the government. He wanted that the State should be confined to the simple duty of government. He did not wish it to become a banker, or a hotel keeper, or a builder of canals and other works of internal improvement. He would move to strike out all after the resolving clause of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Allen, and insert the words "on legal questions not otherwise provided for, and on the division and limitations of the power of government, to consist of seven members."

Mr. PETTIT said, that the subject of homestead exemption, to his obtuse mind, appeared more properly referable to the Legislative committee, because they would instruct the Legislature to pass laws exempting certain property, real and personal, from execution. Here was an evidence of the absurdity of so large a number of committees, for one gentleman was stating that it was the duty of a committee to do this thing, and another gentleman to do that, and the consequence was that the business of the Convention would be greatly embarrassed.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that whatever course was taken with reference to that matter they ought not to adopt the first proposition, that of the gentleman from Allen. (Mr. Borden.)

It seemed to him that homestead exemption and the rights of married women were subjects entirely incongruous. In several States of the Union married women had certain rights of property guaranteed to them, and whether they adopted a similar course or not, they should be incorporated in the bill of rights. The subject of homestead exemption was an entirely different one. He favored the committee proposed by the chairman of the committee on rules.

The question being taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) to the amendment of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) it was rejected.

The question recurring upon the additional standing committee proposed by Mr. Borden, It was decided in the negative.

The question being taken upon the adoption of committee number twenty-one, on miscellaneous provisions, to consist of five members;

Of committee number twenty-two, on revision, arrangement, and phrasology, to consist of the chairmen of the twenty-one preceding committees;

Of a committee on elections, to consist of five members;

Of a committee on accounts, to consist of five members;

They were severally adopted by consent.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to take from the table the resolutions submitted by him, on the subject of a correspondence, by the Secretary and Auditor of State, with certain county officers, for information.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Chair submitted the following communication, which was laid upon the table, by consent :

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONVENTION :

The undersigned, Printer to the State, having been excused from participating in any action, in regard to the subject of his claims and responsibilities as State Printer, respectfully asks the privilege of having the question argued on his behalf upon its legal and equitable merits, before the Convention, by his Attorney.

J. P. CHAPMAN,
State Printer.

Mr. PETTIT moved, that the Convention adjourn until 9 o'clock Monday Morning; whereupon,

The Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, Oct. 14, 1850.

Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by Rev. Mr. BABE.

On motion of Mr. EDMONSTON, the list of standing committees was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALL moved to take from the table the resolutions submitted by him on Wednesday last, on the subject of ———.

The motion was agreed to; when, on motion of Mr. HALL, the resolutions were referred to the committee respectively named.

Number one was referred to the committee on salaries, compensation, and tenure of office.

Number two, or so much thereof as relates to a State Bank and branches, referred to the committee on currency and banking.

And so much of said resolution number two, as relates to creating corporations under a general law, was referred to the committee on corporations other than banking.

So much of number three, as relates to special legislation, to the committee on special and local legislation and uniformity of laws.

And so much of number three, as provides that no act shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; and upon the passage of any bill in either House, the ayes and noes shall be entered upon the journals, and that no act of the General Assembly be in force until after its publication in print and distribution amongst the people, was referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Number four was referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Number five was referred to the committee on finance and taxation.

Number six, to the committee on the legislative department.

Number seven, to the committee on education.

Number eight, or so much thereof as provides that all distinctions between proceedings in courts of law and equity shall be abolished, referred to the committee on the practice of law and law reform.

And so much of said number eight, as provides that all distinctions between different kinds of actions, also referred to the committee on the practice of law and law reform.

Number nine, referred to the committee on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representatives.

Number ten, referred to the committee on the legislative department.

On motion

Of Mr. EDMONSTON, the papers heretofore submitted, in relation to the contested seat in Union county, were taken from the table, and referred to the committee on elections.

On motion

Of Mr. EDMONSTON, the credentials of members heretofore presented, were taken from the table, and referred to the committee on elections.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

The committee on the employment and remuneration of a stenographer, to whom were referred certain resolutions on that subject, have unanimously instructed me to report, that by the twelfth section of the act providing for the call of this Convention, it is provided that a competent stenographer shall be appointed by the Governor, and that the pay of the said stenographer, shall be certified by the President, and shall be paid by the Treasurer of State, on the warrant of the Auditor of Public Accounts.

That in accordance with the provisions of the above section, Mr. HARVEY FOWLER, of Washington City, was appointed by the Governor to the office of stenographer to this Convention; and that the Convention has been duly notified of said appointment. Thus by the act in question, the manner of appointment and the mode of payment, are to be fixed; the rate of remuneration alone, remains undetermined.

The reasonable inference, your committee think, is, that the Legislature intended he should receive the compensation usually paid elsewhere, for similar services. More, your committee has understood, he does not demand; less, having engaged his services, the Convention cannot, in the opinion of your committee, properly offer him.

Your committee telegraphed to Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES, and also to Messrs. GALES & SEATON, both of Washington City, as to the rates of compensation paid by them to a stenographic corps for reporting and writing out, ready for the press, the debates of Congress. Their replies are herewith submitted for the information of the Convention. It may be proper to add, that in a column of the Intelligencer, in bourgeois type, there are, on an average, two thousand words.

Your committee report back the resolution declining the services of a stenographer, and recommend that it be laid on the table.

They also report the resolutions recognizing and approving the stenographer appointed by the Governor, and providing that he be paid at the rates of compensation usually paid for such services in Washington City, and recommend its passage.

And they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

WASHINGTON CITY, Oct. 11.

ROBT. DALE OWEN:

We have paid for reporting debates two last sessions four dollars a column of the Intelligencer—bourgeois type.

GALES & SEATON.

WASHINGTON CITY, Oct. 11, 1850.

ROBT. DALE OWEN:

The Globe and Intelligencer of this city charged three cents per line of printed matter, or four dollars twenty-five cents per column.

J. C. ROBB.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to take from the table the resolution submitted by him on the 11th inst., in relation to the expenses of the Government, &c., which was decided in the affirmative, but before action thereon, was again laid upon the table by consent.

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to take from the table the report of the committee on orders and rules.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on orders and rules for the government of the Convention.

The question being separately taken upon the adoption of the rules—

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 were adopted by consent.

The question being upon the adoption of rule fourteen, which read as follows:

"Any ten members shall have a right to call the yeas and nays, provided they shall request it before the question is put,"

Mr. TAGUE moved to strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "two." The adoption of this amendment, he said, would give a full opportunity for members who might be in a minority upon some important question under consideration to call for the yeas and nays, whereby their constituents could understand the positions they had occupied when such questions were finally settled.

Mr. DOBSON would state to the gentleman from Hancock, that the thirty-second rule provided that, upon the third reading of all important questions, the yeas and nays should always be taken and recorded. If the proposed amendment was adopted, any two of the members who chose to persist in demanding the yeas and nays would have them ordered.

Mr. TAGUE was satisfied with the explanation of the gentleman from Owen, and would withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. STEEL said, that he felt it to be his duty to renew the motion of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Tague) to strike out the word

"ten" and insert the word "two." It appeared to him that the good sense and wisdom of the members would dictate prudence in regard to calling the yeas and nays. For one, he was inclined to afford the utmost latitude for the expression of opinion, and for the public record of the votes of the members whenever they saw fit to speak or vote during the sittings of the Convention. He wanted no gag law that would influence the action of that body in the slightest degree.

Mr. OWEN observed, that he considered this privilege of demanding the yeas and nays to be one of the most important that could be guaranteed in any legislative body—and if he really thought that this privilege was curtailed by the present phraseology of the rule, he should certainly vote to strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "two," as proposed by the gentleman from Wabash (Mr. Steele). He would remark to the Convention, however, that the uniform practice in Congress during his term of service—which practice had not been changed since that term had expired—was not to permit the calling of the yeas and nays unless one-fifth of the members demanded that they should be ordered. In that Convention one-fifth of the members would amount to thirty, but he would not vote for the adoption of this rule by the Convention, because he knew, from the feeling apparent among members, that that number would be regarded as too large. It did appear to him, that the committee, in making ten the necessary number for the calling of the yeas and nays, had struck upon the just medium. Ten members were but the one-fifteenth part of the body, and if only ten members voted for a call of the yeas and nays, it fully proved that fourteen-fifteenths of them considered such a call a waste of time. Not more than four or five calls of the yeas and nays could be taken in the course of an hour, and as a saving of time, he thought the rule, as at present constructed, commended itself to the favorable consideration of members. It would be well for gentlemen to recollect, that they were, every day of their sitting, at a moderate estimate, putting the State of Indiana to an expense of over six hundred dollars. At this rate the taking of the yeas and nays would cost considerable. He would not vote for this rule were it not for the fact already alluded to, that the thirty-second rule provided, that upon the final passage of every article proposed to be engrafted into the Constitution, the yeas and nays were imperatively ordered to be taken. The intermediate questions that would arise before the final passage of the articles of the Constitution, would be of no comparative importance.

Mr. HALL wished, before the vote was taken upon the question before them, to state that he was a member of the committee who drafted this rule, and that there was considerable difference of opinion in regard to it—some contending that thirty, others twenty, and others ten, should constitute the number of members necessary to demand the yeas and nays. As a matter of compromise, the committee had finally fixed the number at ten.

Mr. BASCOM stated that he differed with gentlemen as to the propriety of its requiring ten members to have the yeas and nays taken. The argument of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) was a very good one, but was by no means satisfactory or conclusive, to his mind. He considered some questions that would come before that body—intermediate questions—as important as those voted upon finally. Every member knew very well that there was always a kind of manœuvring practiced in legislative bodies for the purpose of preventing the yeas and nays from going upon the journal. Under the rule as it now read, if there were only nine members who should rise to call the yeas and nays—and in his part of the State nine delegates would represent a large portion of the country—the voice of the constituency of these nine members could not be heard in that Hall. Those delegates were deprived of the power of showing to the people they represented, the vote they had given. He could see no reason why two members of the Convention should not have the right of placing their names upon the journal for the purpose of showing the vote they had given upon any particular measure.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley remarked, that he was a member of the committee who had reported this rule, and he believed that it was upon his motion that the number of members necessary to demand the yeas and nays—"ten," was incorporated in it. This was after the last clause of the thirty-second article providing for a call of the yeas and nays on the final passage of every article of the Constitution, had been adopted. Originally he had been in favor of the Congressional rule, requiring that one fifth of the members of the House, only could have the yeas and nays ordered. It was easy enough to get ten members to raise and demand the yeas and nays, especially if the system of manœuvring, to which the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) had referred, was carried into effect. It would require but little manœuvring to have the yeas and nays recorded on the journal. If it was the gentleman's desire to record his name upon every vote that was given, a rule could easily be adopted by the Convention making provision for the record of the gentleman's name, or the name of any other gentleman who might be desirous of so doing, on the journal, in the form of a protest.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wabash (Mr. Steel) and it was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of rule fourteen as reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion moved to amend by adding the following:

"But every member shall have the right to enter his protest upon the journal without argument."

The amendment was concurred in, and rule fourteen as amended was then adopted.

Rules 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20, were then adopted by consent.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend rule 21, by inserting after the word "Convention" and before the word "upon" the following: "so far as the same may be applicable, except the rules limiting the times of speaking," but no member shall speak twice on any question until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken. The motion was agreed to and Rule 21 as amended, was then adopted.

Rules 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29, were adopted by consent.

Mr. BRACKEN moved to amend Rule thirty, by striking out the words "to vote on the question;"

Which was decided in the affirmative. And the rule as amended, was adopted by consent.

Rule 31, was then adopted by consent.

On motion, the word "Convention" was substituted for the word "committee" between the words "the" and "shall" in Rule No. 32, and the Rule as amended was adopted.

Rule No. 33, was adopted by consent.

Rule No. 34 was amended by adding the words "of the whole" after the word "committee" and before the word "or" and the rule as amended was adopted.

The question being upon the adoption of Rule 35, which reads as follows:

"When a motion has been made and decided in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority at any time to move for the reconsideration thereof. But the question shall not be taken on the same day, unless by unanimous consent; and if lost shall not be renewed, or any vote taken on a reconsideration a second time unless with the consent of the Convention. If the motion to reconsider is not made on the same day, three days' notice shall be required of the intention to make it.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio, moved to insert the word "unanimous" in the sixth line after the word "the" and before the word "consent."

The amendment was concurred in.

The question recurring upon the adoption of Rule 35 as amended,

Mr. MORRISON of Marion, said he wished to call the attention of the Convention to a provision contained in this Rule, upon the subject of reconsideration. By this rule, if a motion to reconsider was not made on the same day, the subject proposed to be reconsidered would lie over for three days. Now he would ask with this Rule in operation, if a subject might not be staved off until there was an impossibility of reaching it?

Mr. BORDEN stated that the object of the Rule was simply to prevent any unjust exercise of the motion to re-consider. It was a well known fact in regard to legislative bodies that often times there were questions arising, that in a moment of excitement were passed and a motion to reconsider made immediately, and laid on the table, thus preventing any further action on the question. Whereas, if after a question was passed, a day or two was allowed to elapse before the motion to re-consider was made, there could be no complaint of hasty and unjust legislation.

Mr. PETTIT was inclined to think that the clause "and if lost shall not be renewed or any vote taken on a re-consideration a second time unless with the consent," should be stricken out entirely. As so far as he was concerned, he had never heard of moving a reconsideration a second time.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe, thought that no possible evil could result from this clause of the rule. On the contrary, it would have a good tendency because it would prevent, as had already been remarked, any hasty or immature legislation. It only gave the Convention an opportunity to retrace its steps if it were thought advisable—and to do that the unanimous consent of the Convention would be requisite.

Mr. EDMONSTON hoped that the suggestion of the gentleman from Marion, would be carried out. As no gentleman had as yet, made the motion he would move that on the last line of the Rule the word "three" be stricken out and the word "one" inserted.

The amendment was concurred in and Rule 35 as amended was then adopted.

Rules 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43, were then adopted by consent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warwick, moved the following as an additional Rule:

"Any resolutions or propositions introduced by any delegate for the purpose of referring the same to any standing committee, shall embrace one subject only."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley, moved to amend by substituting the following:

"That no member shall offer more than one Resolution on the same day, and that each Resolution shall embrace but one subject."

The question being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being upon the adoption of Rule 44, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Zenor offered the following as an additional Rule:

Any member submitting any matter which may be referred to any of the standing committees, shall be considered a member of the committee during the investigation of the subject."

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend by adding "but shall have no right to vote in such committee."

The amendment was accepted by Mr. Zenor.

The question then remaining upon the rules as amended, it was rejected.

Mr. BORDEN submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That three hundred copies of the "Rules and Orders" adopted to-day, together with the Constitution of the State heretofore ordered, be printed and stitched together for the use of the Convention.

Also that three hundred copies of the list of the standing committees be printed for the use of the Convention,

Which was adopted by consent.

On motion, Mr. CHAPMAN had leave to withdraw the communication submitted by him on the 12th inst., on the subject of State Printer.

On motion of Mr. MILLER of Gibson, the Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

On motion by Mr. DOBSON, it was ordered that the foregoing order of business be printed with the Constitution, rules, and list of standing committees.

STATE PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order, to be the consideration of the report of the select committee, appointed under the resolution of Mr. Milroy, to enquire into the legality of the claim of the State Printer to do the printing of this Convention.

[The report having been read by the Secretary,]

Mr. NAVE rose and said, he would ask the indulgence of the Convention while he submitted a few remarks in reference to this report. The question involved here was purely a legal question—a question that must be determined, if properly determined, with reference to the legal right of the individual who claimed to be printer to the Convention by virtue of his appointment as State Printer, by the authority of the State Legislature. But looking at the question in a legal point of view, it became necessary to settle the question irrespective of the applicants before the Convention, not looking to the interest either of the incumbent of the office of State Printer, or of any applicant for his place. It became necessary to trace the history of the election of the State Printer, (Mr. J. P. Chapman,) and the law under which the Legislature proceeded in his election. It seemed, from the state of facts presented, that Mr. Chapman was elected State Printer in the month of January, 1850, for a term of three years.

"There shall be elected triennially, counting from the month of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, by the General Assembly, on joint ballot, a State Printer, who shall serve for three years, from and after the first day of August next, after his election; and such printer shall, within twenty days after his said election, enter into bond with sufficient surety to the satisfaction of the Secretary and Treasurer of State, and Auditor of Public Accounts, with conditions for the prompt, accurate, and workmanlike execution of the public printing, and the faithful performance of all the duties required of him by law."

It seemed that Mr. J. P. Chapman had been elected under this statute. It was enjoined upon him by law to give a bond for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. It seemed that he had done this, and had informed the Convention that he was ready to do the printing for the State. The question then was this: was Mr. Chapman an officer of the State, or a mere contractor. If he were an officer, the Convention could have no control over him in that capacity; but if he were a contractor they could not annul a contract between him and the State of Indiana. To determine this question he would look into the decision of the court upon the subject, from which it was clear that the printer was a contractor with the State, and not an officer. He was, therefore, beyond the reach of the Convention. According to the definition of the courts, the public printer was to do all the printing that was to be executed on account of the State of Indiana, and such printing was to be paid for out of the public money.

"The prices to be paid such public printer are hereby established, as follows: For composition, per thousand ems, plain matter, forty-five cents; figure work, per thousand ems, sixty-five cents; rule and figure work, per thousand ems, eighty cents; press work, per token, common forms, forty-five cents; broad sides, per token, sixty cents; folding reports and bills, per thousand copies, on each signature, (distinct tables to be considered as signatures,) twelve and a half cents; stitching reports and bills, per hundred copies, twenty cents.

"The Secretary of State shall superintend all the printing done for the State, and see that the same is well executed, and shall measure and estimate the same, and certify under his hand and the seal of his office, the amount and kind of work done, together with the cost; which certificate shall authorize the Auditor of Public Accounts to audit the same, and the Treasurer shall pay the amount out of any moneys of the State in his hands not otherwise appropriated."

It became necessary for him, in the next place, to notice the powers of the Convention: The Convention could never have been called into existence, except under the existing law and Constitution of the State, according to the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, held in the celebrated Dorr case. In that case it was held that no Convention of the people was legitimately a Convention, unless it were called for some purpose, by express legislation, and a vote of the people. Therefore, in order to show the powers of this Convention, it was necessary to look into the Statute of 1850, by which the body was called into existence.

He now read from the General Laws, page 29, as follows:

"The Delegates, who shall be elected as aforesaid, shall assemble in Convention at the Capitol, in the city of Indianapolis, on the first Monday in October next, and organize by electing a president and all other officers necessary."

It was plain that the public printer was not an officer of the Convention. Nor was it necessary for the organization of the Convention that they should have a printer. Why? Because, in the Convention of 1816, for the formation of the Constitution which this Convention was assembled to alter and amend, there was no printer appointed; neither was there appointed a printer to the California Constitutional Convention. Moreover, it was plain that the Convention was to be governed by the laws which brought the body into existence. They could not go beyond the powers therein prescribed. As far as power was conferred upon the Convention, they were limited to the powers conferred by law. But with respect to the power of proposition to amend the existing Constitution, they were without limitation. As far as everything else was concerned, with respect to organization and the appropriation of money, the Convention had no power beyond what was conferred by the act bringing the body into existence.

Further, the debates of the Convention were to be recorded by an officer of the Legislature, appointed by the Governor and by him commissioned. Therefore, he was not accountable to the Convention, and they had no right to direct the publication of the debates, as prepared by the Stenographer. The Legislature placed it in the power of the Governor to appoint some suitable person for the purpose of reporting the debates of the Convention, and the Statute went on to prescribe further in this matter, that the Constitution, when amended, was to be deposited, with all the proceedings, in the office of Secretary of State; and the Legislature, at some subsequent time, would have the power to control the publication thereof. [He referred to sections 14 and 15 of the act of last winter, from which he read as follows:]

"SEC. 14. The roll containing the draught of the amended Constitution adopted by said Convention, and the proceedings of said Convention, shall be deposited by the President and Secretary thereof in the office of the Secretary of State, who shall file the same, and cause said Constitution to be entered of record in his office; and said Convention may submit one or more of the amendments which they may propose to the Constitution, as distinct propositions, to be voted upon by the people separately or together, as to them may seem expedient.

"SEC. 15. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, so soon as the same is recorded in his office, to deliver to the Governor of this State a certified copy of said amended Constitution, who shall, on the meeting of the General Assembly of this State at its next session, lay the same before them; and it shall be the duty of the said General Assembly to pass all laws necessary and proper for submitting the same to the qualified voters for their approval and rejection; and also for organizing the government under the amended Constitution, in case it should be adopted and ratified by such voters."

It was plain, then, that as far as the proceedings of the Convention were concerned, the Legislature had reserved by law the entire control of this whole matter, after passing from the hands of the Convention. All of the debates of the Convention were thus to be deposited; and being thus deposited, it seemed to him that the Convention had no right to order the printing of the proceedings by any other than the officer which had been provided by the State.

He would now pass to another branch of the question—the expediency of taking this course. A similar question to the one now before the Convention, had been adjudicated upon by the Supreme Court, in the case of Osborn & Chamberlain against the State. In this case it was held that State printers were contractors with the State, and if the Legislature take the State printing out of the hands of the legal contractors, and place it in the hands of a third person, the contractors can recover in damages the amount of the price of printing so taken away from them. The measure of the damages was the value of the printing. This question had been settled. If, then, the Convention had determined that they would elect another printer to do the printing of the body, they might mark his words, that no sooner than this thing should be done, Mr. Chapman could, by authority given to him, institute a suit against the State of Indiana, and recover to the last cent the price of all the printing of the Convention. There was no question upon this point. It seemed to him, with deference to the opinion of the committee, that this matter could not have been investigated by them. For it was as clear to him as the noon-day, that if another printer should be appointed by the Convention, it would involve the State in a double payment of the bill for printing for the Convention. And here he would again call attention to page 170 of the Revised Statutes of 1843, from which he had already read.

Again, almost all of the printing of the Convention would have to be done after the adjournment, so that it would be out of the power of the President to measure the work, and satisfactorily audit the account of the printer whom the Convention might appoint. It was for this reason that the Legislature reserved the right to do this work by the hand of the State Printer. He referred to the fact that the Convention of New York, which met in 1846, elected a printer under a law of the State, passed in 1845. The law calling that Convention together expressly provided for the election of a printer. The printing of the Kentucky Convention was also provided for by Statute; and the Ohio Convention, also, adopted the State Printer as printer to that body. In fact, from all the examinations of precedents which he had been able to make, he had not found a single instance to support the report of the committee. He confessed that his researches had been limited—very limited—but he had not found a single instance. He desired to be understood as entertaining no personal preferences whatever, either for the State Printer or any other individual, lesirous of being elected printer; but he did not wish to see the people of Indiana taxed double for work which the Legislature had already appointed an agent to do. He had submitted these few remarks, because he was satisfied that, if this printing were done by any other printer than Mr. J. P. Chapman, they would be paying twice for the same work, out of the Treasury.

He would now turn to another matter. He found in the proceedings of the General Assembly of 1843, a law which was passed after the settlement of the matter between Osborn & Chamberlain and the State, which was enacted in order to place the subject of public printing beyond all cavil thereafter. And since that time it had been required of the printer to execute a bond for the faithful discharge of his duty, within a given time. Thus carefully had the Legislature reserved to themselves the power to do all the public printing by this agent; describing particularly, when, and where, and how, the work should be done, and out of what fund the agent should be paid. But now the Convention could not vote the appropriation of one cent of money toward the payment of any man for this service. Then how was the printer to be paid? He was to be paid by the Legislature. But, he would ask again, upon what principle, and how he could receive his pay? He maintained he could not get his pay at all.

He had submitted these few remarks, under a sense of duty which he owed to the people whom he represented, and to the State at large; and, as a reason for the vote which he should give upon the final action of the body upon this question. He should be careful, in this matter, to avoid that course by which the Treasury might be doubly drawn upon for the same service.

Mr. BIDDLE said, that having participated in the action of this committee, he was unwilling that the vote should be taken without some expression of the views which governed them. He had hoped that some member of the committee better able than himself to answer the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) would have done so. But, as it seemed the question was about to be taken, he could not let it pass without a word. He was not prepared to answer the gentleman in the shape in which his authorities were put; nor did he think they bore at all upon the question. Although the gentleman set out by defining the question and examining into its legal bearings, it seemed to him that his remarks were not wholly confined to that point. Although the authority which the gentleman quoted, might be good and binding upon the Legislature, he denied that it was binding upon this Convention; nor was he prepared to adduce any authority. The gentleman, himself, had declared that he could find none to suit. The reason was, that a Convention like this was not a thing of frequent occurrence—Conventions were seldom called, and when they were convened they were so much above every other authority in the State, that he hardly knew where to find authority which could bind them. He should deny also, that any precedent, taken from the Convention of another State, was good authority and binding upon the people of the State of Indiana. Not that he would speak disrespectfully of other States of this Union; but, as authority, he would deny, in positive terms, that their action could be binding here. And, of course, it could not have a particle of weight upon a question purely of a legal character.

In the committee he had voted for the report which was made to this body. And he still thought he was right in so voting; although the subject had not received from him very mature deliberation. He was convinced of the correctness of the report by a few general reasons which struck him so forcibly, that he had contented himself without looking particularly into the legal authorities.

In this inquiry it became a material point to ascertain what was the meaning of the term "the State." It had many qualifications; there was the Geographical state, the Topographical state, the Physical state, the Political state, &c. He apprehended that it was the Political state that had made the contract, if any was made, with Mr. Chapman, and to that the State Printer must look. But he denied that this Convention constituted any part of the Political State. It was a very different question whether one Legislature could take away their printing from an agent employed by a preceding Legislature, from the question whether this Convention could do it. It was a very different question to alledge that Mr. Chapman was bound to execute the printing of a legislative body, and that he was printer to this Convention. It was a very different proposition, that the Legislature was compelled to give their printing to Mr. Chapman, and that this Convention was compelled to do so. By virtue of law, the political functions of the State of Indiana were merely Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. The State spoke by the Legislature; she had no other voice. Her judgment was pronounced by the Judiciary, and every other department were bound by that; and the hand of the State was the Executive. But where is there to be found in either or all of these departments authority to call a Convention? Did we not understand from this fact, then, that the Convention rose above all authority in the State? He did not wish to be understood as affirming that the Convention were without the restraint of any authority; but he affirmed that they were bound by the authority of no human compact, except the Constitution of the United States, which they had all sworn to support. He denied that the State could make a single letter or line, that could bind the action of this Convention. Neither were the officers or the police of the Convention any part of the political state. They found no place in the old political state. This Convention was the conception, the beginning, of a new Constitution, or government, if you please, and in that character it necessarily rose superior to all the power of human compact, except that which its members were sworn to support. As between Legislature and Legislature, the argument of the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) was probably true; but, as between the Legislature and this Convention, it had no application whatever.

One word more. The gentleman had stated that this State Printing was involved in a contract. That might be the case. It was not necessary to this discussion to affirm or deny that. He should probably incline to a different opinion, but he did not care, here, whether it was considered as a contract or not. One thing was certain, that the Convention Printing was not a matter of contract between the Convention and Mr. Chapman. Mr. Chapman was elected under a law enacted before this Convention was authorized, or even in contemplation. How then was it possible that they could be bound to accept of a printer elected or appointed when the Convention had no legal existence? We could not disturb any existing contract. Let the question be decided between Legislature and Legislature. One thing he knew—the Convention never made the contract for the State Printing, and therefore, they could not break it.

He denied that the Legislature could elect a printer, and bind the Convention to receive him, for if the Legislature could elect their Printer, they might also elect their President and Secretary. He denied that there was any power on earth that could fasten a single officer upon this Convention, or bind the mind of one member of this body. For if this could be done, it would be idle to talk of their power to re-organize the Constitution, and re-model the organic law. Such a doctrine would trammel at once, and most effectually set at naught, the primary rights of the people in their representative character, and also, in their character as citizens, to meet together and mould the government according to their wishes. Whenever gentlemen could show that the Legislature had power to elect a Doorkeeper or Secretary for this Convention, and compel the body to take them, then he would be willing to believe that the State Printer was Printer to the Convention.

The gentleman had cited the case of the appointment of the Stenographer: but he denied, in positive terms, that the Governor, however much he respected his person and his office, and the wisdom of the act of the Legislature authorizing this appointment, could appoint a Stenographer whom they could be compelled to accept. It was the whole purpose of the act of the Legislature to convene and organize this body. Further than that it could not go. He denied the power of the Legislature to go further than that; for, if they could advance but one step farther, it would be to subvert the primary right of the people. The moment the Convention came here, as a body, they were endowed with power to do every thing necessary (in the language of the act) to their complete organization, and hence if they wanted a printer they could elect him.

Mr. PETTIT [interposing, and Mr. B. giving way,] said, he understood the gentleman from Cass, to say, than this body possessed sovereign power; he desired then, to ask him, whether they could appropriate money? or whether they could increase or diminish their own pay?

Mr. BIDDLE said that was not now the question before the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT [In his seat]. It is embraced in the idea of sovereignty.

Mr. BIDDLE said, it would be time enough to debate that question when it should come properly before the body. He denied that there was any power on earth that could fasten upon this body any of its officers. He did not say that he would vote against Mr. Chapman for Printer; he would as readily vote for Mr. Chapman as for any other man, but with reference to the legal question, he repeated that no power on earth could fasten upon this body any of its officers. The moment the Convention had met, that moment they possessed the inherent power to do all reasonable things to effect the end for which they were called together. Even the old Constitution imposed no obligation here. The summoning of this Convention was a primary act of the people, designed to change and remould the elementary powers of government; and this was a body which could recognize no human authority except what was within these walls and belonged to the members thereof, and the Constitution of the United States. He looked upon the appointment of the Stenographer as a wise provision of law, and he doubted not that the Governor had exercised a sound discretion in the appointment; but he denied the power to fasten a Stenographer upon this body, if they did not choose to accept of such an officer. Why, as he recollected, the very first thing after the organization they went to debating the question, whether they would accept of the services of a Stenographer. The same law of the Legislature provided that the Convention should sit in this Hall, and there was now pending a question whether this body should not remove to some other place.

He hoped these remarks would not be taken as subversive of law. It was purely a law question which was referred to the committee, and, as far as his judgement extended, it was decided judicially—not that Mr. Chapman was not a good printer, but that he was not the Printer to the Convention.

The gentleman's argument was more in reference to the right, than to the expediency, of having such an officer: although he went on to show that the Convention of 1816 had no Printer. He (Mr. B.) was not arguing whether the Convention ought to have a Printer, or whether they ought not. The simple question was whether there was a Printer already appointed that the body was bound to receive as their Printer.

But it did not seem to be hard to answer the gentleman's notion of a contract, in this place. The Supreme Court of this State had decided that an office considered merely as an office, was not a contract. But the Court did not decide that an office might not involve a contract. Mr. Chapman had given a bond to the State, and what was in that bond? Why, he simply undertook to do the printing for the State. His bond was analogous to the Treasurer, or Auditor's bond, and it could not be contended for a moment that these latter offices involved either the essence or the terms of a contract.

When they come down to the question whether Mr. Chapman was the Printer, he agreed with the report of the committee. But whether Mr. Chapman ought to be the Printer was another question. It seemed to him that he ought. But he was arguing nothing but the legal principle, and, in doing so, he had looked only at a few broad principles; and he had seen that if the Convention should allow the State to interfere in one thing, they must necessarily have the right to interfere in other matters, which would be absurd. He had seen that they must contend for the right to protect themselves. The right to elect their own officers was as inherent in that body, as the right to the air he breathed was to his natural body, or as it was the right of any man to employ his good right arm to defend himself. The Convention might have as many officers as they pleased; they might elect them as they pleased, and for any purpose; and if the Legislature should undertake to give them one officer, they might give them another. The moment this right was conceded, there was a violation of the very first principle of self-government.

He did not expect there would be much difference of opinion with respect to the legal question; but when he came to the election, that was quite another question; while he remained in the performance of his duty as a delegate, he would not consent by his vote, to shackle any right which he considered to be inherent in the Convention. If he were arguing the question as to the right of one Legislature to repeal what had been done by another Legislature, involving a matter of this kind, he should take quite a different course.

He desired to notice another thing. Though he could not lay his hand upon the page, he had been referred to an expression of the opinion of the last Legislature upon this very subject; he did not cite this as authority; but he had been told that, after the election of Mr. Chapman last winter, there was a resolution introduced into the Legislature the substance of which was to confer upon Mr. Chapman the right to do the printing for this Convention, and that, upon the motion of some gentleman, it was laid upon the table. From this it would seem that testimony could be taken from the floor of the Legislature itself, that they did not even pretend to fasten their officers upon this body. He made this citation with diffidence, and not at all as a matter of authority; for there was not a particle of force in it, even if it were true. But aside from this, he would not yield to the Legislature the right, in any manner, to raise their authority above the primary act of the people; for that would be to restrict the popular power—the primary right of the people to establish and maintain such form of government as they may think proper. These were his views upon this question, hastily thrown out, and but illy digested, for he had no time to put them into book shape.

Mr. HOWE said, he should trouble the Convention with but few remarks in reference to this question. He had been waiting to hear from some gentleman of the committee the grounds upon which the committee had based their report. The gentleman from Cass had now stated those grounds. This would supersede the necessity of arguing anew the question arising from the construction of the act of last winter, authorizing the call of a Convention, as to the right of this Convention, under that act, to elect a printer.

As gentlemen had argued, a question might arise whether the printer was to be regarded as an officer or a contractor. It was clear to his mind, that he ought to be considered a contractor. That he possessed none of the elements of an officer, and was therefore only a contractor, and if a contractor the question was, what was the subject matter of his contract? How far did it extend? Why, clearly, to all the printing of the State. It was all required to be done by the very nature of the bonds which he had given, and those bonds for the performance of his duty, constituted a contract, which neither the Legislature nor that body could supersede.

These questions, however, were now considered immaterial on the ground upon which the gentlemen of the committee had seen proper to place their report. In justice to the gentleman from Cass, he was willing to admit that his argument contained all that could be said on that side of the question; but at the same time he could not coincide with him in the proposition, that this Convention, embodying the sovereignty of the State, was not bound by the act of the Legislature, or any other public body in the State. With all deference to the gentleman, he must be permitted to say, that the proposition was fallacious and unsound.

The Convention, according to his understanding of the matter, did not represent the sovereignty of the State, for there was a State Constitution already in existence under which this Convention was called. The gentleman's proposition, continued Mr. Howe, can only apply if we go back to a chaotic state, a state of political disorganization, when the people would have a right to assemble together either by themselves, if their numbers were not too great, or by their delegates, if they pleased, and form a government to suit themselves. I say, if that were the state of things, there would be some force in the gentleman's argument; but such is not the case; we have already got a Constitution which is valid and binding upon us, and must continue to be so until set aside in the proper and legitimate manner. Now, the gentleman, in this case, is driven into a dilemma. He is either compelled to admit that the Constitution is yet in existence, or that it is not. If it be in existence, as a matter of course, all legal rights that have accrued under it are valid and binding, and cannot be set aside; if it be not in existence, they run on without a government. But the Constitution of the United States itself, which we have sworn to support, would prohibit us from setting aside vested rights. We were sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and nothing was said about our own Constitution. Why? For the manifest reason that we have come here to revise and amend it. I say, then, that the proposition is unfounded that we represent the sovereignty of the State. As there is a Constitution already in existence, those rights that have been acquired under it are binding upon us. We are the mere delegates of the people, assembled here, not to make an original Constitution, as though none were now in existence, for we have a government, a Constitution, and we have a code of laws and public officers that have been brought into existence under it. All these are valid and binding upon us, and all that we have to do is to alter or amend the organic law of the State. We have no more authority than a set of commissioners, whether consisting of one hundred and fifty men or a dozen, or even a smaller number, having a specific duty to perform. So, at the time when it was considered necessary to revise the old code of laws, two gentlemen were appointed as commissioners for that purpose. What power had they? They had power to write out a new code and submit it to the Legislature. So we are here for the purpose of revising the Constitution, and submitting that revised Constitution to the people. We have assembled here by virtue of an act of the Legislature. We have not assembled under the Constitutional provision, which requires that the Constitution shall be remodeled every twelve years; but under an act of the Legislature. We therefore acknowledge the authority of the Legislature. We have no right to disavow its authority. We are morally and legally estopped from setting aside the act under which we are assembled, either in whole or in part. We must acknowledge its authority. We are, then, mere delegates, under the authority of the Legislature, assembled here for the purpose of revising the Constitution, which, when revised, is to be submitted to the people, and if they are satisfied with it, our work will be approved, otherwise it will have no validity.

So far as the appropriation of money is concerned, we have no power to act. We have only the power to spend what has been appropriated for us. And in my judgment, we have no right to go beyond the amount which has been appropriated by the Legislature for our use; and if we do go beyond the amount so appropriated, we shall be at the mercy of the next Legislature to make good the deficiency. Thus we are morally and legally estopped from denying the binding force of the act of the Legislature upon us, and this, I think, shows the fallacy of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. STEELE said, that having had something to do with the report which was now before the Convention, he desired to say a very few words in relation to it. He concurred entirely in the views of the gentleman from Cass. The sentiments which that gentleman had announced to the Convention, had impressed themselves upon his mind from the first introduction into the Legislature of the law authorizing this Convention.

During the canvass, said Mr. Steele, and before I announced myself a candidate for election, a large portion of the journals of my county represented to the people that I was ineligible to a seat in this Convention, for the reason that I held the petty office of Recorder. I called their attention to so much of the act of the Legislature as provides for the eligibility of any person who possesses the right of suffrage—the right to vote for a member of the Convention. They produced the old Constitution, which prohibits any one from holding two lucrative offices at one time. And in reply, I asserted that the hands of the Legislature were not tied by the old Constitution, the Constitution had nothing to do with it. It had vested in the Legislature the power to pass a law to organize this Convention by the election of delegates. Such was my opinion, and I entertain that opinion at the present moment, that the law, so far as it extends beyond the mere assembling of the Convention, is nothing more nor less than surplusage. For instance, we see clearly that the powers delegated in the old Constitution—the one adopted in 1816—gave to the Legislature no other right than to provide a law to organize the Convention. That is the whole extent of the authority which the Legislature possesses. The moment we become organized under the law, I hold, with the gentleman from Cass, that we transcend every law except the Federal Constitution. That only is binding upon us. We are here to consult the interests of the people, and it is one of our chief duties to avoid a profuse expenditure of the public money. It is our duty to practice the most rigid economy, not only for the sake of the immediate interests of the people, but for the sake of the example that we shall thus set. So far as the selection of a Printer is concerned, I have no particular choice. I have the best of feeling towards the present State Printer, and I believe he ought to be selected, provided he will do the work as well and at the same prices as other printers; and I am informed that he has procured the materials and is prepared to do the work, but I contend that if he does do it he must be appointed by us—his power must come from this body. But it is suggested to me that there are printers in this place who will do the printing for twenty-five per cent. less than the prices now paid to the State Printer; if so, I desire that the work shall be done by them. Mr. Steele added, that he should vote in favor of the report of the committee, and he should give that vote, not from any feeling in regard to any printer, but from an honest conviction that the conclusion at which the committee had arrived, was the correct and proper conclusion.

Mr. BASCOM said, he did not rise to make a speech upon this question, but he could not resist the inclination he felt to say a few words, when he saw gentlemen who were foremost in debate upon almost every unimportant question, as soon as a question came up upon which some talent might be displayed, sitting as mum as the day they were born. (Laughter.) The whole question, said Mr. B., resolves itself into this: The patronage of this Convention is to be given to a printer, and gentlemen here who are aspiring to higher places, are afraid to show their hands. (Renewed laughter.)

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to allude to the motives of gentlemen.

Mr. BASCOM. I do not impugn the motives of any gentleman.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the gentleman to explain what he does mean.

Mr. BASCOM. I mean, sir, that there are gentlemen here who give us their views very freely in regard to unimportant matters, such as the appointment of a doorkeeper, but when a legal question of any importance arises, we are not favored with their opinions. Well sir, the whole question is precisely this, who shall do the printing for this Convention? Now when I am called upon to vote upon this question I want to vote understandingly, and I hope therefore, to be favored with the opinion of those who have some legal knowledge. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Cass express his opinion. He did so, fearlessly, and in the main I agree with him. I do not think that we are bound by any law in regard to the appointment of our officers, but if I am wrong on this point I wish to be better informed by legal gentlemen before I am called upon to vote.

Mr. PETTIT said, he had no desire to detain the Convention with any remarks, but if the gentleman over the way had any allusion to him, in the remark that he had made, he had a word to say in reply. Sir, said Mr. P., I am very far from holding that this Convention possesses entire sovereignty. We sit here with limited powers. We were called together for a specific purpose, and I maintain that the only point in which we have unlimited power is that of making propositions. We have unlimited power to propose to the people of Indiana a form of government, an organic law, which, if adopted by the people, shall be the basis of their future government; that is all the power that we have. How would it operate if we conceive ourselves occupying a different position.

If we can elect our printer, then he must be an officer of this body, but it is contended that he is not an officer, because he is not required to take an oath of office. If then the printer be not an officer of the Convention, we have no power under the law to elect such a person, for we have only power to elect our officers, the law clearly contemplating the Secretary, Doorkeeper, Sergeant-at-Arms, &c.; these officers we have to elect, but the printer is employed by contract. Well, sir, I fully concur with the gentleman from Hendricks, that the printer is a contractor and not an officer, and that as such we have no power to interfere with his contract; but we are sitting here to propose to the people of the State to set the old Constitution aside and adopt a new one in its stead. Sir, if we consider him either as an officer or a contractor we have no power over him. It is said that we have power to elect all our officers, and our printer among the rest; but how will that tally with a proposition of this kind. The Attorney General for your State is an officer of the State. Is it necessary to appoint a new Attorney General for every set of cases that may arise? Or shall that officer be at liberty to prosecute and defend all suits that may arise, as well as those in which the State is engaged at the time of his appointment? You have a Secretary of State and you impose certain duties upon him. Shall he only perform those duties which existed when he was elected, or shall he perform all the duties that belong to that department? You have already called upon the Secretary of State to perform services, and you may yet have occasion to call upon him to perform other services. You may have occasion to call upon the Auditor, and upon the Treasurer for reports. Shall we say that it is necessary for us to elect all those officers, because we have occasion to avail ourselves of their services? Will you turn Mr. Test out of doors and put another man in possession of the Record and Seal of the State because you came here with sovereign authority. I believe that no man will go so far as that, yet you tell me that because you require certain services to be rendered by the printer, it is necessary that you should elect him. You want the printer to send in here certain printed matter, therefore, you must elect him. But you also want the Secretary of State to furnish you with copies of documents, you must therefore elect him as well as the other.

If the present State Printer should fail to be in readiness to perform the work required by this Convention, there is no doubt he would be liable on his bond for the non-performance of his duty to the State. Sir, we are not above the State of Indiana; we are not above the Legislature of the State, and let me say to gentlemen, that if the people can at any time, resolve themselves into a Convention for the construction of a new form of government, they may also draw the sword and perpetrate revolution whenever they please. I know it is argued that might gives right, and in that view all communities have the right to assemble in Convention, turn out old officers and elect new, but that is not the American idea. The idea is that one Government grows out of another as naturally as the new shoot grows from the seed that is planted. This doctrine was most ably canvassed in the great case of Rhode Island alluded to by the gentleman from Hendricks. I happened to hear the arguments in that case in the Supreme Court. The issue was directly brought up as to the validity of the Dorr government, and it was argued with great plausibility that the people possessing the original sovereignty, have a right to resolve themselves into a new form of government, and to abolish the old, without any preliminary steps having been taken by the old government. The Supreme Court denied this doctrine in the roundest terms. They held that even a majority of the people of Rhode Island could not have put in force any such government.

Well sir, let me ask the gentleman from Cass, by what authority are we privileged from arrest? Are we, as members of this Convention, privileged from arrest or not? I perceive that the law provides that we shall be privileged from arrest to the same extent that members of the Legislature are. Now, without that provision of the law, how could we avoid the ordinary or usual arrest of our persons here? We are not the Parliament of Great Britain, we are not the Congress of the United States, nor are we the Legislature of Indiana, in all of which exemption from arrest prevails.

Mr. BIDDLE. I do not deny that as citizens we are not liable to arrest, but I deny that by virtue of being members of such a body as this, we would necessarily be privileged from arrest. As citizens we are exempt by the law of the State.

Mr. PETTIT. I know, as citizens, we are exempt by the law of last winter. But I will put this question: Suppose we pass a resolution declaring that members of this body shall be exempt from arrest, not only to the extent that members of the Legislature are, but further. Is there any judge or lawyer in this room who would hesitate for a moment to say, that such an act of ours would be a nullity, as transcending our authority? If we had not been privileged by law, we could not privilege ourselves. We might by force protect ourselves from arrest, but it would be a lawless act. There can be no question that we are amenable to all the laws that are in force in this State. We can neither make nor suspend the operation of any law. If we can do that we can just as well order ourselves to be paid six dollars a day, or any other sum we please. The present Constitution of the State provides that money shall not be drawn from the Treasury, except in accordance with an appropriation made by law, and it is the same Constitution under which we are living, for our meeting here has not abrogated it. Can it be said then, for a moment, that we are without the shield, the protection of the Constitution of the State of Indiana? No one, surely, will entertain such an idea, or undertake to enforce it. The same Constitution says too, that no law shall be made, abrogating or impairing the validity of contracts. Mr. Chapman is at present the State Printer. He entered into a contract to do all the printing of the State. Shall we, a body sitting in accordance with the command of the Legislature, undertake to do that which those who created us could not do? Is the agent greater than the principal? Is the created greater than the creator! Yet the doctrine is propounded here, and argued with some degree of assurance, that we should take upon ourselves to impair the obligation of a contract.

Now I have made these remarks at the suggestion of the gentleman over the way, and after, it seems to me, that every gentleman here had said every thing he desired to say. I disclaim any thing like feeling in regard to this question. I am told by those who are entitled to respect, that the entire profit to be derived from the printing of the Convention, cannot exceed seven hundred and fifty dollars, and it does seem to me that that is a matter not worth a great deal of scrambling after. Sir, I am glad of the opportunity which is accorded me in the debate, of avowing my opinions upon the subject. They explain the vote that I shall give. I shall vote against concurring in the report, believing that a printer is provided for us. Nor do I agree with the gentleman as to the appointment of another officer. I mean the Stenographer, who was appointed to report the debates of this Convention. And, I ask, is it in our power to reject this officer? I hold that we have no such power. The Legislature created that office, and the Governor commissioned the officer. It is not for us to remove him. We cannot even enquire into his right to hold office. I will put a case: Suppose the Legislature had said that the Governor should appoint an individual to sit here from nine o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock in the evening, and keep a vigilant eye upon our proceedings, and take down, in Stenographic notes, every articulate sound that was uttered. Could they not have done so? It appears to me they could, and that we would have no right to interpose. The Legislature directed the Governor to appoint and commission a Stenographer; the Governor did so, and he is as necessarily a portion of this Convention as any man on this floor, and we have no power to remove him if we desired to do so, except for such cause as I will not suppose will ever occur, namely, disturbance or disorder, on the part of that gentleman; but in such case only, would we be at liberty to expel him or any other officer of this Convention. I take it that we sit here, as I have said, with limited powers in all respects, except one—we have the unlimited power of making propositions. But who pretends that we can adopt a Constitution, and make it binding upon the people of this State, without their concurrence. Is it not provided that our work shall be submitted to the people? Can we revoke that provision and enforce obedience to the instrument we may frame? No one will pretend it. Yet if we had the Sovereignty that it is alleged we possess, we could unquestionably do this. No Sir; we have been sent here to devise a plan or form of Government, to be submitted to the people, to be by them decided upon, and it will be for them to determine whether they will risk their fortunes and their future lives under it, or not.

Mr. NILES said, that as a mere abstract question of law, he thought the report of the committee correct. It might be most proper to employ the State Printer to do their printing, but he did not think that he was necessarily and ex officio printer to the Convention. He did not claim that the Convention was above law or could disregard the act under which it was called into existence. With the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit) he concurred in the argument of Mr. Webster, and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Dorr, that under what may be called the American political system, changes in the form of a government cannot be effected by violence. While he sympathized with progress and reform, he deprecated revolutions; and he was glad to know that were anything of the kind attempted, not only the people, but the courts, would place their seal of condemnation upon it. He admitted that had the Legislature designated the person by whom or pointed out the manner in which, their (the Convention's) printing should be done, it ought to be conclusive.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe—continued Mr. Niles—insists that we were bound to employ the State Printer, merely because he is a State officer; and inquires whether we have power to increase our own pay, as if the answer to that question settled the other point. But I answer, we have no such power, simply because our rate of compensation has been fixed by the Legislature. We have no discretion on that subject. But we are allowed the widest discretion upon many subjects, including the incidental expenses. The twelfth section of the act providing for the call of this Convention, in part reads thus: "The members of said Convention shall receive three dollars per day while actually attending upon the sittings of said Convention, and shall be allowed the like compensation for their travel as members of the General Assembly are allowed by law; and their secretaries, officers, and attendants shall be paid the same compensation as the officers of the General Assembly of this State are paid for similar services; which pay together with the pay of a competent stenographer to report the debates; which stenographer shall be appointed by the Governor for that purpose, with the other expenses of the Convention, shall be certified by the president of the Convention, and shall be paid by the Treasurer of this State, on the warrant of the Auditor of Public Accounts." Now suppose we should employ additional clerks and direct them to make duplicates of papers, to be distributed upon the desks of members, would not the expense be paid on the order of the President? We might, in this way, supersede any absolute necessity for a Printer. So, I apprehend, we may employ any printer we choose, to do the same work, or we may let it out to the lowest bidder. I do not conceive that this Convention is in any sense the State, as that term is used in the law relative to a State Printer. Neither would our entire population, if now assembled en masse to remodel their organic law, be the State in any such sense. It is the government proper which represents the State, and it is the printing for that government, which the State Printer is appointed to do.

Suppose the Legislature at its last session, had appointed a board of commissioners to look after any of the public interests, with the same discretionary powers which the act under which we are convened, confers upon us. And suppose that board were now in session here or elsewhere, and in need of the services of a printer, is it not clear that they could employ one or another at their discretion? If such a body could, so can we.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe asks whether we propose to dismiss the Secretary of State, and other State officers, and employ other persons in their stead. I answer, that they are doubtless the proper persons at the seat of government with whom we should communicate as occasion requires. If we need information from the clerks and auditors of the various counties, it is unquestionably proper to apply for it through the proper State officers. But we might in our discretion, employ other persons to procure such information, and make them compensation for their services. Mr. N. thought this a matter perhaps of little practical importance, but he was inclined to concur in the opinion expressed in the report.

Mr. HOLMAN remarked, that in order to arrive at a satisfactory adjustment of the question, it should first be decided whether the State printer was really an officer of the State, or not. By referring to the Revised Statutes, page 100, it would be found that the election by a viva voce vote was there provided for by law, of a prosecuting attorney, a State Printer, and other officers. Thus, there was a direct provision of law under which this officer was elected. He was an officer of the State—so recognized by the law of the State. He took it for granted then, that if this State Printer was an officer of the State, they must look at the law providing for his election, to ascertain the purpose of the Legislature in his election. If he was elected for a specific purpose, why then, in the exercise of the power delegated to him, he must be confined within the limits prescribed by the Legislature. It would be observed, on referring to the Revised Code, that this officer was to be elected triennially, and that among other things it was provided that he should discharge the duty of printing for the State. In connection with this provision, there were two other sections stipulating as to the manner in which the work should be done. The only question to be decided then, was, what was the design of the Legislature in creating the office of State Printer? As he had before said, the Revised Statutes prescribed the duties of this officer, viz.: that he should execute the printing of the two Houses of Assembly and of the principal officers of the State—but nowhere was it stated that his duties extended any further. The office of State Printer was created seven years ago, and the duties that devolved upon him were clearly laid down by the State Legislature. Inasmuch, then, as the printing of this Convention was not then contemplated, and no provision had been made for the printing of the Convention in the routine of duties prescribed to the State Printer, it must undoubtedly be concluded that the printing of that Convention was not a part of the duties of the State Printer, prescribed to him by the State.

Mr. FOSTER said, that as it was his intention to vote to concur in the report of the committee he should briefly give the reasons that influenced him in pursuing such a course. Being no lawyer, he would not attempt to reply to the legal arguments of the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) who had spoken in opposition to the report of the committee. But, with all due deference to the opinions of gentlemen who had spoken, he must be permitted to say, on the present occasion, that he differed with them materially in regard to the rights and powers of this Convention. For one, he did not consider this Convention as a mere creature of the Legislature, although such an opinion had been advanced in certain public prints of this city and elsewhere, and also by members of the Convention. He regarded the Legislature as one of the agents of the people of the State of Indiana, and an agent, too, which, in establishing all the forms that preceded the election of the Delegates to the Convention, only acted in accordance with the will of the sovereign people. In like manner this Convention was an agent of the people. He had been greatly amused on reading the act of the Legislature with regard to the Convention, to observe the condescension with which they provided that the Convention might elect a president, and such other officers as they deemed proper. Why sir, said he, this Convention possesses the inherent power of electing all its officers, a public printer among their number.

The celebrated case of Dorr had been cited by the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) to sustain by inference, the position he had taken, that the Legislature exercised a supreme controlling power over a Convention chosen by the people. He could not but think that gentlemen had misapprehended the celebrated decision of the Supreme Court on that point, because the point they sought to sustain was not taken into consideration by that Court. Gentlemen would not contend for a moment that the adherents of Dorr had assembled peacefully and lawfully in Convention. Yet had not the people of Indiana assembled peaceably and lawfully, and sent Delegates here to revise the Constitution? The Dorrites in Rhode Island were in a state of anarchy; they were revolutionists. Not so with the action of the people of Indiana in raising this Convention. They had invested them, as a Convention, with the power of revising the Constitution, and, for one, he, as a Delegate from the people of Monroe, intended to exercise fully and fearlessly the power invested in him.

There were one or two facts having a bearing upon the question before them, to which he would briefly allude. In the State of Ohio, the Legislature had passed an act convening the Convention that had assembled there to revise the State Constitution—similar in effect to the act authorizing the assembling of this Convention. When the question came up before that Convention upon the election of a State Printer, what did they do? [Mr. F. here quoted from the proceedings and debates of the Ohio Convention at some length, to prove that the State Printer there was elected Printer to the Convention, not because he was the State Printer, but from the fact that the Democratic party had a majority in the Convention, and also because they knew him to be a good printer. An express provision was made in the stipulation entered into with him, that the printing should be done at fair and reasonable rates, those rates being clearly defined.] They thus elected their own Printer, and he contended that this Convention had a similar right. Some gentleman, however, had said, that they could not annul the contract made with Mr. Chapman. This statement he would emphatically deny. An example of high authority was to be found in the case of Blair & Rives, who were formerly printers to the United States Senate, and who had a contract made at one session of the Senate rescinded at the succeeding session of that body. Yet Blair & Rives did not attempt to sue for damages. In connection with this point, he would read the opinion of a legal gentleman who, with all due deference to the learned gentlemen around him, had not his superior—if he had his equal—upon that floor; he referred to Judge Hitchcock of the Supreme Court of Ohio. [Mr. F. here read from the debates of the Ohio Convention, a summary of Judge Hitchcock's views upon the question of the election of a Printer to the Convention. Judge H's position was, that the Convention was authorized to make use of a certain sum of money for the expenses of the Convention, and as they could not get along without having a printer they had the right to elect a printer, and compensate him out of the contingent fund from which were defrayed the other expenses of the Convention.] Thus, continued Mr. F., I have given some of the reasons that will influence me to vote for the report of the committee. Common sense teaches me that we derive our power directly from the people, and that we, as members of this Convention, are delegates of the people. Why, sir, it is a common thing to be elected a member of the Legislature, but it is an uncommon thing to be elected a delegate to a Convention raised for the purpose of revising a State Constitution. Here are assembled able and learned gentlemen from various parts of the State, who, I doubt not, would reject with contempt the offer of be ing made a member of a body that met once a year to enact laws for the "dear people." (Laughter.) Here are assembled grave congressmen and learned judges who have been rustica-ting for a season, and who have now come here to give us the benefit of their more matured wisdom, and their great legislative experience.

With regard to the arguments of gentlemen on this floor, who have endeavored to obtain the election of the present State Printer as Printer to this Convention, I must say, briefly, in reply, they cannot come it over me. Their efforts put me in mind of an incident that occurred in the town of Augusta some years since, when there were not so many temperance men or temperance societies as there are now. It was customary there, when an individual wished another to drink with him, to say, "Come, won't you go it?" A gentleman, on the point of graduating had got in the habit of "going it" at rather an extensive rate; at the same time, he was paying his addresses to a very amiable and sprightly young lady, a resident of the town. This young gentleman, as I remarked, got in the habit of "going it," and while in full career, he graduated at the college. After graduating, reflecting that he had been courting the young lady for some time, he thought he would pop the question. So one day, with a palpitating heart, and with all due ceremony, he put the interesting query, "Will you have me?" "Ah! Billy, Billy, Billy," replies the young lady, "while you 'go it' you can't 'come it.'" (Great laughter.) Notwithstanding all that gentlemen have said, I have only to reply, that they can't "come it" over me. (Laughter.)

The question being taken on concurring in the report,

It was decided in the affirmative.

So the report was concurred in.

After the presentation of various petitions, on motion,

The Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

TUESDAY, Oct. 15, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. MYERS.

After several resolutions had been read and referred,

Mr. WOLFE of Sullivan offered the following preamble and resolution.

WHEREAS, the people of the State of Indiana, in calling this Convention, did not intend to abolish but to amend the present Constitution, and the Convention being now fully organized; therefore

Resolved, That the Convention now proceed to take up the Constitution, article by article, and section by section, until it shall have made the few but necessary amendments thereto, as asked for or contemplated by the people.

Mr. WOLFE said, that it did appear to him, that they should endeavor to fix upon some plan for proceeding at once to the revision of the Constitution. He took it for granted that it was generally understood by the members, that the people desired but few amendments made to the present Constitution. He conceived that there was great danger to be apprehended that they would do too much, and it should be borne in mind that if there were too many amendments made to the Constitution, when it went back to the people it might be rejected. The Convention might alter and amend the Constitution as they pleased, but the people were not bound to accept it thus altered. From the course that had already been pursued in the Convention, he was afraid that the great struggle was not to simplify the proposed amendments to the Constitution; but to secure the prominent positions in the Convention so as to obtain the praise of the people. Perhaps these gentlemen who were attempting to do so much would find upon returning to their constituents that they would be blamed in proportion to their labors. If they took up each article of the Constitution and acted upon it section by section, in regular order, they would know what was done as they went along, and when they came to the end of the articles they could add such as were necessary.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to amend the resolution offered by the gentlemen from Putnam, as follows:

"That the Convention will on each day at 2 o'clock, commencing on to-morrow, go into committee of the whole to consider the Constitution of Indiana and take it up by articles and by sections, until they have gone through with it."

Mr. S. said he was not willing to disturb the present order of business—an order which had been formed by committees appointed for that purpose and had been adopted by the Convention. Nevertheless, he was inclined to think that this suggested order could be adopted without interfering with the arrangements already made. In the forenoon the Convention could act upon the resolutions that had been referred to committees. In the afternoon they might take up the Constitution section by section and examine it. They could thus ascertain the sense of the Convention in regard to the character of the new Constitution, for he had no doubt that a large majority of the Convention had determined what kind of a Constitution was necessary. This could readily be done if the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole. The propositions that were there recommended, and agreed upon could in Convention be referred to the appropriate committees, by them to be engrafted in the article of the new Constitution. There was no use in keeping the Convention there all day receiving mere resolutions of enquiry. They gave no indications of the sense of the Convention, but left them just where they were before.

Mr. WOLFE accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam, and the resolution as amended lies over one day under the rule.

Mr. PETTIT moved to make the resolution offered by him on the subject of Grand Juries, the special order for 10 o'clock A. M., on Monday next,—

Which was decided in the affirmative.

STATE PRINTER.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the State Printer be designated as the Printer to this Convention.

He remarked that he did not propose, after the long and able discussion upon the subject of the printing of the Convention that had taken place on yesterday, to detain the Convention with any lengthy remarks of his own.

His object in offering this resolution was simply that an opportunity might be afforded for entering their names upon the journal, so that it might be known to their constituents who it was that took upon themselves the responsibility of taking the contract for the printing of the Convention, from the State Printer, thereby subjecting the State, to the alternative of paying twice for the same work.

It would be recollected by gentlemen that Messrs. Osborn & Chamberlain, formerly printers to the Legislature, owing to a similar violation of contract, recovered some eight hundred or one thousand dollars damages. He apprehended that the only question at issue was whether they should pay twice for the same work, and such a course he regarded as unjust and derogatory to the interests of their constituents. If authority to sue the State was asked of the Legislature it could not refuse the right to carry it forward, and he was satisfied that judgment could be obtained against the State. By referring to the proceedings of the New York Convention, held in 1821, it would be seen that a resolution similar to the one he had offered was there presented in order to arrive at a settlement of the question. The resolution thus presented was adopted. If any gentleman wished to strike out the name of Mr. Chapman and insert the name of some other person, it could easily be done, and then the record upon the Journal could testify who had taken upon themselves the responsibility of depriving Mr. Chapman of the contract.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick observed, that the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) did not argue the propriety of the adoption of the resolution, but simply stated that it was offered for the purpose of showing by the yeas and nays who would take upon themselves the responsibility of voting against Mr. Chapman. Now, he had voted for Mr. Chapman to be State Printer, and he might do so again; but when a resolution was brought forward declaring him Printer to the Convention with the threat of a call of the yeas and nays appended, if it was not passed, he for one was not afraid of taking the responsibility of having his name appear to his constituents in the list of nays. Was it to be supposed for a moment that any member of that Convention would change the vote he intended to give upon this question merely because that vote was to appear on the journal? He believed not. But there was a proposition contained in that resolution which had already been decided in the negative. That proposition was to elect an officer of the Convention by resolution. This had been attempted with reference to the election of their President, but had signally failed.

Mr. BORDEN (interposing). All that I desired by my resolution was to relieve those members of the Convention who favor its object, from the responsibility which will attach to every gentleman who votes against it.

Mr. GRAHAM enquired what responsibility would attach to gentlemen if they thus voted?

Mr. BORDEN replied, that if the contract for the printing of the Convention was taken from the present State Printer, an additional sum might be taken from the treasury to pay for the work twice, and upon returning home their constituents would desire to know who took upon themselves the responsibility of this extra expense.

Mr. CHAPMAN objected to the resolution, stating that it would represent him as being in an attitude which he did not wish to occupy. He had already been placed in a false position. In some respects, and did not wish to be gibbeted before the community. Personally, so far as he was pecuniarily interested, he was indifferent how the matter was decided; but the gentleman could better attain the object which he sought by moving a reconsideration of the former vote, instead of pressing his present resolution.

Mr. BORDEN said, if the gentleman from Marion desired it, he had no objection to having it withdrawn.

The resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

REFERENCE OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. FOSTER offered the following resolution,

Resolved, That the Constitution be committed to a committee of the whole, and made the order of the day for Thursday, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PETTIT objected to the Convention going into committee of the whole on the old Constitution. If they went into that committee they could not refer any subject to any other committee. No one would contend that in one committee they could refer a subject to another. The course that should be pursued was to take up the Constitution in Convention and read it section by section, and as each section was read, move its reference to an appropriate committee. The standing committees would then have before them each portion of the old Constitution, and all the imperative resolutions that had been referred, and would be prepared to proceed with the work of drafting the articles of the new Constitution.

He would move to amend the gentleman's motion by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting, "That at 2 o'clock on tomorrow the Convention will take up the present Constitution of this State, and read it by sections, and as each section is read it shall be referred to the appropriate committees."

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,)

Mr. DOBSON said, he supposed that all the resolutions offered that morning would have to be recorded on the journal, thus increasing greatly the labor of the Secretaries, and also the expense of their printing, for every resolution that was referred had to be printed and paid for.

Now, in committee of the whole, this extra expense and labor would be saved. No journalizing was done in that committee. They could not refer resolutions or amendments to other committees while in committee of the whole, but they could agree upon certain references, and when they came back into Convention the Chairman would report that the committee of the whole had had certain references and amendments under consideration, and on motion they could be referred to appropriate committees. It could all be embodied in a few lines at a great saving of expense.

Mr. FOSTER confessed he was very much astonished at the singular acuteness of the argument of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). It had always been customary in legislative bodies, with any public document that was intended to be distributed and acted upon, as for instance the Governor's or President's message, after the standing committees were appointed, to go into committee of the whole upon it. And he thought it rather discourteous that the glorious old Constitution under which they had lived so long and so happily, and prospered so greatly, should be treated with not half so much respect as a common Governor's message that was delivered every year. They had met there for the purpose of amending the Constitution, and now that the committees were organized, he contended it was altogether parliamentary to go into committee of the whole upon it.

Mr. RITCHEY remarked, that he had the honor of a seat in the Legislature, and from his experience in that body on the subject, he was not very favorable to the committee of the whole. He regarded it a useless waste of time for the Convention to resolve itself into that committee. The discussions that arose during its sessions would be repeated over and over again in the sessions of the Convention. He preferred going into the committee of the whole as seldom as possible.

He had been much pleased with the sensible resolution and remarks of the gentleman from Sullivan (Mr. Wolfe) that morning, with reference to the action of the Convention upon the Constitution. He believed if the gentleman had made his suggestion last week, before any order of business was decided upon, its adoption would have saved the Convention a great deal of labor, and the State considerable expense. If, instead of having those committees, the Convention had taken the old Constitution and appointed a committee on each article as they went along, the work of revision and amendment would have been carried on more speedily, and with less confusion than in the present straggling way. He did not know whether they could retrace their steps and commence anew or not; perhaps some gentleman would offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. REED of Monroe suggested, that after the committees had reported upon the subjects referred to them, then it would be an appropriate time for the Convention to go into committee of the whole. He presumed that in three or four days after the reference of the Constitution and resolutions to them, some of the committees would be able to report.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) and it was concurred in; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Several other resolutions having been read and referred,

On motion, the Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to take from the table the resolution upon the subject of the publication of the proceedings and debates of the Convention in the newspapers, reported from the select committee on that subject, on Wednesday last.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was accordingly taken up and read by the Secretary.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to strike out from the resolution so much as related to postage. He considered that those who received the papers should at least pay the postage. He had enquired of the city Post Master, and had been informed that the packages would be sent without being pre-paid, if put up and sent from the offices of publication, where members could send the proper direction, and they would as certainly go to their proper destination as if directed and sent by members themselves. And in this way the expense would fall where it should; those who received the benefit of the papers and documents would pay the postage. The postage was a large item. It would be some thirteen hundred dollars of the amount of expenditure proposed by the committee. He hoped it would be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the amendment of the gentleman was not now in order. When the resolution was laid on the table the other day, there was pending an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) and there was also pending an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup).

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that he was not aware that there was any amendment pending.

The question was taken on Mr. SHOUP'S amendment to the amendment, to-wit: "To extend the same offer to all the local press; and it was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of Mr. EDMONSTON'S amendment.

Mr. KELSO said, he hoped the amendment would not prevail. If the Convention proposed to strike out any thing, let them strike out such papers as could not publish the whole of the proceedings. The proposition to take three papers was not for the purpose of advising the people what the Convention was doing, but for the purpose of advising them fully of the reasons for what was done through the medium of arguments advanced here, to preserve which an officer had been employed at a heavy expense. Two of those papers were daily papers, and they proposed to publish the debates in full; and it was proposed that the Convention should subscribe for five copies of these papers for each member. Three other papers embraced in the resolution had declined to publish the debates in full. These were not daily papers. Now if they were going to strike out anything proposed in the resolution, he would say, let us take less of those who do the least for us, and more of those who do the most for us.

But it seemed to him, that by calling up the resolution, at this time, the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Maguire) was about to steal a march upon the Convention. Some anxiety had been manifested as to whether there should be a permanent location in Indianapolis for the Convention, or whether they should be left on the wing till the report from the select committee should come in. The feeling of the Convention, a few minutes ago, seemed to be in favor of waiting for the report, but now, if the gentleman could slip in this proposition, and get the Convention to commit themselves by taking newspapers here, it would evidently be a heavy clog against going elsewhere. He would not, himself, make the motion, but he hoped that at the proper time, some gentleman would move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR said, it seemed to him that it could not be considered either as wise or good policy for the Convention to keep their constituents in suspense any longer as to what they were doing. Every gentleman, he had no doubt, had answered the inquiries of the people, telling them that they certainly should know what the Convention was about; and if it was ever intended to pass the resolution, it really seemed to him that it would be better to do so at once. It would be better for their constituents, if not for themselves. For gentlemen could not be supposed to be without information, from day to day, of what they themselves were about. But they had been postponing this matter from day to day without the intervention of any matter, making it necessary that the subject should lie over. And now the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) asked for a further postponement of the subject—and for what? For nothing more than to give some importance to a mere freak about moving the Convention to some other point! Was business of importance to be deferred in this manner upon a mere hypothesis? Should the transaction of important business be made to depend upon the contingency whether the Convention might or might not go to Madison? It did seem to him that such a consideration should never weigh so much as a single ounce in value upon any man's vote. It would be time enough to act upon the Madison proposition, when it should make its appearance. That proposition would come up to be voted upon in due time; whether it were wise or not he did not pretend to decide, nor would he say that he would not vote for it. But he would say to the Convention that they should not lay over business of importance, on account of such a question, for it was a small matter compared with the great anxiety of their constituents, to know what they were about. Business was accumulating upon the hands of the Convention. Gentlemen could see what an amount had accumulated during this brief day; and yet not an editor in town was authorized to go on and publish these proceedings. He did hope that the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) would reconsider the matter. He considered it a wise provision of law, that the proceedings of the Convention should be promulgated by their authority. But this business had been permitted to sleep too long. He had been informed by one of the editors of this place, that there had already accumulated such an enormous mass of reports, that it would take some days to catch up. If the subject was to go again to the table, for several days longer, their constituents would not, of course, know the reason at once; but when they should come to know it, what would they say? They would tell their delegates that it was a very paltry consideration whether they should go to Madison or remain in this town, compared with the public enlightenment with reference to what was doing for the amendment of the organic law. But he did not wish to argue the question, or make a speech; he merely desired to avow his honest conviction, that it would be better either to dispose of this affirmatively, or lay it by forever.

On motion by Mr. SIMS, the resolution and pending amendment were again laid upon the table.

Resolutions offered by Messrs. Wolfe, May, and Tague were then disposed of, and, on motion of Mr. KELSO,

The Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, Oct. 16, 1850.

The Chair announced the following additional members to the committee "On Elections:"

Messrs. Anthony and Zenor.

Mr. BEARD presented the proceedings of a meeting of the "Friends," of the Congregational order, in favor of abolishing all distinction between the inhabitants of this State on account of color.

Mr. BORDEN moved its reference to "the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State," and observed that he knew nothing of this particular society, but was formerly well acquainted with the Society of Friends of the old order, and could bear testimony to their worth. There were ties that bound him to them, that could never be severed, and he felt always disposed to treat anything, emanating from persons of that name, with respect. He was opposed to the principles of conferring upon the negro race among us, the right of voting; and if the Convention should be called to act on the question, he should carry out the wishes of those who sent him here, and vote against it. But he was in favor of the right of petition, and for that reason, he should vote in favor of receiving it. For his part, as a member of this Convention, he should feel it his duty to present any petition sent to him from inhabitants of this State, if couched in respectful language, without regard to their sect, color, or condition. He trusted the petition would be respectfully received and appropriately referred.

Mr. OWEN said, I do not rise to say anything as to the question of reference to one committee rather than another. But there seems an apparent disposition among members of the Convention to reject the Memorial without reference, and to that point I desire to speak.

Now, in the outset of our deliberations, let us reflect, whether it be wise or just to pursue such a policy; to refuse even to receive or consider any petition couched in respectful language, merely because we may happen to disapprove its prayer. I am not much disposed to refer to the proceedings of Congress by way of precedent for the action of this Convention; yet it may be useful to remind gentlemen of the very long and somewhat violent debate which sprang up in the House of Representatives on the right of petition, at the time Mr. Adams reported a resolution to strike out the rule usually known as the Twenty-First, which shut out from reception, all abolition memorials. The debate dragged on, through the morning hour, for three entire months. During its progress we heard from Southern Representatives the most doleful and threatening predictions. Rescind this rule, the great safe-guard of Southern rights—thus it was they argued—and our table will be literally loaded with a daily mass of abolition petitions; clogging the regular business of the House, and engrossing, to the exclusion of all other subjects, its time and attention. They went further yet. They predicted, as the ultimate result, nothing less than the dissolution of the Union. But, in point of fact, what was the issue? Towards the close of the discussion, we, who were in favor of the right of petition, remained passive, listening in silence, without reply, to the vehement denunciations of Southern alarmists. We waited until the fire of debate had nearly burned out; and then very quietly voted down the restricting rule. What happened in consequence? Literally nothing, except that there was not one abolition petition presented for ten that had claimed admission before. From that day to this I have scarcely heard the rule alluded to. The subject disappeared, as it were, from view. From the strongest friends of slavery I have heard no assertion, that the least practicable evil has resulted from this recognition of the great principle, that, in a free Republic, all men have a right, so their language be but decent and respectful, to present, and to claim a hearing for their petitions, no matter whether the prayer of these petitions be approved or disapproved by the majority of the body to which they may be presented.

He would not, he said, positively claim for the Memorial a reference to any one Committee, though he was Chairman of one to which the reference seemed to him appropriate. He was not in favor of the prayer of the petitioners; but he earnestly hoped their petition would be received and referred.

Mr. FOSTER said, that he did not think the analogy drawn by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) between the reception of petitions in Congress and the reception of this Memorial was correct. Those petitions presented in Congress were for the abolition of slavery—this was a petition for granting equal rights to negroes. Whenever a respectful petition was presented, he had no objection to refer it—but it was due to that body that petitions presented there should emanate from respectable men. He was told by a friend near him that this was a petition from a nondescript sect called Congregational Friends—and all the anomalous and eccentric religious bodies in Christendom, and out of it—for he supposed there were Christians outside of what was called Christendom—this body carried off the palm. It was a sort of olla podrida—a hotch potch of the most motley description—composed of abolitionists, renegade quakers and negroes.

They were not of the regular order of Friends—a class of persons for whom he entertained the highest respect—but renegades from that body, opposed to all religion, and desirous of a kind of amalgamation in religion, politics, morality, &c. He wished, while upon the subject, to enquire of the gentleman who presented the Memorial whether the names of any negroes were appended to it?

Mr. BEARD, I think not.

Because, continued Mr. F., I wish it to be understood at the outset, that I am opposed utterly and entirely to negro suffrage. I do not want to grant them any more rights or privileges than they enjoy at present in our State. And I would further say that if we do not take some course to prevent the emigration of negroes to this State we shall be completely inundated with them—because of the severe constitutional laws that have lately been enacted by Kentucky and the neighboring slave States. It is important that we should make a provision of sufficient stringency to correct this great and growing evil. If no gentleman wishes to speak further on this question, I will move to lay the Memorial on the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I trust the gentleman from Monroe will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. COLFAX said, I have listened, Mr. President, to the remarks of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) with great regret, for I had believed that no opposition would have been made to the reception and reference of this Memorial. I care not, sir, whether this sect of Congregational Friends are peculiar or fanatical, as has been charged by him, in their ideas of religion. They are, notwithstanding, our fellow-citizens, and as such they have the undoubted—I had hoped, in this body, the undisputed-right of every American freeman to petition their fellow-citizens whom they elect as their legislators for such laws and provisions as, to them, may seem valuable or desirable. It matters not to me, sir, so far as this question is concerned, whether that body is imbued with one iota of true religion, or whether they admit individuals of another class and color to church association with them: they are still entitled to be heard in this Hall. Why, sir, we have established a rule in our order of business, that of “petitions and memorials,” which, in effect, calls upon the citizens of this State to present their views and make their wishes known to us through the medium of such documents as this. And are we now virtually to annul that rule? Are we to say to the people of Indiana that we will receive petitions and memorials from those only who concur with the majority of us in sentiment—and that petitions sent here by those who differ from us in opinion we will disrespectfully and contemptuously lay on or under the table? Is this republican, sir? Is this the true policy to adopt in a free State like this, or in any State? No, sir! I think not. This memorial is couched in the most respectful terms; and, although I shall vote against adopting a Constitutional provision extending the right of suffrage to negroes, as I told the people of my district before they sent me here, a constituency as deeply imbued with free-soil sentiments as the constituency of any other delegate on this floor, I shall cheerfully vote for its reception and reference. I shall vote for the reception of this petition as I shall vote for the reception of all other petitions, couched in respectful language, from the people of this State. When I act differently I shall justly forfeit the esteem and respect of every lover of free speech and free discussion, as this Convention will most certainly do, whenever they adopt such a course.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion remarked, that he considered one of the fundamental principles guaranteed by a republican government was the right of petition. It was a right which should be regarded as inviolate—a right which every American freeman was entitled to—and every petition of a citizen of the State of Indiana, couched in respectful language, presented to this Convention, should be received. He considered this course as more obligatory upon them than in the case referred to by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen) of the effect of the Twenty-First rule upon Congress. Here they were called upon to make fundamental laws for the government of the people of Indiana, for, at least, a generation to come. Bearing this fact in mind, justice and propriety dictated that the opinions of every citizen of the State in regard to the propriety or impropriety of certain laws should be taken into consideration. The Twenty-First rule was merely a provision affecting existing provisions of the Constitution of the U. States, while this memorial affected no provisions of the Constitution of this State; only those that were yet to be made. There he drew the distinction and although he agreed with every sentiment of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster), with regard to the subject of negro suffrage, he could not apply to white citizens the restrictions that might properly apply to negroes—but should vote to receive all petitions drawn up in courteous language. He should vote against giving the negro the right of suffrage and in putting them on an equality with white men, and should also advocate stringent measures to prevent their introduction into this State: nevertheless he held the right of petition sacred and should vote to receive this memorial.

Mr. READ of Monroe stated, that there was a committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, and to that committee he wished to have this petition referred. He was in favor of making a respectful reference of all petitions presented by respectable citizens of the State.

Mr. RITCHEY said, he was in favor of receiving this petition. If they treated this memorial with disrespect, it would create a great excitement throughout the whole State, and they would have petitions on petitions pouring in from every quarter. He trusted the Convention would receive it.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, if it was the opinion of the Convention that all men should be heard, they should act consistently. The Convention, the other day, refused to entertain a proposition of his own—a resolution of mere inquiry, touching public defaulters. He was not tenacious about that matter, though he believed with the gentlemen from Posey, that many things were worthy of investigation, that might not prove worthy of adoption. If it was proper to reject propositions of a member of the Convention, it might be equally so with regard to a memorial of a few citizens of Wayne County. He was in favor of fair investigation, and should therefore vote to refer the memorial.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he thought there was some misconception of this matter. They, as a Convention, were bound to act for the people as wise and prudent men. They should be careful of their own reputations and listen with an attentive ear to all wise and wholesome suggestions. But, he would ask, what effect it would have upon this paper, whether it was laid on the table or under the table? The question was, whether the principle contained in it was correct—whether it advanced just and sensible views for their consideration. The people held their representatives responsible for obeying the beests of their will, whether they apprized their representatives of that will or not. Now, if a petition presented there had reference to a subject about the settlement of which society was divided, in his opinion it was very proper that they should take a moderate view of the matter and not a hasty one. The Congregational Friends, so far as he was acquainted with them, belonged to no church, were not connected with any other denomination. They pretended to live for God and mankind, and embraced within the circle of their benevolent sympathies both black and white.

He could appreciate that kind of feeling when it came from the heart—then he could respect it; but generally it was a species of fanaticism, as he thought it to be in this case.

As far as the disposition of the paper they had presented was concerned, it did not appear to him very important what disposition might be made of it. It was a matter of policy to prevent irritation and allay all feelings of excitement among the people—but, so far as the action of that body was concerned, upon the principle embodied in the petition it would not be affected by the reception or rejection of the paper. The principle was the same whether the paper was received by them or not, because if the mass of the people favored the principle embodied in it, they, as their representatives, would be unfaithful to duty, unless they acted upon it in accordance with that sentiment, and would be held responsible accordingly. He assumed the ground that they were the people so far as they were permitted to act as the representatives of the people. These petitions were merely suggestions of the people, as individuals, to those in this Hall—the people in the aggregate.

Mr. FOSTER was very glad he had lead off the opposition, if it had been for nothing else than to call forth the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from South Bend (Mr. Colfax). It being a very dark morning, consequently, knowing that gentlemen could not see very well to write resolutions, he thought a spicy little debate, like that which had just transpired, would not be inappropriate. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said, he did not concur with the gentleman from Monroe when he stated that it was requisite that petitioners should be respectable in order to secure the reception of petitions they might offer. He understood that all men had certain rights secured to them, though they might not be respectable. Government exercised its powers and duties for the benefit of all that were governed, and although men may be entitled to different degrees of respect, yet all have rights. If they have not the sovereign right to govern, they have personal rights, inalienable rights—rights which all governments recognise in greater or less degrees.

He objected also to the statement of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) that these petitioners were not orthodox in their religious views, and therefore should not be heard—at least this was the inference he drew from the gentleman's argument. He objected also to the gentleman's assumption, that they, as a Convention, were entirely independent of the pre-existing state of things, and of the present government as organized for the State—that they were the people, and were not to recognize the rights of individuals. He (Mr. C.) thought that they represented the sovereign power of the government, which sovereignty, in our government, resides in and is exercised by a majority of the people. These petitioners were individuals—a portion of the people who had certainly a right to petition this sovereign authority which was about to establish permanent laws affecting the rights of individuals, and should they reject the petition of men connected with whose rights they were about to frame permanent and perhaps unalterable laws? These principles, he felt bound to say, were in contravention and in opposition to all his ideas of the purpose of a free government. He felt it to be his duty to oppose such sentiments wherever uttered, and wherever attempted to be put in practice. This question of the right of petition had agitated the people of this country for years, and they had finally decided that every citizen of this country had a right to petition. What sort of magnanimity was it, he would ask, in a government that would not listen to the prayers of the governed? And if the black man was not represented in this Hall, the only way of expressing his opinion, of making known the oppression he might labor under, was by petitions, in the same way that we presented our petitions to the great Being above us. What friend of freedom desired to trample on the man whose tongue was tied and hands fettered? These sentiments were not the sentiments of democracy; they were not the sentiments that would lead to the establishment of equal rights among men—they were not the sentiments which led to the formation of our present government, which declared all men had rights, and that it was instituted to protect those rights.

Mr. DOBSON said, that if the Convention were to engage in a dispute about the negro question for six months, he would rather it would be upon this than any other question. He did not wish to abridge the eloquent efforts of those gentlemen desirous of engaging in this debate, but he thought they had met there for another purpose rather than to reiterate debates that had occurred in other State conventions. He thought the question of the reception of this petition a very harmless one, and he should vote for its reference to an appropriate committee, and for having a report made upon it.

The question being taken upon the motion to refer the memorial to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State,

It was agreed to, and

The memorial was so referred.

REMOVAL OF THE CONVENTION TO MADISON.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee appointed to ascertain whether a suitable room could be obtained in the city of Madison to accommodate the sittings of this Convention, &c., submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

Your committee, heretofore charged with the duty of ascertaining whether a suitable room could be obtained in the city of Madison of sufficient capacity to accommodate the sittings of this Convention, and if so, upon what terms, together with such other information as might be of interest to this body, beg leave to report,

That, in discharge of the duty assigned them, they visited the city of Madison, on Saturday last, and addressed the following note to the municipal authorities of that city, to-wit:

MADISON, Oct. 12, 1850.

To the Common Council of the City of Madison:

GENTLEMEN:—The undersigned have been appointed a committee, on the part of the Constitutional Convention, now assembled at Indianapolis, to ascertain whether a room can be procured in your city of sufficient capacity to accommodate the sessions of that body, and if so, upon what terms.

You will please communicate your answer to the Chairman of this committee as early as practicable.

We have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

MILTON GREGG,	} Com'tee.

M. G. BRIGHT.

To this note of your committee the Common Council of the city of Madison returned the following answer, which is hereby made a part of this report:

OFFICE OF THE COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF MADISON, }
October 14, 1850. }

GENTLEMEN:—At a meeting of the Common Council of the city of Madison, holden this evening, in relation to your communication of the 12th inst., making enquiry whether a room of sufficient capacity could be obtained in the city of Madison (and upon what terms) to accommodate the sessions of the Constitutional Convention now assembled at Indianapolis, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, namely:

WHEREAS, A committee has been appointed by the Convention now in session at Indianapolis, to visit our city for the purpose of ascertaining whether a suitable room can be procured in which said Convention can sit, as the Representatives' Hall is too small for their accommodation: AND WHEREAS, We have learned with pleasure that said Convention have it in contemplation to adjourn to this city, provided a suitable room can be obtained, Resolved, therefore, That the Common Council of the city of Madison do hereby tender to the Constitutional Convention a suitable room for their accommodation, free of charge; said room to be well and suitably furnished.

The two rooms in view, either of which can be had, are of the following dimensions, viz: "Melodeon Hall," forty-five feet by sixty feet, with a ceiling eighteen feet high, and "Jenny Lind Hall," which is fifty by eighty-five feet, with a ceiling fifteen feet in height, both of which halls are finished in fine style.

Resolved, further, That the clerk is hereby directed to furnish the Chairman of said committee with a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

[Signed] H. WATTS, President.
Attest, F. CRUMBAUGH, City Clerk.

Your committee would further state that they made a personal examination of each of the Halls alluded to in the communication of the city council, and have no hesitation in reporting that either of them would be found sufficiently large to accomodate all of the members and officers of this Convention, far more comfortably than they possibly can be in this Hall. The "Melodeon" is on the second floor and accessible from the street by a very spacious doorway, and a flight of steps five and a half feet in width. This Hall is situated in the center of the city, although not on the main business street, is easy of access, and finished in good taste. It contains 2925 square feet, while the Representative Hall, now occupied by the Convention will be found to contain within the bar less than 1500 feet.

The "Jenny Lind Hall," although somewhat larger than the "Melodeon," is not so easy of access being on the third floor, it is, however, very eligibly situated on one of the principal streets, and the entrance thereto is by a stairway from five to six feet in width. Contiguous to each of these Halls are a number of well finished rooms which would be found well situated for committee rooms.

Your committee would further say, that they visited some eight or ten of the Hotels of Madison and ascertained that good boarding can be obtained at prices ranging from three to seven dollars per week. Besides, it is understood, should the Convention adjourn to Madison, that several private families will open their houses for the entertainment of as many of the members as they can conveniently accomodate.

Your committee would further state, that, sometime since, the Board of Directors of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Road Co. authorized their President (as this committee are informed) to tender the members of this Convention, in a body, a free passage over their Road to Madison and back again, at such time during the session as would best suit their convenience—and under these circumstances your committee are authorized to say that there will be no charge for conveying this Convention over their road should they determine to adjourn to Madison. Your committee are deeply sensible of the fact that this Convention cannot continue to hold its session in the Hall now occupied by them, without subjecting themselves to very great personal discomfort, and without greatly endangering the general health of this body. And they are equally convinced of the importance, if not of the necessity of a change in their location so soon as a more suitable room can be procured, nor can your committee see any good reason why the business of this Convention cannot be as well transacted in any other city or town in this State, where suitable facilities can be obtained, as in the city of Indianapolis. Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a proper regard for the health, comfort, and convenience of this body imposes the necessity of procuring another and more suitable place for their deliberations, and that it is expedient to abandon the Hall now occupied by the Convention, so soon as a larger and more comfortable one can be obtained, properly fitted up and furnished for our accomodation:

Resolved, That this Convention accept the tender of a Hall made by the Common Council of the city of Madison, and that when we adjourn on Friday next we will adjourn to meet at 2 o'clock on the following Monday in the Melodeon Hall in the city of Madison.

The report having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend the Resolutions reported by the committee, by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting the following. "That the Convention will continue to occupy this Hall during its deliberations and until it shall have completed the labors assigned it."

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. PETTIT said, that before voting he simply wanted to state that he should vote against the amendment, and he would give the reason why he should do so: for it might look as though he desired to go to Madison, which he certainly did not. He would as soon think of going to the moon. He was not going to vote for the substitute, because its adoption would bind the Convention to remain in his hall, which might not be the best thing that could be done.

Mr. RARIDEN said, if the Convention was going to continue its sittings in this Hall, or in any other Hall in this town, he would say, let it be decided upon at once. What was the object to be attained by going to Madison, unless it were to get a hall better calculated for the accomodation of the Convention. The next consideration in this matter was, could not a better hall than this be procured in this town? He had been appointed upon a committee to procure such a hall, and they had found two halls which could be procured, of ample size to accomodate this body—the Baptist Church and the Masonic Hall. Then why not occupy one of these? Was it a feeling of economy which prevented them from doing so? He would put that question; for he had heard it suggested that the proprietors of these buildings had manifested a disposition to extort from the State an enormous rent. That might be so, and if so, it was certainly a very wrong thing. But, like other men in the transaction of business, these proprietors had found out that it always required two parties to make a bargain. He would consider for a moment the economy involved. He supposed the price demanded for these Halls to be extortionate. The price demanded by one company was twelve dollars per day, amounting to seven or eight hundred, or, perhaps a thousand, dollars, for the whole session. On the other hand, he affirmed, that if the Convention were to resolve to-day upon this proposition to go to Madison, no business of importance could be transacted by this body till next Tuesday morning, while the State expenses would be going on at a rate of about five hundred dollars a day. [A voice, "six hundred."] He put it at five hundred, to be within a just estimate. This would be the cost of removal, besides other expenses of going and coming, and besides this, it would dissipate everything like harmony and good feeling between the two towns. He had a very high opinion of the people of the town of Madison. Whatever may have been said about that town, he remembered the time when she reached forth her arm and saved the sinking fortunes of the State, by her assistance rendered toward the completion of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. But towns would always act for the advancement of their own interests, and if there were gentlemen of that town who were desirous of subverting their own private ends, he had no kind of objection to it. He himself had found nothing but kindness and hospitality both there and here in Indianapolis.

But he was discussing the question of economy on behalf of the State of Indiana, and he could not but think it an unwise expenditure to occupy five or six days with this removal, for the sake of removing the body away from all the sources of knowledge to be found in the archives of the State. And here also was the State Library opening all its treasures of knowledge to members—they could not remove that.

But there was another thing in this question: Had not the people a right to look to the State for a fulfillment of all her obligations to her citizens, and should not the people be allowed to realize all their just expectations of the State? And had not the people a just right to expect that all the public business of the State would be transacted in the town of Indianapolis? Had not the public money been profusely expended in this town? Had not the State, in this way, induced men to give high prices for property, and to come here and establish themselves for life? Moreover, had not the State given the world, and especially men of business and those engaged in trade, to understand that there was to be such a convocation here as this Convention, and had not these men risked the investment of their capital with a view to meet the wants of this Convention? Would it be just then toward these men of business for the Convention to adjourn now, without, in his estimation, any adequate cause for so doing? Because one or two individuals had manifested a disposition to extort from the State to the amount of eight or ten hundred dollars, was that to be a justification for removing the Convention away from all the conveniences about this building, and from all the archives of the State? He was decidedly in favor of remaining in this town, but against remaining in this Hall; for he did not think the public expectation could be met here, where so many men were brought into so small a space. They might feel well enough toward one another, but they could not do the public business amidst so much jostling and elbowing, a thing which could not be avoided here. What was ten or twelve hundred dollars toward the accommodation of a body of men called together to perform the most responsible work which had been transacted for the State for more than a generation past, the business of altering and amending the fundamental law, a work which was probably to stand for a generation to come.

He regretted that he could not say more, but he felt that his health would be hazarded if he went more at length into these considerations. He desired most of all to say, that gentlemen should have no feeling upon this subject. If they chose to adopt the resolutions let it be done, or else let them refuse to do so. Or if it should be their choice to remove from this Hall to some other in this town, let them just authorize the committee to contract for the Church or the Masonic Hall.

Mr. COLFAX said, the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) had anticipated him in many things upon which he had intended to remark, and which he would not repeat. He held different views in regard to the powers of the Convention, from those which had been advanced by several gentlemen in the discussion on the State Printing; but he did not intend now to re-open that discussion. He merely mentioned this by way of explanation, because it was his intention to look into the law under which the Convention was assembled. He did not think the Convention was clothed with such absolute authority as was claimed by gentlemen the other day. He believed this body to be the creature of legislation, which carried out the popular will in calling the Convention together; for even the place where they should hold their sessions was provided by law and the expenses are paid by special authority of law.

After all, this Convention had been sent here to perform a duty, which could not, in constructive power, compare with the business of legislation. The Legislature could pass the most important laws, affecting the interests of the whole people, which would go into force by the legislative action of that body. All we can do, as had been before stated, was, to act as a grand committee of proposition. The Convention could make only a CLAY IMAGE, which can be vivified only by the breath of the people. Their labors would amount to nothing without the ratification of the people—unless that people at the time of their voting upon the proposed New Constitution, give to it vitality by affirming our action. It might be with them, as with the first Wisconsin convention, whose labors being submitted to the people were rejected; and another convention was necessarily convoked to make another constitution more conformable to the wishes of their constituents. But he only offered this statement as a reason for the reference which he was about to make to the law which authorized this Convention.

The law showed distinctly that it was intended that the convention was to stay here at the Capitol. It provided that the Delegates should assemble here and organize for the election of a President, and in the close of Section 11, it was specially provided that the members should have the use of the books in the State Library, in which could be found many important volumes, valuable to the members of the convention for information on the various subjects that will come before them. Now the Legislature certainly did not anticipate that they were to pack up the State Library and the Librarian (Mr. Dillon,) upon the top of it, and carry all of them on a freight car to Madison. No, they expected the Library to remain here, of course, and we with it.

Again: in case of vacancy by death or resignation, how was the new member to be qualified? The law provided that members were to be sworn in by one of the Judges of the Supreme or Circuit Courts, or some officer of the county of Marion, authorized to administer an oath. Fortunately, there are in the convention three judges who can perform this service. But supposing there were not? and the convention sitting in the "Jenny Lind Hall," as it is called at Madison, were about to swear in a new member, they would have to send all the way here, to Marion County, to procure an officer to administer the oath, while the new member waits in the lobby until the cars can bring that officer there.

But it might be contended that there was a precedent for this removal in the act by which the Constitutional Convention of Ohio adjourned from Columbus to meet again in Cincinnati. But what were the circumstances in that case? The Convention were resolved to adjourn over the warm weather until the first Monday in December. They had but one convenient hall for the accommodation of a deliberative body, in the city of Columbus; and on the first Monday of December the Legislature was to meet there. That body therefore, had a superior right to the building; and hence the absolute necessity for the removal. In an exactly similar case, the precedent might have weight here: as it is, it has none.

But with reference to the argument of convenience which had been already appropriately referred to by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden.) Here was the State Library and all its contributions to the stock of general knowledge, which members of the Convention ought to possess; and going to Madison would completely throw them out from the enjoyment of this important advantage. The State officers were here, and they were placed by the Legislature in a kind of connection with this body, with authority to command their services if needed. They would be frequently called upon for information upon various subjects of vast importance to the deliberations here. One or two of these resolutions of inquiry had been passed already. But if they were to go to Madison, all of these facilities for information would be placed further off. Further more, on the score of economy, of which the friends of the Madison change have talked much, there was the consideration of extra mileage to be reckoned amongst the expenses of the proposed removal. The whole 150 members of the Convention would have to travel 86 miles each to Madison, and fully two-thirds of them, 100, would be compelled, at the adjournment, to return home via Indianapolis. This would make 21,000 extra miles to be paid for amongst the expenses of the Convention, amounting to $2,625; which with several days that will be lost by the time spent in the removal, with the confusion that would prevent action for a short time after, at $600 per day, would make the extra expenses incurred by this removal at least $4,000.

Again: the local presses of the State are deeply interested in the proceedings of this body, in copying them for their readers, and thus diffusing reliable and full information of our acts. They have, therefore, effected an exchange with one or all the papers here, some of which are large enough to publish either full reports by their reporters, or the entire Stenographic report of the debates if that is ordered. But the papers at Madison are smaller in size, as is well known—they could furnish only brief reports—and their exchange with the local press being much more restricted, would prevent as extensive a dissemination of our proceedings amongst the people.

Whether the Convention would continue to sit in this Hall, was a matter of indifference to himself, personally. He would not insist upon anything only that the Convention should not remove beyond the limits of the Capital of the State. He insisted upon this, because gentlemen were all now settled down here, and established in their several boarding places: and because he did not believe that the people of Madison were in a situation immediately, not having anticipated such a removal, to accommodate them similarly.

Besides this, and more than all, the success of the proposition would not be a compliance with the expectations of the people. The people had not expected them to make a sort of traveling menagerie of this body; and, he ventured to say, that no law could have passed the Legislature contemplating a session of the Convention at any other place than at Indianapolis. If, then, gentlemen had come here fairly to represent the wishes of the people, they should be willing to give to the law under which they had assembled, the only construction which it would bear. In this way they would discharge their duty as representatives, for, although they claimed such absolute and uncontrollable power, they could not divest themselves of their representative character.

In regard to the proposition to go into the Masonic Hall, the citizens of Indianapolis had certainly made a most liberal proposition, if the change of rooms was desired. They had said to the committee—"Set your own price for the rent of the Hall, whether one dollar, or five, or eight dollars, per day, and we will ourselves pay the rest." The Legislature had contemplated that this Hall might be found too crowded, for they had expressly authorized the State officers to hire another room, but had only authorized them to offer a sum which all considered inadequate. But now, if we do desire for health, or comfort, or convenience, to change our present quarters, what fairer or more honorable proposition could we have asked or expected of the liberal citizens of this town?

For these reasons he hoped the report would not be adopted.

Mr. DOBSON said, this seemed to be a kind of three-sided question. He was in favor of taking the vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan (Mr. Wolfe) first. But he wanted, first of all, to know whether they were to leave this Hall or not. If they were to leave this hall, then it was to be determined where they would go. For one, he was for remaining right where he was. This was the people's Hall. It had been provided for the accommodation of the Convention, and he thought wisely provided. Connected with this Hall were the committee rooms, the State Library, the public records, besides other conveniences which he would not stop to enumerate; and here was the advantage of the neighborhood of the public offices, which had already been referred to. On the other hand, if the Convention should determine to go to Madison, it would occupy at least five or six days, at a cost of six hundred dollars per day, before they could get under way with the business of the Convention there, making three thousand dollars, aside from the mileage estimate of two thousand five hundred dollars, by the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) making five thousand dollars difference in the public expenditure, between staying here and going to Madison. He admitted that they were crowded a little here, but he would prefer to be crowded a little himself, rather than crowd out their constituents. They were provided with lobbies here, where their constituents could come in and inspect their doings. He was always glad to see them around, and he could wish to see more of them. If they removed their sittings from this Hall, he would ask where could they get another with accommodating lobbies! Should they go into a concert-room, their constituents would either have to go into the pit, or have their hats chalked in the hall, so that the door-keeper could tell whether to put them out or not. Again, the people had sent them here to transact business at the expense of the State, and it was a question with him whether many of their constituents at home were not more crowded than they were. They had a good roof over them, and solid walls around them, and good chairs to sit upon. Whoever mingled with the people would find many of their constituents who were not better accommodated. And gentlemen should remember, that when they themselves go upon the stump, they are content to sit upon the lowest seat, and lie upon the worst bed; and they should remember how they used to kiss all the little ragged children, and swear, at every house, that they had the prettiest children in the world. But now, so soon as gentlemen had got here, they seemed, all at once, to have become very choice about their accommodations. For himself, he had taken a seat out there upon the confines of the Hall; and he preferred to retain it rather than take the chance of a removal; for if they cut loose from that Hall, they might go to Madison, or Cincinnati, or Louisville, or wherever they choose, he did not know but that they might congregate upon the Grand Prairie. It was reasonable to suppose, that about the time of the organization of the body they would be more crowded, than after the time when the committees begin to work. For himself, he expected, for about half the time, whilst the speaking would be going on, to be amused and interested outside of the bar. He was on the confines now. He had selected a place there for his seat, about two feet one way and five feet the other. This space he divided with another member, and, although he was the longest-legged man but one in the Hall, yet he had learned how to get along well enough.

Mr. KENT moved to commit the resolutior and amendment to a select committee of "five," with instructions to enquire by letter whether a more commodious room and cheaper board cannot be secured at some other point on the Ohio river, and to report the result of such investigation to this Convention on the third Monday in December next.

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Floyd, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. KELSO said, that as to whether they should leave this Hall or not, he cared very little. He was to some extent like his friend from Owen. He had been raised in the bush, and, as the common saying was, rocked in a sugar trough, and accustomed to inconveniences all his life; and he believed he could endure the inconveniences of this Hall as well as any other man; for that it was extremely inconvenient and uncomfortable no one would dispute: but, as he had said, inconvenience and discomfort he had been accustomed to. The question first to be settled, however, was, whether they would leave this place or not.

He did not think that his friend from St. Joseph knew anything more about our rights and privileges than he supposed he did. [A laugh.] According to that gentleman's opinion this Convention was the creature of the Legislature. Suppose, said Mr. Kelso, the Legislature had taken it into their heads to enact as a part of the law relating to this Convention, that we should make certain amendments in the Constitution and none other; I ask would they not have the same right to do so, as to insist in the act what they have inserted? and would we be bound to comply with such a provision of the act as that? I do not believe that any man here would rise and say that we would. Seven-tenths at least of the members of this Convention, I am sure, know better. I maintain then that we have the power, under the law, to remove from Indianapolis and go wheresoever we please, so that we keep within the limits of the State.

Mr. COLFAX. Why must we keep within the limits of the State.

Mr. KELSO. Because we have no business out of it.

I sir, was one of the committee that was appointed to ascertain whether a more convenient Hall could be obtained in Indianapolis. The committee promptly discharged their duty, and reported to the Convention that a proposition was made to us such as we did not feel at liberty to recommend the adoption of; there was not a single member of the committee in favor of hiring the Hall that was offered to us, at the price that was demanded for it; we therefore simply submitted the proposition, and it was laid on the table. A committee was then appointed to go to Madison and ascertain what accommodation could be obtained for the Convention at that place. I was one of that committee. The duty entrusted to it has been faithfully performed, and the facts correctly stated to the Convention. Now what the Convention may determine upon is a matter that I care very little about.— If you determine to remain here I am satisfied; but if you determine to remove I claim a voice as to where we shall go.

I am rather in favor of leaving it an open question to be decided hereafter, and for that reason I shall vote in favor of the amendment. I would sit here rather than accept the Masonic Hall at an exorbitant price. Indeed, I am not in favor of taking it upon any terms. When they thought they had us by the collar, and that we could not escape, they were disposed to take from the public Treasury the exorbitant sum of fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars, for its use. I am opposed now to having it at any price.

Mr. WOLFE said, that it was not his purpose in introducing the amendment to give any preference to either Indianapolis or Madison. He had introduced it in justice to their constituents at large. He believed this was the place in which the Convention should sit, but if the Convention should determine otherwise, then he was for going where the best accommodation could be procured.

Mr. HADDON moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "unless this Convention may find it to be, to the interest of the State, and comfort of said Convention to move to some other room in this city."

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson said, that he did not intend to detain the Convention with a speech. He desired to say, however, that if the Convention should determine to remove to Madison, it would be very gratifying to his feelings and to the people of that place and its vicinity. His constituents would be pleased to have the opportunity of attending the meetings of this Convention, of listening to the debates that will take place, and of making the acquaintance of the Delegates, some of whom have already distinguished themselves in the councils of the State and Nation, and others of whom will, no doubt, hereafter become equally distinguished.

A committee of your appointment has visited Madison to ascertain whether suitable accommodations for the Convention could there be procured, and upon what terms. The report of that committee is before you. It does not become me to say whether the citizens of that place have tendered to you a hospitable welcome, nor to contrast the spirit manifested by them with that which has been exhibited here. I have nothing to say as to the compensation demanded of this Convention for the use of the Masonic Hall, or other houses in this city. If those having charge of these buildings thought they could drive a hard bargain with us and have shown a disposition so to do, they have but manifested the selfishness of human nature. But, sir, in advocating this removal I wish to say nothing in disparagement of the citizens of Indianapolis. They have always treated me well, fully as well as I deserved, and I have among them many of my most valued friends and acquaintances. I do not consider that there is any thing in the law under which we are assembled that requires us to continue our sessions here. We may ad-jour to any point in the State if it becomes necessary so to do for our comfort, health, or the convenient transaction of our business, and there is certainly nothing wrong in a fair competition for whatever benefits may accrue to the place in which our sessions may be held. I am influenced by no hostility to this city in the vote I shall give. The citizens of Madison are neither envious nor jealous of the growth and prosperity of Indianapolis, but rejoice in her improvement as they do in that of all parts of our State and country, and I have only to regret that on some previous occasions, a similar feeling has not been manifested towards Madison. Permit me to say that, in my opinion, a very unjust and unfounded prejudice against Madison, exists in many parts of our State—a prejudice that much industry has been employed to extend, and one which a better acquaintance with our city and her citizens would do much to remove; and this, sir, is one reason why I desire that the members of this Convention, representing every part of the State, may have the opportunity of spending a few weeks in the city of Madison.

But, Mr. President, whether we shall remove from this city or not, I feel anxious that we should leave this Hall. I have had the experience of but one session here, you have had the experience of several, and I have no doubt that every person who has served a session in this Hall must be aware of the great sacrifice of health to which the members of the Legislature are here subjected. My health was seriously impaired the winter I was here, and I attribute the injury I sustained to the foul atmosphere I was compelled to breathe in this Hall. We do not feel this evil now, while the weather is pleasant, the windows all open, and we have the air fresh and pure from the surrounding country; but, sir, when the cold weather comes, as soon it will, and these windows have to be closed, and we are shut up here in these crowded seats, and our lobbies are thronged with visitors, all breathing over and over again the same atmosphere, until it becomes foul and sickening, then sir, we will all realize how unfit is this Hall for the accommodation of such an assemblage. Some of us will not only be compelled to leave here on account of our impaired health, but unless we are more fortunate than many who have occupied these seats before us, may be sent to our long homes in consequence of the want of any proper arrangements for the ventilation of this Hall. Moreover, I am informed that the space between the floor and the ceiling below was filled with mortar, and of course that makes the floor very cold; and gentlemen sitting here, especially when their boots are damp, will be liable to take severe colds before they are aware of it. Sir, this Hall is but little better than a slaughter house of the Representatives of the people. Nor is this the only objection. It is badly constructed for the purposes of a deliberative assembly. It is not an easy Hall to speak in, and of course is not a good one to hear in. Indeed, if the architect who constructed this Hall had undertaken to violate all the laws of health and acoustics in its construction, he could not have been much more successful than he has been. I think, therefore, that we ought to endeavor to procure some place for our meetings where we can be more comfortably situated and our health exposed to less danger.

This will prove the better economy in the end. It is impossible for us to continue in session long at a time here, and while we are so uncomfortably situated we will be in session but a few hours per day, and consequently it will be a greater number of days before our task is accomplished.

A few words in reply to some of the objections urged against the proposed removal to Madison. One gentleman suggests that there are no newspapers there capable of publishing the proceedings of this Convention. There is one daily paper published here, and there are two daily papers published there, one of which is near the size of the Daily Journal, and both of which would, no doubt, be promptly enlarged if it should become necessary for them to publish our proceedings and debates.

Another gentleman seems to think that there is a great and unusual concentration of light and knowledge in this city, especially in the State Library. If this is the case, the facilities of communication between the two cities is so great that Madison can readily borrow a few santillations of this light if necessary, and all the books and documents from here that we possibly can need, can be procured with the greatest convenience. In regard to the mileage of the delegates, the removal can occasion but little difference, for generally about the time that we shall probably adjourn, the roads are almost impassible, and in addition to those who otherwise would return to their homes by the way of Madison, many of the delegates, some of them even living in the Wabash country will proceed to Madison and thence by water to the places of their residence, or as near to them as they can go by steamboats. Under the arrangement suggested by the committee it will cost the delegates nothing to go to Madison, and they ought therefore to charge no additional mileage for going there.

I wish, Mr. President, before I take my seat, to make an explanation with reference to the free passage in the cars to Madison, which the committee state they are authorized to say will be afforded to the members of this Convention, in the event of its removal. The President of the Rail Road Company, has not, in any manner, interfered in this question, and I do not wish that it should even seem that he had so interfered. The board of directors of the Company, at its last meeting, directed the President to tender to the members of this Convention a free passage to and from Madison, at such time during the session as the Convention might designate; and I understand that the President, when applied to by the committee on this subject, stated that he should extend the invitation as directed, and the Convention might avail themselves of it if they pleased, and whenever they pleased, whether there was a removal or not.

And now, Mr. President, having occupied the attention of the Convention longer than I anticipated, I will only add, that, as one of the delegates from Jefferson county, however much I might be gratified by the adjournment of the Convention to Madison, I have not and will not now urge an adjournment. We are not there accustomed to invite our friends to partake of our hospitalities and then beg them to accept our invitation. If the Convention should go to Madison, I trust the delegates will not be disappointed in any of their reasonable expectations as to the accommodations they would there enjoy, as for myself, I would much prefer that we should remain here than that any such disappointment should occur.

Mr. STEELE said, he desired to make a few remarks; that he would promise not to detain the Convention long; first, as to the accommodations here. Gentlemen were complaining of being crowded. He recollected the first morning he came into the Hall, he traveled around and saw all the desks occupied. At last he came round to where he was now sitting, and importuned his friends to give him a place, and they did so, and ever since that time five of them had been sitting at two desks. He supposed other members were situated very much in the same way, but for his own part he had got quite used to it, and was now sitting quite comfortably among his friends. His constituents, according to his impression, had designated this legislative Hall as the place where the Convention should hold its sittings, and it occurred to him, that if they were to remove to Madison, or even to the Masonic Hall in this city, it would impose upon him the duty of returning at once to the bosom of those who elected him. He had come here for the express purpose of putting in execution what he understood to be the will of his constituents. This was the course he expected to pursue. He intended to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, and the vote of the Convention upon that amendment would decide the question and put it at rest. His friend from Switzerland had stated that he had been enured to hardships. He (Mr. S.) could say, also, that he had sat in legislative halls that were quite as small and inconvenient as this. He was quite as comfortably accommodated now as were the members of the Legislature who met in the old court-house; and as the gentleman had remarked, in relation to the situation of their constituents at home, his experience during his canvass was, that he was frequently crowded into cabins, where there was scarcely room for the family, without the presence of strangers. It was true, also, that a great proportion of their constituency were living in small cabins, where the children were huddling around a small fire-place, glad of any shelter from the inclemency of the weather. He would add one further remark, and it was, that if the atmosphere of this house became unhealthy, and thus the sittings of the Convention in this place should be the means of taking the old man's life, he would have the consolation of knowing that he died in a good cause, and his epitaph should be "Old Billy died while in the discharge of his public duties."

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said, that before voting upon the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, he would like to know whether there had not been submitted to the Convention by the gentleman from Marion, a distinct and separate proposition, which he was authorized to make, in regard to the use of the Masonic Hall.

The PRESIDENT said, that he would inform the gentleman that a proposition relative to that subject was presented yesterday by the gentleman from Marion, and that it was laid upon the table.

Mr. PEPPER, continuing, said, that he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He was not satisfied that it was right to remain in this Hall, although he was prepared to vote in favor of remaining in the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. OWEN said, he should not have said a word upon this occasion, had it not been for the introduction of the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan. It appeared to him that they ought to consider exactly what it was they were voting upon. If the point to be decided, was whether they should remain for the present in this Hall, or remove from it, it would be a plain question, and one upon which they might vote without tying themselves up as to their future action; but as he understood it that was not the question. The question was, whether they should remove from this Hall, or whether they should remain in it during the whole session. That, he believed, was the tenor of the proposition as it stood.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh no!"

Mr. OWEN. Is not that it? I would like to hear the amendment read.

[The amendment was accordingly read by the Secretary.]

Mr. OWEN. Nothing can be more imperative. No matter what circumstances may arise, if the amendment be adopted we are to continue our sittings here until the close of our labors. Now, I think that is going too far. I remember reading in the history of England, that in the reign of one of the Charleses there was a certain oath required to be subscribed by the students of the University of Oxford, I believe, not only abjuring the doctrine that subjects ought, under any circumstances, resist their King, but declaring also, that never, while they lived, would they believe in so scandalous a heresy! Now I am not for taking such a course as this, and placing a bar in the way of a change of determination. I am not prepared to say that I will not, at some future time, be in favor of a removal. I shall therefore vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan.

Now, as to our power to remove to any place we may choose, I can conceive—without claiming for the committee powers of an indefinite character—that, in the discharge of duty as delegates, we have the power to do all things that are necessary and reasonable; and that the Legislature, as to all expenses incurred for reasonable objects, would, to use an ordinary phrase, be bound to foot the bill—pay the expenses. The proposition made by the people of Madison is certainly a very fair and libelal one and I think the Convention ought to consider itself indebted to them. I think it would be well for us to consider what reason we shall assign when we go home and the question is put to us—"Why, did you remove from Indianapolis?"

I agree with the gentleman from the North (Mr. Colfax) that the expenses of removal will be very large. It is said that there is an offer to us that we shall be conveyed to Madison made free of expense; but, I ask you, if the members of this Convention will not be entitled to receive mileage if they choose to demand it? I ask you, sir, whether you will not be obliged to certify their accounts for additional mileage? I do not say that gentlemen may not make their constituents a present of this mileage, I say only that they are entitled, beyond all doubt, legally entitled to receive it. But the gentlemen from Jefferson has said that although some additional expense for mileage will be incurred, it will be counterbalanced by the smaller amount that will be due to the Southern members for mileage, at the close of the session. I think the gentleman is in error. Many, even of the Southern members, will be farther from home at Madison than here. I myself would be entitled to mileage for one hundred miles beyond what I should have a right to receive if the Convention remain in this place.

Again, it would be unreasonable to suppose that less than two or three days will be consumed in making the change from one place to the other, and that, at the expense of some $600 a day, will amount to $3,000. I do not believe that the removal, including additional mileage, will cost less than $4000. Now, are we prepared to go to that expense? I will not say that I am perfectly satisfied with regard to all the proposition made to us here; prices have been demanded that are nearly as high as they would be at Washington; but I have never been at any seat of Government, whether it be that of the U. States, Columbus, this city, or any other, where there has not been more or less of a disposition to make as much as could well be made out of the Government. That is natural; and, I must say, that I have not seen more, nay, I do not think I have seen so much of that spirit in this city as I have seen elsewhere, under similar circumstances.

With regard to the Masonic Hall and the propositions that have been made to us respecting it, I think we allow our feelings to carry us a little farther than is just or reasonable. I am not a member of the fraternity to which the Hall belongs, and have no personal interest in the matter; nor do I know what the risk attending our occupation of it, may be; but I know the owners have a perfect right to demand what they please for its use, and we have a perfect right to refuse to give it. If, after such refusal, they should decide to reduce their demand, be willing to accept one-half or one-fourth of the price first demanded, I for one, if they came down to a price that is reasonable, see no reason that should prevent us from closing the bargain. But this is aside from the immediate question before us. I rose chiefly to express a hope that we would not adopt an amendment which not only declares that we will not now remove, but that we will not any time hereafter.

Mr. HELM said he was opposed to the amendment because it offered no alternative but to remain here, and it was evident to every one that this Hall was not large enough to accommodate the members of the Convention. He was satisfied, notwithstanding what had been said about their constituents at home, that they were better accommodated than their delegates were in this Hall. They had at least a pure atmosphere to breathe, and that, said he, is a thing which we have not. Sir, if the amendment had proposed adjourning from this Hall to some other suitable building in this city, I should, perhaps, have supported it, provided the building could have been procured at a fair and reasonable charge. But I should vote against the amendment as it now stands, and in favor of the proposition for removing to Madison, in preference to remaining here.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he desired to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland. The gentleman (speaking of the proposition to rent the Masonic Hall) said that they had made one proposition, and finding that not acceptable, had found it necessary to make another one more liberal, thus showing a willingness to extort as much as they could from the Convention. Now, he would ask the gentleman to whom he had reference when he said they had done so and so? Did he mean the citizens of Indianapolis?

Mr. KELSO said, he had cast no imputation upon the citizens of Indianapolis. All that he had said, was, that he, for one, was prepared, when an exorbitant demand was made, to go against it.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that the gentleman had not replied to the point of his inquiry. He, Mr. M., had heretofore explained that the citizens of Indianapolis had nothing more to do with the Masonic Hall than the members of the Convention themselves, and consequently they had made no proposition to the committee, respecting it. The committee had made no inquiry of the citizens respecting the procuring of a Hall, for the accommodation of the Convention. They were confined by their instructions to the procuring of the Masonic Hall, and, as he said before, the citizens had no control over it. After the committee made their report to the Convention, setting forth the terms upon which that Hall could be procured, a number of responsible men, in behalf of the citizens, had guaranteed that the amount demanded for the Hall, over and above what the Convention deemed reasonable, would be made up by the citizens, no matter what the sum agreed upon by the Convention might be. He had presented their communication on this subject, to the Convention, some days ago, and it was now lying on the table of the Secretary. No application had been made to the citizens of Indianapolis for proposals to furnish a convenient place for the sittings of the Convention, and, therefore, no proposition had been made by them, except as before stated. No communication had come from our City Council, because no application had been made to them, as had been made to the City Council of Madison. He took it upon himself, however, to say that the citizens of Indianapolis were always ready to respond to any appeal to their liberality, and a portion of them had come forward in this instance, voluntarily, and agreed to pay the balance upon the rent of the Hall. This was all that could, with propriety, be done under the circumstances, without being obtrusive.

It was not his purpose to enter into the defence of the people of this place, as to complaints made as to the accommodation of members, &c. He believed that there was not more discontent on that subject, than was common at other seats of Government. He felt it his duty, however, to say, for the gentleman who represents the Stockholders of the Masonic Hall, who had no opportunity of defending himself on this floor, that he was merely the agent of the owners, and was without discretion in the matter. The Hall was the property of stockholders living in various parts of the State, and its profits were understood to be devoted to charitable purposes. He knew that gentleman well, and he felt bound to say that no charge of extortion could be justified by any conduct of his, in the course of his life. His personal interest in the Hall was quite inconsiderable, and he had devoted much of his time and attention in the superintendence of its construction, without compensation. This much he felt bound to say, in order to do justice to that gentleman, and to correct an error into which some gentlemen seemed to have fallen.

He would not enter into an argument to show that it would not be proper for the Convention to remove from this city. The objections to such a movement had been well stated by others. He would take no part in the discussion of that question, lest he might be supposed to be actuated by interested motives. He was willing to sit in this Hall, or go any where else in this city, as the Convention might determine to be best. He would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, although he would prefer that the question of remaining here or removing to the Masonic Hall, should be left to the discretion of the Convention hereafter.

Before he took his seat, he desired to make a remark in reply to the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn). Whether the people of Madison regarded our interests more than we regarded theirs he would not undertake to determine; nor could he see that that matter had any legitimate bearing upon the question now under consideration; but he would say that there was no prejudice existing here against the people of Madison. On the contrary, the people here are gratified at the prospect of seeing, before many years, a large and prosperous city there. The interests of the two cities are in no respect antagonistical. He had the highest respect for the gentlemen, all of them, whom the city of Madison and the county of Jefferson had elected to represent them in this Convention. They were able and intelligent, and would reflect honor upon their constituency. He hoped, however, that in the allusion made by the gentleman from Jefferson, to the illiberality of the people of this city, he did not mean as much as his remarks might seem to import. Sir, I repeat, the people of this place have no jealousy of, or hostility to, the citizens of Madison. There is no cause for such a feeling. As to the procurement of a hall, in which to hold the sessions of this Convention, he would repeat that the citizens of Indianapolis stood ready to respond to any reasonable demand that could be made upon them. This was all he desired to say. The Convention had now the whole matter before them, and could determine the question according to their pleasure.

Mr. KELSO said, that the gentleman from Marion seemed to be extremely anxious to correct an error, into which he supposed he (Mr. K.) had fallen. Now, continued Mr. Kelso, I undertake to say I have fallen into no error.

And it appears to me, somewhat strange that the gentleman should come here to defend the people of Indianapolis, when nobody had attacked them.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that the gentleman had cast an imputation upon them by implication. The gentleman, by the use of the word they, had left it doubtful to whom he referred.

Mr. KELSO (continuing). Well, sir, I should suppose that if any man is qualified for a seat here, he would understand the meaning of plain English language.

We made application to Mr. Sheets for the use of the Masonic Hall. He returned a reply to the committee, containing a statement of what was the precise truth of the matter, I apprehend, and in that reply he said, that he was the mere agent of the stockholders of the concern. Now would it have been proper for me to say that it was his act—that he did it? No, sir. He advised us in his statement that he did not speak for himself, but for the Stockholders.

And I said I thought their demand exorbitant, and it was made in such a way as to warrant us in not having anything to do with it; I think so now. We did not, it is true, apply to the Common Council of Indianapolis. We had no inducement to do so. Nobody intimated to us that we would receive anything from that quarter; and nobody has said anything about the liberality or illiberality, of the citizens of Indianapolis—about the high price of boarding—about the imposition practiced by landlords, and all that—save the gentleman himself. He seems to think it necessary to defend the people of Indianapolis before, they had been assailed. Now, the committee were advised that there were two halls in this place, either of which we might obtain—one under the charge of the Baptist society, the other that of Mr. Sheets. We made a written application to each, and received a written reply. In the reply of Mr. Sheets, he defined his position distinctly, and nothing can be said against him. I have not heard any one intimate that Mr. Sheets was an extortionate man, or that he expected to extort a single dime from the Convention. I could not have made any such accusation against him because I knew he was not acting for himself. I said that, in my judgment, the demand was exorbitant, and my own judgment is as good for me as anybody's judgment—and that I, for one, was unwilling to accede to it; I say so yet—and I think so yet; and that if we can get a suitable place elsewhere, in Indiana, I care not if it is in Michigan City, or anywhere else, where a spirit of liberality would be manifested by the citizens of the place, I would take it in preference to taking the Masonic Hall, for which they wished to charge us $15 or $20 per day. I wish it to be understood that I speak only for myself, and not for anybody else. I do not know that any other gentleman on the floor entertains the same feelings that I do, nor do I care. The propositions made to the committee are public property, and we have a right to speak of them precisely as we think. I have attacked no man, or set of men, nor have I fallen into any error. All that I have said is strictly correct, and I repeat that I spoke only for myself.

Mr. RITCHEY said, that he should not have troubled the Convention with any remarks had it not been for what was said by the gentleman from Jefferson, in reference to the unwholesomeness of this Hall. I have had the honor, said Mr. Ritchey, of being a member of the Legislature, and of serving two sessions in this Hall, and have also been in other halls, and so far as my experience goes I can not see the least difference. It is true that I have never served here during a session of the Legislature without materially injuring my health, but I disagree with the gentleman in the assertion that it is the unwholesomeness of this Hall that occasions the mischief. I cannot see why this Hall may not be as well ventilated as any hall in Madison, or as the Masonic Hall in this city.

Sir, I do not believe that the reason why members of the Legislature or of the Convention suffer with ill health, is to be found in the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere in this Hall. It is my opinion, and I give this opinion as a medical man, that the friction of mind, the agitation, the sedentary habits of members, together with indulging too freely at the table, and other indulgences, are the occasion of the bad health which gentlemen experience here; and I apprehend that if we were to adjourn to the Masonic Hall the same causes would affect us quite as much. If we remove this Convention to Madison we shall be subject to the same evils and inconveniences. The excitement, the indulgences, and all things that tend to impair health, will be present even there, and we shall be quite as likely to suffer in health as we would be, if we remain here.

Sir, I am in favor of remaining in this Hall, and I am glad that the gentleman from Sullivan has moved the proposition that he has. But if we remove from this Hall I am for going to Madison. I think the people of Madison deserve our thanks for the generous offer they have made us, and I hope that some gentleman will move a vote of thanks. I should not be willing to tax the people of Indiana for the rent of any house in which to hold the sittings of the Convention.

If the people of Indianapolis should now tender to us the free use of a hall in this city, I should prefer to sit here, rather than accept an offer extorted from them by the liberal offer of the people of Madison. Sir, I have nothing to say against the people of this city. They have been long in the habit of asking what prices they please, and I apprehend that wherever we may go we shall find the disposition of the people pretty much the same. Whenever people have it in their power to obtain high prices they will not fail to avail themselves of the opportunity.

If we continue to sit here there is no doubt we shall suffer in health, but it will be so wherever we may go, for I do believe that the causes I have mentioned have more to do with producing disease than the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere of this Hall. We are, to be sure, inconveniently situated, but it is better to suffer a little inconvenience than to run the risk of incurring still greater. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan will be adopted. Some gentlemen will not vote for it because it settles the question definitely. I am for settling the question. The Legislature have deferred their meeting so that we may have ample time to complete our labors before their next meeting.

I hope that this is the last time that the question of removal will be mooted in this Convention.

Mr. BASCOM said, he should vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan, not that he desired to go to Madison, for he had made up his mind to vote against the report of the committee, but because he did not think it right that they should bind themselves to sit in that Hall through the whole session; neither would he at present favor the proposition to go to the Masonic Hall. He would not at this moment vote twelve and a half cents a day for the use of that Hall. Neither was he in favor of allowing the citizens of this place to pay for it for them. His constituents had not sent him here to ask the citizens of this place to pay part of the rent of a hall for the use of this Convention, and he was not in favor of accepting any such donation. He agreed with the gentleman from Switzerland, and he was glad to find a majority of the Convention of the same opinion, that the proposition to take the Masonic Hall upon any terms ought to be rejected; but that was no reason why they should sit here, if they could procure a better place. He did not think that they would be justified, however, in going to Madison. He should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan.

Mr. NAVE said, that as there seemed to be some difficulty in the minds of gentlemen here as to the vote to be taken, he had risen, not to make a speech, but merely to propose a mode of removing that difficulty. He proposed to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, by adding the following: "Unless it became imperiously necessary to adjourn to some other place."

The question being put on the amendment to the amendment, it, was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan,

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, he did not intend to detain the Convention with anything like a speech, for everything that he could have said had been much better said by others, but he desired to explain briefly the reason why he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan. He intended to vote for it because it would settle a vexatious question, and he knew very well that as long as that question was unsettled the business of the Convention would be retarded. He looked upon it as settling definitely the question whether they would remain in Indianapolis or not, and it was very material that that point should be determined.

I do not, said Mr. M., mean to be out-complimented by the people of Madison. I am ready to cultivate every kindly feeling with them. They have shown themselves very liberal; but I maintain that we have rooms better suited for the accommodation of the Convention than can be found in Madison.

I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan, as I have said, for the reason that it settles the question of removal. But it does not appear to me that we shall be bound by it, if a sufficient cause for removal should arise hereafter. We shall still have power to rescind the resolution, and to go where we please at any time.

The yeas and nays were demanded upon agreeing to the amendment, and, being taken, were as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were,
Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kindley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Todd, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Wolf, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—78.

Those who voted in the negative were,
Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Holliday, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Logan, McFarland, Milligan, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, and Mr. President—59.

Mr. NAVE moved to amend the amendment by adding the following: "Unless it shall become imperiously necessary for the Convention to adjourn from this Hall before the final adjournment, to any other room in this city."

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,)

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ten delegates rising to second the demand, they were ordered.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result:—yeas 78, nays 59.

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kindly, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stephenson, Tague, Taylor, Todd, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Holliday, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Logan, McFarland, Mooney, Morgan, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Mr. President.

So the amendment was adopted.

On motion,

The Convention then adjourned until two o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The pending question being the adoption of the resolution reported by the Madison committee, as amended,

Mr. PETTIT said, he was inclined to think that the resolution ought not to be adopted as amended. The Convention had expressed an intention not to leave the city, and that was sufficient. They ought not to pass a resolution binding them to stay in that Hall, for it might be that a majority of the Convention would decide upon moving to a more spacious and comfortable one, the Masonic Hall for instance. He for one had on several occasions suffered from the heat, and confined, unwholesome air of this Hall, and he doubted not that others had been similarly incommoded. It was said by some gentlemen that it was no matter if they did resolve to stay in this Hall, they could at any time rescind the resolution. So they might! They could put many contradictory things upon the journal, and do other things equally foolish, but it would not be very creditable to them. He considered that they ought not to adopt a resolution binding them to do a certain thing, when they might be under the necessity of rescinding it. He would move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GREGG said, he certainly should vote against putting anything on record that would eventually prove a contradictory. It appeared that two committees had been raised by the Convention, charged with the duty of finding a more suitable and convenient Hall for the sittings of the Convention. One committee had made an effort to obtain a suitable room in this city, but their report was laid on the table. And at the suggestion of some friends he had introduced a resolution providing for the formation of a committee of five, whose duty it should be to ascertain whether a more suitable room could not be obtained in Madison for the sittings of the Convention, and it was adopted by a vote of more than two to one of the members of that body. The committee proceeded, in the discharge of their duty, to the city of Madison, and made inquiries for a suitable room, and the result of their investigations had been laid before the Convention in the shape of a report. Another resolution had been offered by way of amendment to the resolution therein reported, providing the Convention should continue to sit in this Hall during its deliberations, and until it should have completed the labors assigned it, which amendment had been adopted by a very decided majority of that Convention, thereby clearly showing to the people of Madison that the Convention was not in earnest when they sent word to them that they wanted a room, and determining that in their opinion this Hall was, of all others, the most suitable. He had intended when the report of the committee was read to call for a division of the question, for he knew that the first resolution reported by the committee expressed the sense of two-thirds of that body. They could, however, strike out in the second resolution the word "Madison," and insert any other Hall in Indianapolis. It was plainly evident that they would have to move to some other Hall, as the papers on the Secretary's desk were even now immersed in water from the drippings of the rain through the rotunda.

He hoped that the amendment would not be concurred in.

Mr. EDMONSTON said he considered that it would be treating the citizens of Madison very impolitely, after the very generous offer they had made, not only to reject the resolution reported by the committee, but to pass a resolution providing that they would not leave that Hall. He would move to lay the resolution as amended on the table.

Mr. WOLFE demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken with the following result:—yeas 66, nays 58.

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chenowith, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Logan, March, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Work, Mr. President.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Spann, Steele, Tague, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor.

The CHAIR announced the first business in order to be the reading of the Constitution by clauses, for the purpose of reference, under the resolution of Mr. Pettit offered on yesterday, and made the special order for 2 o'clock today.

On motion, by Mr. KELSO, the special order was postponed until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

The CHAIR announced the next business in order to be the resolution submitted by Mr. Edmonston on the 14th inst., to-wit :

Resolved, That the committee on the Legislative Department be instructed to insert a provision in the amended Constitution adopting biennial instead of annual sessions of the Legislature.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word "biennial" and inserting the word "triennial."

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, were as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Balingall, Blythe, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Dick, Edmonston, Garvin, Gordon, Harbolt, Holliday, Holman, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Trimble, Wheeler, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—43.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kindley, Maguire, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Vanbenthussen, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—83.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the original resolution,

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson said, he thought this a very important resolution. He expected himself to vote for it. Still, he thought it ought to be duly and deliberately considered. To send to a committee so important a resolution and of an imperative character, now when so many members were absent, he thought would be rather a bad precedent. Therefore, he would move to amend the resolution, by inserting at the proper place the words, "inquire into the expediency of."

Mr. KELSO said, it seemed to him that this matter had been sufficiently discussed before the people, and, so far as he knew, this change to biennial sessions of the Legislature was made a leading proposition throughout the State. He thought it might as well be ascertained to-day as at any other time, whether a majority were in favor of it or not ; and let the vote of the Convention upon the resolution be taken as the sense of the body upon this subject. All he asked was leave to record his vote in favor of the resolution.

The question being taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, it was not agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick proposed to amend the resolution by adding a proviso to the effect that the Governor shall have power to convene the Legislature at any time, in case of an emergency.

This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the word "biennial" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "annual."

Mr. OWEN suggested to the gentleman from Tippecanoe that a direct vote upon the resolution by yeas and nays would have precisely the same effect.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe acquiesced in the suggestion of Mr. Owen, and said, he knew this question had been mooted before all the people; but it depended upon other questions. He thought the reason why the people demanded biennial sessions of the Legislature, was the frequency of change in local legislation. Now, it had been already proposed here, and he thought the people of the State at large had determined, that the Legislature should be restrained from the enactment of local laws; and that their deliberations should be confined to the enactment of laws of general interest—laws in which a change would not be made, unless it were called for by some pressing emergency. It was a proverb in free governments, that "where annual elections end, tyranny begins." The Legislature was the strength of all the departments of the Government. The law making power always exercised the most direct authority over the government; and, if the agents in this department, instead of being frequently called to account were removed one year further from the supervision of the people, they would be so much more likely to abuse their power. Whereas, the more frequently they could be brought under the supervision of the people, the more anxious they would be to do the will of the people. He apprehended that the objections to annual sessions, on the score of economy, would be entirely removed, if the Legislature were restrained from the passage of local laws. The business of legislation would then be confined to its proper sphere; the sessions would not be so long, and consequently, not attended with such a vast expense for printing, &c. And besides, if annual sessions were continued, the Legislative body would act every year as a sort of committee of inquest upon the State officers; and there was a necessity for some such supervision as this, which no other body could furnish; there could be no substitute for the Legislature in this matter. Moreover, in the event of the establishment of biennial sessions, there would frequently arise a necessity for a call of the Legislature, in special session; and these special sessions would be found to cost as much as the regular sessions. He admitted that, so far as he understood the wishes of his constituents, they would be in favor of biennial or even triennial, sessions, if the Legislature were not restrained from the passage of local laws, and confined to their proper sphere of duty. But if, in this respect, the Legislature were restrained by the Constitution, he believed that not only his constituents but the people of the State at large, would be in favor of annual sessions.

He acquiesced in the suggestion of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and withdrew his motion to amend.

Mr. WATTS proposed to amend the resolution by adding the following:

"And the House of Representatives shall consist of sixty-six members, and the Senate of thirty-three members."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRATHER proposed to amend by inserting a clause to the effect, that the sessions of the Legislature shall be limited to a term not exceeding sixty days.

This amendment was also rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton moved to amend by inserting the following:

"Provided, however, that the Legislature may, by a vote of the people, without a convention for that purpose, alter to annual or triennial sessions, having first provided for taking such vote."

Which was decided in the negative.

The question recurring on the adoption of the original resolution,

Mr. READ of Clark said, being called on to vote upon the resolution proposing biennial sessions of the Legislature, he desired to say one word. Upon this question, above all others, he felt himself to be instructed. He was satisfied that this proposition expressed the unanimous wish of his constituents; and from his own experience in the Legislature, he felt the most abiding conviction of the expediency of this change. He found, also, that in nearly all the States where new constitutions had been adopted, they had engrafted this provision. Such was the result of the experience of three-fourths of the States of this Union; and this Convention should take advantage of the lessons derived from their experience. He ventured to affirm, that, if the matter were referred to the people of the State, nine-tenths of them would be in favor of biennial or triennial sessions. Let gentlemen reflect for a moment, and look back upon the session of last winter. During the session of the last Legislature alone some seven hundred acts were passed, mostly of a local nature. Local legislation would creep into that body. It could not be kept out. And then, another Legislature would come in and repeal and alter these new laws, in many cases, before the people, or even many of the lawyers, were aware of their existence. Whereas, if the sessions of the Legislature were biennial, with proper limitations and restraints upon their powers, the laws would be better known and better executed ; and there would be saved a vast amount of the public money. But as it was now, the Representatives danced and the people paid the fiddler.

Mr. BIDDLE said, he had not expected that upon this question the Convention would come to a vote now ; nor was he very well prepared to discuss it. He did not know that he could be very well prepared for this discussion ; but he had hastily noted one or two points, which, by the indulgence of the Convention, he would throw out. The gentleman who had just concluded his remarks had declared himself to be instructed in favor of this proposition. He did not blame him, therefore, for the support which he gave to it. He (Mr. B.) should probably do the same thing under the same circumstances ; but that gentleman had expressed his belief that a large majority of the people of the State were in favor of biennial or triennial sessions. He (Mr. B.) was in favor of neither ; on the contrary, his course heretofore had shown him to be emphatically in favor of annual sessions ; and the reason why he desired to say a word upon this question now, was, because he feared the impression of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) was but too true ; and laboring under the fear that the resolution would pass, he was unwilling to let it go to the vote without saying a few words. It seemed to him that the success of this proposition would be progressing in a retrograde direction. It would be impossible for any argument, such as he had yet heard, in favor of it, to convince him that this would not be a removal of the power which belonged to the people further from its original source. What was the objection to annual sessions ? It was, that they induced too much legislation. But he denied that the remedy was to make the sessions biennial. Why was it that they had too much legislation ? He affirmed that this evil was an incident to every new government. This newly settled State was made up, from year to year, of minds taken from every section of the Union, and every part of the world ; and it was inevitable that, amongst men educated under every form of government upon earth, there would be conflicts of opinion in legislation, till they should all become whole-hearted Hoosiers—a designation which he was in the habit of using, and it was one to be proud of. What was the object of legislation ? It was to give form and expression to the opinions of the people ; and he held, that the oftener they could get that expression, the nearer they would approach to a perfect republican government. He admitted that too much legislation was an evil ; but too much power to legislate never was, and never could be, an evil. He would allow the people to express their opinion as often as possible ; and, absurd as it might seem, he would, if possible, require the Legislature to meet oftener than once a year, whenever it was necessary. He desired gentlemen to distinguish carefully between the use and the abuse of a good thing ; between making use of the legislative power for the advantage of the people, and curbing the power of the Legislature. He maintained that time would correct this evil, and that nothing but time could correct it. For if they made the sessions biennial, it would be found that the Legislature would just do twice as much business in a session. Besides, the people would not like to suffer under the effects of bad laws for so long a period as two years. Hasty legislation was an evil, and therefore they should have a hasty method of remedying the evil, and this was one of the reasons why he would never cast a vote to restrain the power of legislation. It was an axiom in his notions of government, that the moment delegated power was removed farther from its original source, that moment a step was taken toward despotism. A despotism was nothing more than a government where this power was so far removed from the people, that there was no remedy short of a resort to revolution. A pure democracy was impracticable ; but he would not render it still more impracticable, by carrying political power still farther away from its rightful source.

There was much room for amplification in the point which he had taken, namely, restricting the powers of Legislation. But he would not now detain the Convention to elaborate it. The people themselves had the remedy in their own hands, against the excesses of Legislation, in the right of instruction. Did their Representatives make too many laws, let the people tell them so, and warn them against it. But if the accountability of their agents to the sovereign power were postponed two years, the evil would be made worse. The further the accountability of any officer was removed from the sovereign power, the wider was the departure from the true idea of a democracy or a republican government.

He assumed that the popular expressions of opinion were the only true indices of what the law ought to be ; and, as he had before said, if it were practicable, he would have it so contrived, that the expression of the popular will could be taken oftener than once a year. The oftener these agents met the sovereign power, the more faithful would be the expression of the popular will. But, to seal up this expression for two years would be to take one step in a direction adverse to the progress of true democracy. He would give opportunities for the most frequent expressions of the popular will. The oftener the better. And the higher the grade of civilization, the more necessity for the application of this doctrine. For, going into barbarous nations, it would be found that they have but few laws, handed down from generation to generation, but few notions of right and wrong which continue from age to age. The more enlightened the people, the more intricate were their wants. For this reason, also, he could never consent to take the retrograde step proposed in the resolution. He would keep the delegated power as near as possible to the sovereign power. Why, it was one of the troubles in the judiciary of this country, that justice could not be obtained as speedily as desirable. And what was the remedy? Why, to make the sessions of the courts as frequent as possible. Under the present judicial arrangements for the State, when the court meets only once in six months, a man's rights were liable to be delayed for that length of time. Whereas, whenever justice was infringed, her sword should be ready to redress the wrong. This was the perfection of government in theory; and, although it could not be strictly attained in practice, yet it was better to approximate towards it, than to retrograde from it. He was willing to stand still, in reference to the matter before the Convention; but he was unwilling to retrograde; he was unwilling to take a step in a direction contrary to the true remedy.

He feared the result of the determination of this question by the Convention, and for that reason he had attempted, in this manner, briefly to deter them from hasty action. But, if gentlemen were instructed, they would, of course, vote accordingly; and if their instructions were to adopt the proposition, he would be satisfied that the public voice had been expressed. But, at present, he was slow to believe that such was the mind of the people. His own opinions were well known in the canvass. He had always expressed the views that he had now indicated—that biennial sessions were not the remedy for the evil complained of; that the evil was an inherent one in all the new States, which time alone would correct. Every man that came into the State from Pennsylvania, Ohio, or any other State, or perhaps some foreign country, brought along with him his own notions of law which he had imbibed in his childhood. Could uniformity of legislation be expected amongst such a people? or could gentlemen expect to attain to that uniformity by muzzling the voice of the people? Experience had already shown, that after a time this vibration of public opinion would gradually settle down upon the rule of right; then he would let time do its work. He would not muzzle the popular expression, much less would he put such a principle as this in the organic law, which might not be again changed for a quarter of a century.

But he would not detain the Convention. These were his views. They were somewhat abstract, he confessed, but they could be made practical. He had confined himself to a few general ideas, upon which he thought, perhaps, every man would find food for reflection. He could not expect to change the mind of any man who had maturely considered the subject. But he had some experience in dealing with the minds of others, and knew how to respect difference of opinion. He entertained these views as correct, beyond a doubt; and, therefore, he advocated them. He expressed his opinions freely, and if they could benefit others he should be glad of it; and if not, at least, he enjoyed the reflection of having discharged his duty.

Mr. ALLEN said, that he was in favor of triennial instead of biennial sessions, but it seemed that a majority of the Convention were in favor of biennial sessions, and the Convention having voted down triennial sessions, of course he would now vote for biennial sessions. The reasons urged by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) for annual sessions were some of the very reasons why he would vote for biennial sessions. He had no doubt, from the expression which he had heard from members, and from the expression of the people, so far as he had heard an expression, that amendments would be incorporated into the new Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from this miserable system of local legislation that now existed, and that they would also be prohibited from the passage of special acts of incorporation, and that the election of State officers and Judges would be taken from the Legislature and placed in the hands of the people where it properly belonged. All these amendments would, no doubt, be the result of the deliberations of this body; and if this should be the result, many of the subjects which now occupied the time of the Legislature would be taken away, and the necessity of annual sessions wholly obviated. It was contended by the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) that the change contemplated by the resolution would be a retrograde movement and that its tendency was to remove the officers further from the people. Now, it did not seem to him that a change of the time of the sessions of the Legislature from annual to biennial sessions, as contemplated by the resolution, or a change of the manner of electing State officers, would produce any radical change in our present system of government or in the manner of doing business in the Legislature. The question was simply whether the Legislature could not perform all the business necessary to be performed by them and meet only once in two years; in other words would not biennial sessions meet the exigencies of that branch of our State government?

This, he thought, was beyond a question. He was satisfied that when the Legislature should be prohibited from their present system of local and special legislation; when the election of State officers should be taken from the Legislature and placed in the hands of the people; when these and some other amendments should be engrafted into the new Constitution, taking away from the Legislature the consideration of so many subjects which now occupied so much of their time and attention, that the necessity of annual sessions would entirely cease; and that the Legislature could, under this new order of things, meet once in two years and perform all their duties in less time than is now required, under their present system of legislation. He should, therefore, vote for the resolution.

Mr. MURRAY observed, that the people in his part of the State were clearly and entirely in favor of biennial sessions. It was a general complaint among them that the laws of the State were continually fluctuating. The changes made were of such frequent occurrence that the people did not know what the laws were; and, of course, they could not be obeyed by men who did not know when they had violated them. That was impossible. And a further evil resulting from this continual change was, that they were not administered a sufficient length of time for the people to ascertain whether their effect was good or evil. In all governments, a want of stability in the laws was considered a very great evil;—for where the laws were fixed and permanent, the people became acquainted with them, and knew what they had to obey. If they found upon trial that they were stringent and oppressive they could then cause their Legislators to ameliorate them, and thus remedy the evil.

With regard to the effect of this measure upon the elections, he considered that on that point was to be realized one of its happiest results. The frequent elections that were held, kept men in a constant turmoil. The excitement attendant upon one election would hardly subside before another election would come round and there was nothing but commotion and excitement with the people continually.

If the period of holding office was also confined to one term it would do away with the present system of electioneering, so injurious to the faithful performance of the duties of office;—for if the period of holding office, closed after the first term had expired, there would be more of justice and impartiality in the administration of their duties. These reforms were not new and untried reforms. The election of all the officers of the State, and the system of biennial sessions, were measures that had been adopted in several of the States, and, so far as he knew, with the happiest results.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend the resolution by inserting the following:

“And that the sessions of the Legislature shall not continue longer than six weeks without reduction to one-half of the per diem allowance of the members.”

The question being taken upon the proposed amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the resolution by adopting the following:

“And the Governor, in his proclamation convening the Legislature, shall state specifically the subjects which they shall consider, and no other subjects shall be taken into consideration at such special session.”

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question being upon the adoption of the Resolution,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and were taken with the following result:

AYES—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Vanbenthussen, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, Mr. President—124.

NOES—Messrs. Biddle, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Maguire, Wallace—5.

The Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. L. H. JAMESON

The journal of the preceding day having been read,

The PRESIDENT announced the first thing in order, to be the reading of the Constitution, which by the resolution of Mr. Pettit was made the special order for this morning, at 9 o'clock.

Mr. PETTIT said, he was aware that in taking up bills, and reading them by sections, the preamble was generally read last; but he saw no good reason, for the adoption of such a course in the present case. The reason of this course being pursued generally was, because it was not known until the bill was gone through with what amendments would be made, and it was necessary to make the preamble correspond with the bill. But it was not proposed with respect to the simpler reference of these amendments to make any change. The only question that could occasion debate, was that of determining to what committees these articles should be referred. He insisted that the preamble ought first to be read and referred.

The preamble was then read and referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions..

The first article of the Constitution was then read, and the question being upon its reference,

Mr. SMITH of Ripley stated, that he felt bound to preserve the bill of rights in its present form, and he desired that it should be referred to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State. At some future day he should offer an imperative resolution providing that the committee report it in its present shape. He would move that it be read and referred to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State entire. This motion would also save the time of the Convention, and dispense with considerable journalizing.

Mr. DOBSON moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ripley, by adding with instructions to strike out the word "validity" in the eighteenth section and insert the word "obligation," so as to make the article conform with the Constitution of the United States, which provided that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the motion of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DOBSON desired to move instructions to the committee to which this bill of rights had just been referred, to strike out the word "validity," and insert the word "obligation," in the eighteenth section of the bill. One of the objects in revising the present Constitution was to do away with all extraneous legislation, and it was a well known fact, that this slight variance of the State Constitution with the Constitution of the United States, the difference between the word "validity" and the word "obligation," led to discussions in the Legislature, every winter, that cost the State thousands of dollars.

The PRESIDENT stated that instructions of an imperative character would have to lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. DOBSON said, he was willing to make it a resolution of enquiry.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, he hoped that the suggestion of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) would be adopted. Upon the face of it there would appear to the general reader but little difference—but there was a nice hair-splitting distinction drawn, which made a great deal of difference in the application of law to the question. Legal gentlemen in defence of the replevin law of the State, had always stated that its meaning was that there was no change in the obligation of the contract—that it was valid, but, that they could make a change in the remedy; hence if two men agreed in writing to pay money on a certain day, the Legislature could step in by law and say, this may be paid by a certain arrangement on the justice's docket, in two, four, or eight months. Thus the obligation of the contract, or the validity of the contract, was not infringed but the remedy was infringed. He wanted the law in this point so set forth that there should be a plain rule of action in the understanding of contracts. He did not want hair splitting distinctions between validity and obligation, to set contracts aside.

The question was then put on the motion of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) and it was agreed to.

The second article was then read, and referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

The first three sections of the third article having been read and referred, and the question being upon the reference of the fourth section,

Mr. BRIGHT said, that references to different committees of sections in the same article would inevitably produce confusion in the action of the committees, and incongruity in the Constitution itself. He considered that the various sections of this article should all be referred to the committee on the legislative department. Here they were attempting to refer one section of this article to the committee on the election franchise, another section to another committee, and so on, when these subjects were all necessarily connected with the organization of the Legislature.

Mr. PETTIT said, he was very glad to hear the remarks of the gentlemen from Jefferson, and he only wished that the gentleman had taken part in the debate which occurred upon his proposition of referring the entire Constitution to three committees. They came now to the point where the absurdity of the large number of standing committees organized was apparent. As these committees were organized, however, they were necessarily compelled to divide and apportion out the various sections of the Constitution to those committees, in the best manner possible. The various sections of this article were so connected together that the distribution of them to different committees would lead to great confusion in their action; and he thought that the entire article should be referred to the legislative committee.

Mr. WOLFE remarked that, as they were getting into difficulty, with regard to the reference of the Constitution, they had better begin to retrace their steps, and decide upon some better mode of distribution. He must acknowledge that he did not see how the business of the Convention would be advanced by the present mode of referring the Constitution. It would be far better to reconsider the motion upon which the Convention had proceeded with the present mode of reference, and go at once into committee of the whole, take up the Constitution, article by article, agree upon the amendments necessary, and refer them to appropriate committees, who would then report the various articles of the new Constitution.

Mr. NILES observed, that he could not see that any such embarrassment, inconvenience, and confusion would result from the present mode of referring the Constitution, as seemed to be anticipated by the gentleman from Jefferson and the gentleman from Tippecanoe. In the remarks he had made upon the subject the other day, he had stated it as his opinion that there were more committees raised than was necessary; but as those committees had been appointed, the various articles of the Constitution should be referred to them, and he could not see how any inconvenience or confusion would result from the adoption of such a course. For instance: take section seventh, which provided that no man should be eligible to a seat in the Senate under the age of twenty-five. That was a clear and distinct proposition of itself, and what did it matter whether the question was considered and reported upon by the committee on the legislative department or some other committee? It would be reported upon in some form, and the report could be either amended or adopted, and then moulded into the new Constitution. It was true these sections might be reported disconnectedly at first, but still they would all be reported in the proper form, and distinctly expressed, and they were not to be thrown together hastily, sent to the printer, and embodied in the Constitution, but were to be referred to the committee on phraseology and revision. Each distinct subject would be then inserted by that committee in its appropriate place, and the Constitution finally drafted. He could see no necessity for any difficulty arising on this point.

The question was then taken on the reference of the fourth section to the committee on the legislative department, and it was agreed to.

The remaining sections of the third article were then read and referred.

The first twenty sections of the fourth article having been read and referred, and the question being upon the reference of the twenty-first section,

Mr. BORDEN moved to refer the twenty-first section to the committee on State officers other than the executive and judiciary.

Mr. KELSO said, he had not, as yet, troubled himself as to the reference of any portion of the Constitution, nor did he care much what particular direction they took, for he thought it very likely they would have to go over the whole matter again. But as to these particular officers, and the manner of their election, he would suggest that the more appropriate reference would be to the committee on the elective franchise. It was a question as to the mode of creating these officers, and there were one half-dozen propositions now before the Convention, proposing to change the mode of their appointment, and to direct that they shall be elected by the people, and he believed there was a large majority of the Convention in favor of that proposition. It appeared to him that the appropriate committee would be the one he had indicated. He would move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Allen, so as to refer this subject to the committee on the elective franchise and the apportionment of representation.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the questions must be put in the order in which the motions were made.

The question would be first on the reference to the committee on State officers other than executive or judiciary.

Mr. PETTIT said, he did not understand that it was requisite that this subject should be considered by the committee on the elective franchise. This was a question as to how the officers of State should be elected, whereas the duty of the committee on the elective franchise was to prescribe the manner in which the elective franchise should be exercised, and who should be permitted to exercise it. It might be proper, if there were such a committee, that it should go to a committee on the tenure of office.

The question being taken on the motion to refer the section to the committee on State officers other than executive and judiciary,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The remaining articles of the Constitution were then severally read and referred.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. Wolfe, on the 15th inst., which had been laid over, was then taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That in our amended Constitution it be provided that all contested elections, as far as practicable, be referred back to the people, and by them decided.

The resolution having been read, Mr. WOLFE said, he hoped the Convention would give to this resolution its favorable consideration. He thought it would be far better to have all cases of contested elections decided where the election took place. He understood there was a contested election before the Convention. To take that as an example, instead of taking up the time of a hundred and fifty men in taking evidence and determining that case, he thought it would be much more satisfactory, and it certainly would be more economical, to let the people of Union county decide it for themselves.

If the resolution needed any amendment, he was willing it should be amended so as to suit the views of gentlemen, but he certainly thought that some such proposition ought to be adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend the resolution so as to make it a resolution of inquiry, directed to the committee on the elective franchise.

The resolution was then adopted.

REPRESENTATIVE DISTRICTS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. STEVENSON, on the 18th, inst., which had been laid over, was then taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on the Legislative Department be instructed to report the following as a part of the amended Constitution, viz.: "The members of the House of Representatives shall be elected by single districts, such districts to be bounded by county, precinct, town, or ward lines, to consist of contiguous territory, and be in as compact form as practicable, provided that parts of different counties shall not be united to form representative districts."

The resolution having been read,

Mr. STEVENSON said, that he thought the members of the Legislature ought to be elected by single districts; this would obviate a great many inconveniences. Where counties were united for the purpose of electing representatives, the county seats generally controlled the elections. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that he would merely remark that he was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam. He did not intend to discuss the resolution at this time, but to express his disapprobation of it. The gentleman's objection to the present plan of uniting counties for the purpose of elections was, that it gave to the county seats the control of the elections, and he proposed, therefore, that the elections be held in single districts. But according to the gentleman's idea of dividing the county, the county seat would not lose its influence; on the contrary, it would exercise its influence upon both sections, but that was not the greatest evil to be apprehended: it would have the effect of building up political cliques and destroying the good feeling that exists under the present system. He would, when in order, move to amend the resolution, so as to make it a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said he had an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDENT reminded the gentleman that there was an amendment already pending.

Mr. STEVENSON said, he trusted the amendment of the delegate from Ripley would not be adopted. It appeared to him that very little would be accomplished by referring these resolutions of inquiry to committees.

He had been opposed to it from the first. There was no expression of the sense of the Convention contained in them, and he had no doubt that each one of the members of the Convention had already determined in his own mind what sort of a Constitution he wished to have adopted. He had no doubt that each one had canvassed before the people the different amendments proposed to be made in the Constitution. All this had been pre-arranged in their own minds, and all that was requisite, therefore, was for each member to ascertain the sense of this body, in regard to such amendments as he desired should be made. When this was done the whole work would be accomplished, and until this was done they would have accomplished nothing.

The great thing to be desired was that there should be an expression of the sense of the Convention in regard to the various propositions for amendment, and when that expression was obtained, the committees would have nothing to do but to arrange the various propositions.

The Convention might proceed for weeks in passing resolutions of inquiry, and when the committees reported back the propositions concerning which they were directed to inquire, they would be as far from having the sense of the Convention upon them as before. It was only postponing the action of the Convention. He was utterly opposed to resolutions of inquiry, for as he had said, they accomplished nothing, for when the sense of the committee was taken they were as far as ever from having the sense of the Convention. Then why not, said he, at once ascertain, as in this case, whether you intend to have single or double Representative District. It was a question upon which he, for one, had made up his mind. He was in favor of single districts. What injustice, he would ask, could possibly arise from single Representative Districts—each county having a right to elect its own representatives—so that there could be no combination between the candidates or the friends of the candidates; no mutual agreement to aid each other—on the principle "you vote for me, I'll vote for you."

But where the single district system prevails, the people vote for the man of their choice, and the result is, the will of the people is justly and clearly expressed. It appeared to him it was the safest way, and that it would be more satisfactory than any other. He was aware there would always be around the county seat a set of village politicians who would always more or less influence every election. The principle was the same in double Representative Districts. It would be wrong to say that you will have double Senatorial Districts; and if it was wrong to have double Senatorial Districts, it was equally wrong to have double Representative Districts. He hoped that the decision would be made upon the question of adopting the principle contained in the propositions at once; by this means they would the more speedily accomplish the end they had in view, than by any other plan that could be adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY said, he trusted that the amendment would prevail. This was a very important question, and it was one that was new to most of the members, he supposed. At least, it had not been discussed in his county, and he thought, under the circumstances, it should either be amended so as to make it a resolution of inquiry, or that its consideration should be postponed to some future day. If the amendment should not prevail, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until next Saturday week.

Mr. FEPPER of Ohio said, he hoped the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) would withdraw his amendment, and allow the proposition to be postponed, as suggested by the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly.)

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative.

And then the resolution as amended was adopted.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHOUP moved that the Convention adjourn, but he withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. KELSO, to enable him to make a brief explanation. The committee on elections, he said, had before them the matter of the contested election from Union county, and they were desirous of getting along with it as speedily as possible. At the request of the parties they had adjourned last night to give the counsel an opportunity to prepare the papers, and they would be ready to present the case at about three o'clock this afternoon. Most of the gentlemen engaged in the case being elderly men, and unwilling to go out at night, the committee, for this reason, desired to have leave to sit this afternoon. To accommodate this and other committees, which he knew to be desirous of sitting, he would move that the Convention adjourn until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

Mr. STEVENSON suggested that the committee might have leave to sit during the sitting of the Convention.

Mr. KELSO said that might be done. But pending the consideration of important questions, he would like to be here. He adhered to his motion,

And the Convention adjourned till to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

FRIDAY, Oct. 18, 1850.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. COOPER.

On motion, by Mr. JOHNSON, leave of absence, for a few days, was granted to Mr. TAGUE.

DISTINCTIONS ON ACCOUNT OF COLOR.

Mr. OWEN, from the standing committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, submitted the following report :

Mr. PRESIDENT : The committee "on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State," to whom was referred the memorial presented on behalf of a meeting of Friends of the Congregational Order, in Dublin, Wayne county, praying that all provisions making distinctions of color be excluded from the Constitution, have had the subject under consideration, and have instructed me to report, that, in their opinion, it is inexpedient to act in the premises.

They report back the memorial, and recommend that it be laid on the table. And they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Which was concurred in, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. OWEN, from the same committee, to which had been referred the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of abolishing, by Constitutional enactment, the punishment of death in this State, reported the same back to the Convention, with the expression of opinion that the subject of the resolution did not come distinctly within the jurisdiction of the committee, and with a recommendation that it be referred to the standing committee on criminal law.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to refer the resolution to the select committee upon the subject of the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley inquired whether a motion to change the reference would not be equivalent to a proposition to amend the report?

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative. The Chair understood that the Convention had no right to amend the report of a committee. They might amend a resolution or a proposition reported, but they had not the right to amend the report ; for if that were done, then it would no longer be the report of the committee.

Mr. SMITH observed that the reference was a part of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT said, the report recommended that there be given a certain direction to the resolution. If the gentleman desired to refer it to some other committee than that indicated in the report as a matter of course, he would vote against concurrence in the report, and if the report should be rejected, then he would move to refer to another committee.

Mr. KELSO said, he would have to refuse to concur in the recommendation of the committee ; and he disliked very much to vote against the report of any committee containing nothing more wrong than this. But it seemed to him to be absurd to send this resolution to the committee on criminal law, so long as they had already a special committee upon the very subject of the resolution. He would prefer to re-commit the proposition to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, with instructions to report a recommendation that it be referred to the select committee.

Mr. OWEN said, he believed it was usually considered parliamentary wherever a select committee was to be raised, that there should be appointed upon that committee a majority favorable to the prayer of the petition or whatsoever was the cause of raising the committee. Under the circumstances, therefore, he should suppose it likely, that this select committee, or a majority of them, would report a proposition in favor of the abolition of the penalty of death. He meant to say, that when this select committee was raised, it was, perhaps, with a view of having a report in favor of the abolition of the death penalty; and to that he had no objection. But if the object had been to take the subject away, altogether from the consideration of the criminal law committee, and he had been aware of it, he should have voted against raising the select committee; as it was, however, he made no objection, because he supposed the object was merely to secure a favorable report upon a very important subject.

Mr. COOKERLY interposed, expressing his willingness to withdraw the motion to change the reference.

The report of the standing committee was concurred in, and the resolution was accordingly referred to the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT now announced the first business in order to be the consideration of resolutions lying over under the rule; and the Secretary read the following resolution, which was offered yesterday by Mr. STEVENSON:

Resolved, That the committee on the Legislative Department be directed to report the following as an amendment to the Constitution, viz.: No bill shall be passed unless by the assent of all the members elected to each branch of the General Assembly; and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon the last reading, and the yeas and nays entered upon the journal.

Mr. KELSO said, he was perfectly content with the latter clause of the resolution; and he should be willing to vote for the whole of it if the mover would consent to amend it so as to make it a matter of inquiry. But he maintained that it would be bad policy to make it a constitutional point, that no law should be passed by the Legislature unless a majority of all the members elected should vote for it. It might frequently be necessary to pass an important law when such a majority could not be obtained. It was not extravagant to suppose, that, from sickness, or other cause, eight or ten members might be necessarily absent from their places, and so the advantages of important legislation might be lost to the State. Thirty-four years practice upon the existing majority principle had been followed by no evil result whatever, and he was in favor of continuing it. He would move to amend the resolution, so as to make it a proposition of inquiry.

Mr. STEVENSON said, he was opposed to all resolutions of inquiry, because they expressed no sense of the Convention; but he regarded all imperative resolutions which they might pass, as of some importance. He was willing that the Convention should now settle the question involved in this resolution. If it should be their wish that it should require a majority of all the members of the Legislature to pass a law, and if that wish were expressed by the adoption of the resolution, something would have been done—the sense of the body would have been ascertained upon one point. He trusted that the gentleman from Switzerland would yet be willing to waive his amendment, and allow the vote to be taken directly upon the adoption of the original resolution. One of the greatest evils which had oppressed the State was too much legislation; and, for the purpose of checking this thing, he had offered the proposition contained in the resolution. How was it now? Why, he had seen bill after bill passing in the Legislature by the votes of ten or twelve men, at the close of a session, when many of the members had gone home—and some of them manifestly injurious and against the will of the people. The adoption of this proposition was required by the principle of universal suffrage. If it was the unrestricted suffrage of the majority of the citizens which elected their representatives, surely it should be by the voice of the majority of the representatives that the law should be passed. The advantages of universal suffrage could not be fully enjoyed without requiring the representatives to remain in their places till the Legislature should adjourn. There was no other way to frustrate the mischievous and sinister schemes of designing men. The experience of other States had proved that this was a wholesome constitutional provision. What harm had it ever produced in the legislation of the State of New York? This principle had been incorporated in nearly all the lately amended constitutions of the Union, and he hoped to see it prevail here. With reference to the objection, that good bills might be rejected under its operation, he replied that it would be much better to lose a good bill now and then, than to cram into the laws the mass of ill-digested and injurious bills which were every year passed in this Hall by only a handful of men.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said, he was sorry his colleague (Mr. Kelso) had proposed to make this a resolution of inquiry. He was as ready to meet the question now, as he should be at any period of the session. He could not think that the people of Indiana, sending here one hundred men to legislate for them, would be content with the understanding that thirty-four of that number could pass a law; for if only a majority of a quorum were necessary to pass a law, thirty-four was that majority. He submitted to the Convention, whether it had ever been generally understood by the people, that a law of any importance could be enacted and made obligatory upon them, in their House of Representatives of a hundred members, by a bare majority of a quorum? Nevertheless, it was well known, that, under this practice, many laws had been passed which were not agreeable to the wishes of the people, and which had been repealed in consequence. He did not think there could be any hardship in requiring, that fifty-one members out of the hundred shall record their votes in the affirmative upon the final passage of every bill, before it can become a law. It struck him that this question might as well be decided now, as at any other period. He hoped that the motion to change the imperative character of the resolution, if it were insisted upon, would not prevail. He thought they would expedite business by deciding all these questions as they might come up. If gentlemen wished to discuss the question, he was willing to give them time. He would not seek, by any parliamentary stratagem, to prevent the free discussion of every proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said, he should vote against the proposition to make this a resolution of inquiry, because he thought it better to settle these questions as they went along, and he should also vote against the resolution. There was one feature in the resolution to which he was radically opposed. It involved a principle which would enable a factious minority in the Legislature to defeat the will of the majority; and there were emergencies which would arise in every government, when it would be absolutely necessary that something should be done—when it would be fatal to stand still. Now it seemed to him that, under the principle involved in this resolution, a very small minority of the Legislature, by seceding or keeping out of the way, at any time, might completely defeat the will of the majority; whereas, in his opinion, there ought always to remain in the legislative body sufficient power to secure the transaction of all the business necessarily belonging to that department of the government. He thought the yeas and nays required on the final passage of a bill, would be a sufficient remedy for the evil complained of. But the objection which he had referred to was insuperable, that the principle of the resolution would enable a factious minority to defeat the will of a majority.

Mr. SHOUP said, that he was opposed to the amendment because a mere resolution of inquiry could give no assurance to the Convention as to what the committee would make of it; and the whole ground of debate would have to be gone over after the report came in. But the Convention could now decide upon the amendment, as he believed they would ultimately adopt the principle of this resolution. He supposed it would be one of the results of the labors of this Convention to abolish local legislation by the General Assembly; and if so, the rights of the people could not be represented unless the voice of the majority were heard in the enactment of every law. Then, more especially, it would be the duty of every representative to be in his place. It was right that a full and fair expression of the will of the people should be heard; and it was democratic that the majority should govern. He hoped to see a constitutional provision, that, hereafter, every law of the land shall be enacted by a majority of the representatives of the people.

Mr. RITCHEY said, he thought this a very important question, and he was himself prepared to vote upon it at this time. But if members had not thought sufficiently upon the subject to make up their minds, he would be glad to afford time to such by a postponement of the subject. He thought that one of the principal reasons which induced the people to call this Convention was, that there might be set up a constitutional check upon the legislation of the State. It was a universal complaint that the State had too much legislation. But that was not all. It was really true that reflection and propriety did not always mark the action of the Legislature. In reply to the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) who contended that the adoption of this principle would put it in the power of a factious minority to defeat the will of the majority, he was prepared to admit the fact and all the force of the objection, and still he would put the principle into the Constitution. They had seen how a minority of the Legislature of the State of Ohio had defeated the will of the majority, and if the minority of the Legislature of the State of Indiana should at any time see proper to take such a responsibility upon themselves, and stop the wheels of Government, he would say, let them do it; but he would take care to make that responsibility so great and so crushing, that no man would be willing to take it upon his shoulders. He had been present here during session after session of the Legislature, and witnessed the passage of the measures when the yeas and nays could not be called upon them for want of a quorum, and business of the worst character had been passed in this way—all this he had himself seen and felt, and he had remonstrated in vain against its manifest injustice.

He hoped the new Constitution would require the affirmative vote of a majority of all the members elected to both branches of the General Assembly, before any measure could have the sanction of law. He commended the subject to the mature reflection of the body. It should not be passed upon without reflection. Whether it went to the committee as a resolution of inquiry, or of instruction, he cared not; and he cared very little whether it were decided upon now or hereafter. He had spoken merely because he desired to direct the attention of gentlemen to the importance of the subject.

Mr. NILES said, he earnestly hoped that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) would not be adopted, for the reason, (as it occurred to him,) that its tendency would be to suppress the freedom of debate and discussion. It seemed plain to his mind that it would be giving the widest latitude to debate, to take up for consideration all important questions and discuss them as presented. He would not, of course, insist upon a decision at once; definite action might be postponed from day to day. He thought it was discourteous toward the mover of the resolution, thus to attempt to silence him entirely, by changing the whole character of his proposition, and referring it as a mere matter of inquiry—taking away all its vitality, in fact; for the committee knowing the subject to have been in agitation, would consider of it in their room, whether submitted to them in the form of a resolution of inquiry or not. He considered such a motion no less discourteous than a motion to lay finally upon the table or postpone indefinitely. With reference to this proposition, he hoped it would not be disposed of in this summary manner, for he deemed it a matter of the highest moment. He spoke confidently with reference to his portion of the State when he affirmed, that there was no one subject upon which the opinion of the people was more decided and unanimous, than that all practicable constitutional checks ought to be placed upon inconsiderate and hasty legislation. At the proper time—even then, if it were in order—he would submit an amendment to the effect, that for the passage of a law, not only should the affirmative vote of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the General Assembly to be necessary, and that the yeas and nays in every case should be required to be entered upon the journals, thus holding every man responsible for his acts, but that no law or joint resolution should, in any case, be passed until it had been three times fully read on three several days in each house. He was confident that such was the sentiment and wish of the people in his part of the State; and he deemed it as important and as necessary, indeed, as any other provision of the Constitution.

Ritchey) had intimated, and as they all could see upon the examination of the journals of the General Assembly, bills of the most important character were often passed in one day, and frequently in the course of five minutes, without having been once read through, or perhaps ten members knowing their purport, and perhaps without a vote in the affirmative of more than one-fourth of the members elected. It was by means of such a system of legislation, that the Statute Books had been incumbered with not merely useless, but even bad laws. It was, in fact, by means of such a method of legislation, that at one time they had established an insurance company which directly became a bank; and that at another time peculiar privileges were given to one railway company, which on the very next day would be denied to another. Indeed, it was, in no small degree, by means of such legislation, that the volume of local laws had been extended and enlarged to its present unwieldy dimensions.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) had alluded to the inconvenience and occasional evils which would incidentally grow out of such stringent rules. But that gentleman should recollect that such evils were only of a negative character, which the people themselves could remedy. When factious legislators, who, by combinations of minorities, had defeated wholesome legislation, should go home to account to their constituents, they would not be sent back to act the same part again. But when, by hasty and indiscriminate legislation, peculiar and unreasonable privileges were granted to private corporations or individuals, or, what was still worse, when injudicious public legislation was adopted, then it would be a direct, positive and serious injury, and the remedy not so easily applied.

He should not go into any discussion of the main subject this morning: he would, therefore, merely repeat the earnest wish, on his part, that debate would not be suppressed in this way; and that the character of the resolution would not be changed, but left in the form submitted by the mover. He felt confident that this was the true method of eliciting the sentiments of the Convention, and learning from each other the wishes of their constituents.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, that he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso.) He thought the present was the proper time to discuss this matter. He confessed that he could not see how the adoption of this principle could remedy the bad legislation spoken of by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles.) It certainly could not operate as any check upon the power of the Legislature to confer exclusive privileges upon corporations or individuals. It could not prevent the same combination of interests which had heretofore procured this kind of leg-isolation; nor could anything prevent such legislation, while the Constitution continued to sanction the practice of local and special legislation. But let this practice be prohibited—let the Legislature pass only general corporation laws granting equal rights and privileges to all companies which might organize under them. This would ensure an equality of rights under the legislation of the State, which could never be brought about by requiring a majority to record their votes in favor of the passage of every law. But there was an evil which, in his estimation, would result from making this a Constitutional provision. How often was it the case, that, in consequence of sickness, and for other causes, a full House could not be obtained: and in this way, measures of vital importance would be frequently defeated by a Constitutional provision of this kind. He thought the recollection of the Chair would bear him witness that, if, in the consummation of the State Debt Bill, there had existed such a constitutional provision, it would have been lost. It seemed to him that by the adoption of this resolution the Convention would be taking into their own hands what properly belonged to the people. He considered it would be a sufficient remedy to adopt a Constitutional provision, that, upon the final passage of every bill, each member of the Legislature should record his vote. By this means he would be held directly responsible to the people, and not to this Convention: and surely if a measure were defeated by a member absenting himself he should be amenable only to his constituents. It seemed to him, that, upon the whole, the adoption of this principle would be injurious instead of beneficial.

Mr. KELSO said, it would seem, by what had been said, that his motion was rather unpopular this morning. He would, therefore, with the leave of the committee, attempt to defend it. It had been said that his motion was discourteous to the mover of the resolution. He thought there would be no more discourtesy in making a motion of this kind than for one man to attempt to impose his opinions imperatively upon a standing committee of this body. What necessity was there for creating standing committees at all? If they were to make their instructions to them upon all subjects imperative, the committees would have no discretion whatever; there would be no necessity for them; the whole idea of standing committees would be a foolish anomaly, if they were to be instructed in every thing they should do. He understood the advantage of committees in deliberate bodies to be something like this: the Chair selects for each committee, men well qualified to pass upon any measure that might be submitted to them; then the body submits to them their propositions, and the committee, after considering them in all their bearings, report them back to the House, with their judgment in the premises; then it remains for the body to determine whether they will coincide with the report or not. This was what he understood about the utility of committees. He would like to inquire of gentlemen whether it would not be preferable to offer, at once, an amendment to the Constitution in proper shape? They had talked about saving time; would it not be a far more time-saving method to have their amendments at once incorporated in the Constitution? He affirmed that the course proposed by the gentleman would prove to be a saving of time over the left shoulder—a useless and reckless waste of time.

According to strict parliamentary usage, he supposed that he ought not to detain the Convention any longer; but as other gentlemen had gone into the merits of the resolution, he would like to do the same. They had talked about the will of the people, and affirmed that an expression of that will could not be obtained, unless a majority of all the members of the Legislature should be required to vote in the affirmative before any proposition could become a law. Their object seemed to be, if he understood the matter, to compel every member of the Legislature to remain here until the end of the session. But he affirmed that this provision would no more have that effect than if not one word of it were in the Constitution. For when any member took a notion to go home he would ask for leave of absence, which would be granted, of course. It would be thought discourteous to refuse the first application. And, on the next day, perhaps B, C, D, &c., would have leave of absence, because the application had not been refused in the first instance. And so, frequently, the House would be found without a quorum. During the term of his own short experience in legislation, such had always been the case, and on the last days of the session there was sure to be but a very thin attendance. Under the operation of this principle, the sickness of five or six members, and perhaps the factious temper of five or six others, might prevent the passage of the most important law. Where then was the wisdom of placing so much power in the hands of a few factious men, who might be disposed to keep outside of the bar? They need go no farther, and upon a call of the House they could answer, and the Clerk would report a quorum present. If gentlemen would take the trouble to examine the journals for four or five years past, they would find that, upon the announcement of the Chair that there was no quorum voting, a call of the House, at the very minute, had furnished a quorum, time after time. By the adoption of the principle of this resolution, they would only give to such a factious minority ten times more power than they now have. What obligation could it place members under to remain in their places? None in the world. It could not have the effect which gentlemen pretend. For these and other reasons, he should adhere to his motion to change the character of the resolution. Like his colleague, (Mr. Pepper of Ohio,) he was, himself, ready to vote upon this question, but he would rather, first, have the judgment of the standing committee, in the shape of a report.

Mr. OWEN said, that he agreed with the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) and, with respect to the reference which had been made to that gentleman's amendment, (with all due deference to the judgment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles,) for whom he had much respect, he could not regard it as anything discourteous if a gentleman proposed to change a resolution from one of positive instruction to one of inquiry. Wherever, he would not say a majority of this body, but, wherever even a small minority should appear to have doubts upon the propriety or expediency of any proposition submitted, he, for one, would always vote to have the question postponed—to have it referred to a committee, and await their action, before deciding in regard to it. Upon such a question as that of biennial sessions of the Legislature, a matter which had been universally discussed throughout the State, there certainly could be no harm in coming to a vote upon it at once, for, as it turned out in that case, nineteen-twentieths of the Convention were found voting for it. But so far as any other matter, not so generally discussed and decided among the people, was concerned, he did think that, instead of implying discourtesy, it was but a common act of courtesy, to request the opinions of a committee upon it. He expected in accordance with notice given, to have an opportunity of exhibiting his own course in such a case, upon another proposition—that in regard to the property of married women. He intended to introduce this as a proposition of inquiry, for he desired that no man should be asked to give his vote upon it without examination.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) had spoken of this course of proceeding as calculated to suppress debate. He submitted it to that gentleman whether it would not operate only as a postponement of discussion. He thought, as a general rule, when anything like an expression of opinion of the committee was called for, upon any important subject, it would be better not to press the decision at once, nor so long as gentlemen seemed not fully to have examined it, nor to have had an opportunity for examination.

In regard to the resolution itself, with the permission of the Convention, he would say a few words. He was in favor of the principle of the resolution. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) had said that it was often as fatal to stand still as to advance. As a general maxim, it was doubtless true, that there is as much factiousness in obstinate conservatism as in wild innovation; but it struck him that this maxim did not apply here. He thought the evil of too little legislation to be far less than the evil of too much legislation; and if they were to adopt this provision, that the affirmative vote of a majority of all the members of both branches of the General Assembly should be required to pass a law, did any one suppose that if, in consequence of its adoption, any important proposition should be defeated, the matter would not be referred back to the people? The people then would take up and pass upon it themselves, by sending back the proper men to express their wishes. It would be the same thing as submitting the proposition to the vote of the people. It would operate only as a postponement of legislative action. It was like the veto power. He had always been in favor of the veto, because he believed it was only a postponement—only a keeping back of hasty legislation. It was a maxim in criminal law—and a very proper and merciful one—that it was better one hundred guilty men should escape punishment than that one innocent man should suffer. He would not go quite so far as that, in this connection, but he would say, that he believed it was better that ten good laws should be postponed than that one bad law should be passed. Postponement was no very great evil in legislation; but the passage of a bad law might be an evil of the gravest character, which would be felt by the public for years. Upon this question his mind was made up; but from this it did not follow that the minds of others were prepared for the vote; and for that reason, in order to give others an opportunity for examination, he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he desired to make a few remarks with reference to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland. For the discussion of all propositions there was an appropriate time, and this portion of the business was usually discussed in the committee of the whole. He apprehended that the most proper time for the discussion of these measures was after the report of the committee had been made upon them. The Convention could then resolve itself into committee of the whole, and decide upon them. He considered that this was an inappropriate time for the discussion of such propositions as gentlemen might think proper to offer.

If gentlemen were allowed to offer resolutions upon every topic embraced in the Constitution, and engage in the discussion of their merits before they were referred to their appropriate committees, it would be involving the Convention in a kind of guerrilla debate. It would be springing upon them the examination of questions that had not yet received their appropriate consideration at appropriate times. If any gentleman was desirous of offering a resolution of instruction to any one of the committees

He could do so and it would be duly referred, but he could not but think that the proper time for the discussion of these propositions would be when the report of the committees were received.

He would state to the Convention that he thought the appropriate course to have been pursued by the Convention, at the outset, was to have referred the Constitution to the committee of the whole, and in that committee to take it up section by section, and express their sentiments, fully and impartially in regard to them. But they had now raised these committees, and it was proper that these questions should be referred to them, and when their reports were received the Convention could go into a committee of the whole and decide upon their adoption or rejection. He wished to call the attention of the members to the fact that there was an appropriate time for the discussion of all these propositions. They had raised the necessary committees and referred nearly all the subjects embraced in the Constitution to them, and should any gentleman be desirous of inserting an additional section to that instrument he could do so by bringing forward an imperative resolution, embodying the principle he desired to have incorporated among its provisions. He considered that the discussion would be doubled if they discussed these propositions now, and discussed them again after the reports of the committees were received and came up for consideration in committee of the whole.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, that he hoped the proposition of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) would be adopted.—He was in favor of a full and free discussion of all important subjects before they were referred to the committees. It was desirable that committees should have some manifestations of the opinion of the members of the Convention upon the different propositions referred to them, in order that they might prepare a report in accordance with the will of the majority. He had had no experience in legislative matters inside of the bar, but he thought he had a little outside of the bar; and from witnessing the proceedings of the last nine sessions of the Legislature, he had been satisfied that some rule of this description should be adopted, in order to do away with the very evil with which they were now threatened—that of “hasty legislation.”

The Convention had, by a large majority, declared in favor of biennial sessions of the Legislature, as a remedy for hasty or bad legislation. This, in his opinion, was not only a wide departure from the first principles of republican representative government, but would prove altogether an inadequate remedy for the evils complained of. Biennial sessions, without other and efficient rules, would only tend to increase and prolong the evils resulting from unwise laws. The latter could only be guarded against by constitutional rules, of a character such as that now under consideration.

He would go a little further than the gentleman from Putnam, in regard to special legislation, and also in regard to special appropriations from the Public Treasury. He thought that a vote of two-thirds of the Legislature, by yeas and nays, was requisite in regard to all special appropriations of money, or special acts of any kind whatever. He had heard members of the Legislature say, that they cared nothing how they voted on certain measures, simply because the people whom they represented would have no immediate interest in the issue. But if we adopted a rule requiring the yeas and nays upon the passage of all bills, it would bring every member square up to the mark, and all would be held responsible for their votes. He trusted that the committee having charge of this subject would report a provision imperatively requiring the yeas and nays on the final passage of all bills. To his certain knowledge, bills had passed the House of Representatives, no record of which appeared upon the journal. Would that have been the case, he would ask, if the yeas and nays had been required to be taken upon them? The famous Canal Land Bill, which made so much noise at the North a few years ago—and one of the most infamous measures, if he was correctly informed, that ever passed a legislative body, was an example in point. No record of its passage could be found upon the journal of the session at which it passed. He hoped that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Switzerland would be adopted; and he further hoped that the rule proposed would be incorporated in the new Constitution.

Mr. BORDEN stated, that in regard to the correctness of the position taken by gentlemen, that it required a majority of the Legislature to pass a bill, there could not be much dispute. He favored the idea of simply inquiring into the expediency of the proposed resolution. In case the Convention concluded to make this amendment to the resolution, he was prepared to offer an additional amendment. He thought to the effect that in voting money out of the treasury for proper purposes, it should require two thirds of all the members to effect that object, and also, that in creating, altering, or renewing any charter for private companies, it should require a vote of two-thirds of the Representatives elected. He had heard some objection made to the last part of the proposition, but he thought that the Convention, generally, were in favor of the first part, requiring two-thirds of the members to appropriate money out of the Treasury. If there was any serious objections made to the latter clause of the proposition, it could be stricken out.

The question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,)

Mr. BORDEN said, he would not press the amendment he had proposed to offer at the present time.

Mr. READ of Clark said, he was opposed to the reference which the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) seemed to think necessary, and should vote against it, not from any want of courtesy towards the gentleman, but because he thought it was time to come to some definite conclusion upon this question. It was well known that the rules provided that all amendments to the Constitution should be read three several times on three several days. He thought that was sufficient time for a full and impartial consideration of any subject that might come before them. He regarded this as one of the greatest reforms of the day. The county from which he hailed, embracing within its limits a large class of practical and sober thinking men, were unanimously in favor of it. It would protect, in a great measure, the people of the State from hasty legislation, an evil so justly complained of. He would appeal to those members of the Convention who had participated in the deliberations of the State Legislature, if their experience did not justify the adoption of such a course. The gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) knew very well that bills of great importance had passed the Legislature in less than fifteen minutes. What had been the custom in that body in regard to many important measures? Some member would rise and present a proposition, which, upon its first appearance, would meet with little favor. If he was an artful and intriguing Legislator, he would move that it be laid upon the table. He would then go to log rolling, or, in other terms, intriguing among the members to secure a party in its favor.

On the last days of the session, when it was known that a good portion of the members had left for home because of not being immediately interested in the proceedings, the bill would be brought forward and passed by a majority of two-thirds of the members, when it could not have been passed at any anterior period of the session. What said the present Constitution in regard to the veto power being exercised upon bills passed in this hasty manner? It required that when the Governor vetoes a bill it shall be brought before both branches of the Legislature for their consideration, in which case it requires a majority of all the members elect to both branches of the Legislature to pass a bill or joint resolution. But at this late period of a session how could a bill of the character he had referred to be appropriately investigated? He had a resolution which he would move at an appropriate time. It was as follows:

"That the Legislature shall be prohibited from passing any bill or resolution for the appropriation of money, or creating any debt against the State, or for the payment of money in any way whatever, unless such bill or resolution shall be voted for by a majority of the members then elected to each branch of the Legislature, and said vote spread upon the journals of each house."

The gentleman from Switzerland seemed to think it was necessary for this bill to be referred, and desiring that the committee should be instructed simply to inquire into the expediency of adopting it. He supposed that in regard to subjects that were imperatively referred to the committees, it only remained for those committees to put them in a proper form, and make proper reports in regard to them—which reports would be only considered and decided upon by the Convention. Now, he was disposed to think that when thus reported, some of the members would consider themselves relieved from all responsibility in regard to them, and take their departure for home. Taking this fact into estimation, he considered that some such reform as was proposed in the resolution before the Convention, should be made.

Mr. STEVENSON said, that it appeared from the remarks of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) that he seemed to consider that this was not the proper time to investigate these questions—and, that they ought not to introduce imperative resolutions at this period. He (Mr. S.) was astonished that the gentleman's memory was so defective. It would be remembered, that among the Rules reported for the government of this body, there was one providing that imperative resolutions should lie over for one day.

This rule was adopted on motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He was upon the committee that formed these rules, as was the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) and they thought that one day's notice was amply sufficient. Now the House had been notified in accordance with that Rule, and more than that this resolution had been introduced some three or four days since. Thus the Convention had had notice that this proposition would be investigated, yet the gentleman was disposed to smother it down.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he would explain his position. The gentleman from Putnam would recollect that in the first of the organization, he took the identical ground for which he now contended—namely, that they should discuss all the propositions embodied in the Constitution in the committee of the whole. He was now in favor of referring them to these committees without any preliminary discussion upon their merits.

Mr. STEVENSON stated that due notice had been given in regard to this propositions, and ample time afforded for a proper investigation of its merits.

In regard to the argument of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) which had appeared to have considerable weight upon the minds of the members—with respect to the withdrawal of the minority, thus preventing a majority from being obtained, he considered it a very fallacious and weak one. Suppose the House was divided on a certain bill—no matter what bill it might be—and that there were one hundred members present, fifty-one being for it and forty-nine against it. Did the gentleman suppose that if this minority were to withdraw, it would defeat the bill? Certainly not. There would still be left fifty-one members of the House who would, of course, be a majority of all the members, and they could pass the bill. Thus, it will be seen that the argument of the gentleman from Tippecanoe fell to the ground unless a portion of those voting in the majority should withdraw with the minority.

Mr. WOLFE desired to remark to the Convention that the very ground taken in this proposition had been taken by the citizens of the county which he represented, and that was an additional reason for its meeting with his approbation.

It had been truly said by gentlemen who had taken part in this discussion, that there was a great deal of irresponsibility on the part of the members who came up to this Hall to legislate for the people of Indiana. He thought that if a resolution of the character of the present one had been adopted years ago, the State would have been greatly benefited by it. He recollected in 1847, on the day of the adjournment of the Legislature, there were only twenty members present, out of one hundred, to transact business in this Hall, whereas, had the yeas and nays been demanded upon the passage of every bill, they would have been compelled to remain and discharge the duties required of them. He contended that every man who came up to that Hall was a servant of the people, and should be held strictly responsible for the faithful performance of his legislative functions.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said, that he was in favor of a full and unrestricted discussion upon every subject that properly came up for the consideration of the Convention. He doubted not that there were many gentlemen in the Convention situated like himself, who had had no experience in the arts and stratagems of legislation. He felt that there was a manifest propriety in allowing full scope for enquiry and discussion in regard to all these propositions before referring them to committees. He thought it important that they should know the views of every gentleman who came up there to represent a portion of the people of the State.

The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. SMITH) had suggested that after these subjects had been referred, and reported upon by the appropriate committees, that then their merits could be fully discussed, and amendments be incorporated in them. Without intending any disrespect to the gentleman, he thought there would not then be so fair and appropriate an opportunity for the settlement of questions as now; some of the members might not succeed in getting an opportunity to offer and discuss these amendments. Of all bodies that ever assembled in the State of Indiana, for the purpose of deliberation, he thought that this body should be the most free and unrestricted—liberal in their rules, in their actions towards each other, and as to the limits of discussion—so that every subject that gentlemen might see fit to bring forward for consideration, having a bearing upon the interests of their constituents, might receive a full and impartial examination. There could be no charge made of a want of courtesy towards the standing committees—because gentlemen gave expression to the sentiments upon the subjects under their charge for the guidance of those committees.

These committees, it should be borne in mind, had a very great influence. Whenever they presented their reports, there was a general disposition on the part of the majority to adopt them without much discussion, thus giving them an influence which oftentimes they did not deserve. With respect to the present standing committees of the Convention, it was not expected by any one that they would be prepared in a day or two to report upon these subjects; and therefore it would not delay business, but, on the contrary, expedite it, to have subjects of importance, such as the one they now have under consideration, acted upon by the Convention.

Mr. STEELE said, that this was a new subject to him, one that he had not examined at any length, and, therefore he was unprepared at present to vote for the resolution. He would prefer that it be referred to a committee who should inquire into its expediency, and report thereupon to the Convention. They could then discuss the matter fully, and come to some decision with regard to it. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. READ of Monroe stated, that he was decidedly in favor of the provision embodied in the resolution. It was a provision that had been incorporated in the new Constitution of the State of New York; but in other conventions that had been held in the various States of the Union, for the purpose of revising their Constitutions, its utility had been doubted, and it had not been adopted. He supposed that there were many members of this Convention who had not yet fully made up their minds as to the propriety of its adoption. He was glad that the gentleman from Switzerland had offered the amendment then pending, because the attention of this body, by the discussion that had taken place upon it, had been directed to the propriety of introducing such a provision into the Constitution, and he had no fear but that it would be so incorporated. All he desired was that there should be full time for deliberation. They would not in the end progress with any greater rapidity by adopting the resolution, than if they waited for the report of the committee upon it.

Mr. CLARKE of Tippecanoe remarked, that he knew it was out of order to discuss the merits of this proposition, nevertheless, as gentlemen had begun a discussion, he felt authorized to continue it in a few remarks. The gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) had said that his (Mr. C.'s) proposition was a fallacious one, and that if there were fifty-one members in a body numbering one hundred, in favor of a law, it would be enacted.

But, said Mr. Clarke, if there were forty-nine members only in favor of a necessary measure, and these should constitute a majority of those present, who remained at their posts to do their duty, the law must be defeated. Now, in the ordinary course of human affairs some members of the Legislature will probably be sick, some may be absent, and notwithstanding these accidents, the government must go on—its emergencies must be provided for—and it is I think dangerous to so trammel the legislative body as to destroy its function and defeat its necessary purposes.

Mr. C. said, he understood the gentleman from Posey to say, that he favored the proposition because it would diminish or restrain legislation. Now I do not regard government as an evil, nor can legislation be supposed an evil. Government is a blessing; laws, its offspring, are necessary. There is no evil so great as anarchy. Nothing I should fear more than a provision in the Constitution, which may defeat the ends of government, and prevent the lawful and deliberate expression of the public will. In our government the will of the people, lawfully expressed through their regularly constituted organs, is law. It can be no part or purpose of our Constitution to defeat or hinder the expression of this will.

Some gentlemen appeal to their legislative experience, and suppose if this proposition were adopted, hasty and improvident legislation would be prevented. Now, I think with the gentleman from Dubois (Mr. Edmonston) that it would rather encourage and compel log-rolling—at least, it would in no wise hinder such combinations. I may be permitted to say that I served in the Indiana Legislature during a period of ten years, and that period in which our State debt originated. When the Mammoth Improvement Bill passed the Senate, the minority presented a proposition to amend the Bill by adding a million and a half to the appropriation and involving an ultimate cost of ten millions, and proposed if the Bill were so amended, to allow it to pass by an unanimous vote. And I give it as my experience, that if it had required an unanimous vote to have secured the passage of that Bill, the amendment would have been adopted, and the Bill would have been passed by an unanimous vote instead of a vote of two-thirds by which it did pass.

Mr. OWEN. I have but a word to say in reply to the gentleman from Tippecanoe. That gentleman says, that he does not agree with me in the sentiments I have expressed on this occasion. He says that he does not, as I seem to do, regard Government as an evil, and that he does not wish to escape, as I seem to desire, from the expressed will of the people. Now, I should be very glad to believe that all laws that are passed do really embody the will of the people; but I do not believe it. If I did I should desire their passage. What I think we ought to see to, is, that no law shall pass until we know it does embody the will of the people.

As regards the proposition that government is an evil, I beg leave to say, that I have made no such unqualified assertion.

My proposition is this, that the best government so that it attains the legitimate object of government, is that which governs the least. I should be glad to know that we could live without government. We cannot do so, but it is a principle which we should always bear in mind, and it is an important one, that, so we effect the legitimate object of government, viz.: the protection of life, liberty, and property—the fewer laws by which that object is effected, the better. If the gentleman ever understood me as going beyond that, I assure him he is mistaken.

Mr. TAYLOR said, he had designed to say a few words upon this question, and he had intended to wait until every other gentleman had expressed his views fully and thoroughly, and to his satisfaction. He had, however, hoped to be relieved from inflecting upon the Convention at this stage of the question, anything like an argument, although it was a question of importance, and one in the discussion of which he should like to take a part, for he felt it was due to each member of that body, upon a question of this kind, that he should have an opportunity not only to give his vote but also to express his views and opinions. And he would not now trouble the Convention with any remarks if he knew how the vote would go, or rather if he believed that the proposition would go to the committee without positive instructions. If he were assured that it would be thus referred, he would be satisfied to defer what he had to say until the report of the committee was made, and the question came up on its merits, and after the enlightened views of the committee had first been obtained; and if the committee reported in accordance with his views, he should be satisfied, but if they reported adversely, it would then be time enough for him to interpose; and should a majority of the Convention disagree with the opinion of the committee, the report of the committee would not be final and conclusive. There were some of these propositions for which he would go, heart and hand, but there were others which he deemed highly detrimental to the best interests of the people of this State, and the adoption of which he would do all he could to prevent.

But trusting that the Convention would refer the subject to the committee without instructions, he would not now enter upon its discussion. It was a matter which might be left to the disposal of the Legislature, hereafter. He thought there were many weighty reasons which might be given why it should be left to the Legislature.

Trusting that the resolution would be referred without instructions, he would say no more at this time. When the report of the committee came in, if it should appear that the committee took a different view of the matter from that which he took, he would then take occasion to say what he might consider necessary in support of his own views and in opposition to those of the committee, and move to engraft such provision as in his own judgment might seem expedient. He thought the proper course was to refer all subjects without special instruction. For, as had been remarked by the gentleman from ———, if the opposite course were taken, there was no need of committees at all.

Mr. NAVE said, he had not risen to discuss the question, but merely to call the attention of the Convention to one point, and that was whether they would discuss these important resolutions in the Convention, or whether they would make them resolutions of inquiry, and send them to the appropriate committees. If the Convention had determined that they would not now discuss them, he wished to see that determination applied to the resolution now before the Convention, and it would cut off a great deal of unnecessary debate. The several propositions that were before the Convention could then be referred, and when the committees reported upon them they could be discussed fully in the Convention. It was important that the Convention should determine whether they would discuss them previous to their reference, or whether they would wait until the committees had reported. He was, however, in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam, and he did not see why they might not come to a direct vote upon it. The people of Indiana generally had instructed their delegates to vote for such a proposition. There was no portion of the State in which he had been where he had not heard the desire expressed that such a provision should be inserted in the amended Constitution. He, for one, was prepared, therefore, to give his vote in favor of the proposition as contained in the imperative resolution.

Mr. NILES said, that as he had the misfortune to differ from his friend and colleague, (Mr. Taylor,) and from several other gentlemen, for whose opinions he entertained profound respect, he hoped that he might be indulged in making one further remark. My colleague, (continued Mr. Niles,) has said truly that the reports from committees will have great weight with the Convention. Gentlemen will feel reluctant to vote against such reports, or to undo the action of the committees. Now, sir, while I admit that a windy and wordy session would be a misfortune, I hold that hasty and inconsiderate action on the part of a body of this kind, assembled to fix the character of the organic law of the State, would be a far greater evil. The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) has remarked that if the course for which we contend is adopted—if discussion of subjects is permitted before they are referred to appropriate committees, they will be liable to be twice debated. It is, sir, for that very reason that I oppose the amendment. I desire that the door be thrown wide open for debate. I hope that every member will have an opportunity freely and fully to express his views, on every important subject. For, however humble the member may be, though the weakest on this floor, even if that member be myself, he may make some valuable suggestion. If debate is elicited now, and the sense of the Convention, in reference to important subjects, ascertained, the minority will have an opportunity to be heard again when the question will be upon the adoption of the sections as they come from the committees. It will be like giving to the defeated party in a law suit the chance of a new trial. But, if the consideration of the most important questions which will come before this body, is postponed till near the close of the session, I apprehend that the desire to adjourn, and return to their homes, will be a ruling and paramount consideration with many members; and that a Constitution formed by committees, accidentally selected, rather than by the Convention itself, may be forced upon the people.

Mr. TAYLOR rose for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. GREGG rose to a question of order. He desired to know if it was in order for gentlemen to speak as often as they pleased upon the same question!

The PRESIDENT: If the gentleman from Jefferson desires to speak, the gentleman from Laporte, having spoken once, cannot retain the floor.

Mr. GREGG. I do not wish to speak, sir; but I noticed that several gentlemen assumed the privilege of speaking repeatedly to the exclusion of others.

The PRESIDENT. Under the rule, a gentleman has a right to speak twice upon any question, if no other desires to speak.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am sorry, sir, that the gentleman should have thought it necessary to make me the object of his remark in reference to a violation of the rules of order. I have tried to be extremely modest hitherto. I think I have been particularly unobtrusive.

Mr. GREGG desired permission to explain. His point of order, he said, was not directed exclusively to the gentleman from Laporte; he had seen several gentlemen rise who had already spoken twice.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will inform the gentleman that I am not one of those who have spoken twice. I have made a few remarks, it is true, and I had hoped to be relieved from making even those few, and would not now trouble the Convention were it not for the high regard that I entertain for the talent and experience of my colleague, who, I regret to find, does not give his sanction to the proposition that this subject shall go to the committee without instructions. I had hoped he would have consented to let it go to the committee, and when reported back I should be prepared to say what I have to say in reference to the subject.

I agree entirely with my colleague that there ought to be most ample opportunity afforded for discussion upon all questions. It is only once in many years that a Convention is assembled to make amendments in the organic law, and while discussion is going on I trust we shall not be captious; and if a member does rise to speak twice upon the same subject, I hope he will not be called to order, because it has the effect of embarrassing a man who is as little disposed as I am to be obtrusive. And I confess that on many occasions I have kept my seat when I desired to offer a few remarks, because I saw that other gentlemen were desirous of addressing the Convention. I do not desire to be troublesome, but I do desire to be heard occasionally when matters of importance—matters in which my constituents are interested—are before the Convention. It is the only means I have of getting what I say before my constituents.

I should be very much gratified if the Convention would permit this proposition to take the course indicated by the gentleman from Switzerland; but if the question must now be argued I shall be under the necessity of detaining the Convention for a few moments while I express the views which I entertain in regard to it, although I should much prefer that we should first have the report of the committee. And if that report should coincide with my views, the Convention would be relieved from the infliction of a speech from me; but if it should differ from them I should claim the privilege of being heard.

My colleague says that he wishes to give the widest scope to debate, but is the course that he proposes calculated to attain that end? Not at all. Every one must see that the Convention is impatient of debate upon this subject at this time; and under such circumstances it would be difficult for me to give expression to my ideas in a satisfactory manner, and I apprehend this would be the case with other gentlemen. But trusting that the Convention will yet take the course suggested, of referring this resolution to the committee without instructions, and that I shall have an opportunity, when the report of the committee comes in, of saying what I desire to say, I shall not trouble the Convention further at this time.

Mr. COOKERLY said, he had not risen to discuss the merits of the proposition that was now pending, but merely to say a word in regard to its reference. This, said he, is a very important question. It is a proposition which, if adopted, will change, materially, the Constitution under which we have lived for so many years, and I hold that it would be wrong to force the Convention to a decision upon it at this time. We have constituted a large number of committees. For what purpose? Is it for the purpose of sending to them resolutions instructing them to report in a particular manner upon the various propositions submitted to them? No sir; it is for the purpose of submitting resolutions of inquiry to them, and letting them, in the committee rooms, discuss the matter and decide upon the propriety of reporting favorably or otherwise, and when the reports come in, it is then for us to discuss them, and vote upon them. I do trust that questions of as much importance as this is, will be submitted to a committee, to be considered by them and reported upon. So far as I am concerned, I think I shall vote in favor of the proposition that is embraced in this resolution; but I am not prepared now to vote upon it, and I hope, therefore, that it will be referred.

Mr. DOBSON said, that so far as he was concerned, if it was a single and separate proposition, he would be willing to meet the question now; but as many gentlemen had expressed a desire that each and every member of the Convention should have an opportunity to be heard upon it, and as it was a new question, and as there was not sufficient time to discuss it now, his own opinion was, that it should go to the committee.

What was the object of the assembling of this Convention? It was to remedy the defects in the Constitution of the State. But it would depend very much upon the decision that might be made regarding some other provisions, whether this should be engrafted in the Constitution or not.

It has been asserted, continued Mr. D., with a good deal of plausibility, that the State of Indiana has been ruined by excessive legislation. Now I apprehend that no country has increased more rapidly than Indiana in population and wealth, and if it has been injured so much by legislation, I ask what it would have been if there had been no legislation at all. I apprehend that legislation has not done so much injury as is represented, after all. The State has more than trebled its wealth in the last seventeen years. But admitting that this has been a great evil—admitting that there has been a great deal of hasty and imperfect legislation—still, here is the question: shall we, therefore, run into the opposite extreme? I know it is very natural for a legislative body that has gone too far in one direction one day, to go too far the other way the next.

I apprehend it is not our true policy to go far into the discussion of this matter in its preliminary stage. It being a question of so much importance, I think it ought to be permitted to go to the committee, and when it comes back into the Convention members will have an opportunity of discussing it as fully as they wish.

I believe, sir, that if we take away from the Legislature the power of passing local laws we shall do a service to the State. Local laws have been the curse of this country. I believe that at the last session there were something like seven hundred bills passed. Of these, not more than two hundred are of a general character, leaving something like five hundred local laws passed in one year. Now if you take away their power to pass local laws, you take away five-sevenths of the legislation. But I am disposed to think that this is a matter that we should not be hasty about, or we may do more harm than good—like an old woman that I have read of somewhere, who was extra-officious. A neighbor having fallen off his horse one day, the worthy dame took great pains to assist him, brushing off the mud very carefully and helping him to remount his horse. And for fear that he was not properly seated, she had to give him an extra shove, which sent the old man off on the other side, where he fell deeper into the mud than before. Thus it may be with us if we attempt to determine hastily upon a matter of this kind; we may do more harm than good. I am disposed to think, therefore, that we had better send this matter to a committee. I nevertheless agree with the gentleman from Laporte. I am willing to hear discussion upon all subjects, and at every stage. It is but once in a number of years that the organic law is to be changed. My own original idea was, to have but three committees, and to refer every subject to one or other of those three committees, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe suggested at the commencement; and that when the reports from those committees came in, the discussion should take place. If discussion be had before the reference, it will have to be gone over again, unless we can settle and arrange a principle, definitely, at once. I shall vote for the reference to the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, it was agreed to; and,

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. CARR of Jackson moved that the order of business be suspended, to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Convention proceed, this day at two o'clock, to elect, by ballot, a Printer to this body.

The order of business was suspended, and

The question being taken upon the resolution, it was adopted.

Mr. MURRAY rose to move a resolution of thanks to the citizens of Madison for the hospitality tendered by them to the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN claimed the floor, and having been recognized by the President as being entitled to it, said, he rose to ask the mover of the resolution which had just been adopted, under a suspension of the order of business, the favor to move a re-consideration of the vote by which the resolution was adopted, in order that they might record their votes upon it. If the Convention were determined to go into the election of a Printer, he said he would of course yield to the will of the majority, but he hoped there was no desire to precipitate action upon that subject; he thought it was at least due to those who were opposed to the proposition, that they should be permitted to record their names against it.

The PRESIDENT remarked to the gentleman from Allen, that he had had plenty of time to call for the yeas and nays, if he had been within the bar of the House at the time.

Mr. BORDEN. That is true, sir; but I hope the House will indulge me by permitting the yeas and nays to be taken.

Mr. CARR said, he had no wish to take any member by surprise, but he certainly thought it was time that this question should be decided. If they were going to have a Printer at all, it was time that they should elect one. The printing for the Convention, at present, was done sometimes at one place and sometimes at another. For the accommodation of the gentleman from Allen, however, and all other members of the body who entertained the same feelings that he did on the subject, he would move a re-consideration of the vote.

Mr. BORDEN desired to say one word in explanation. He had observed that a motion was made the other day to reconsider a vote for a similar purpose, and he had not expected a new proposition would be made to supersede that motion. That was the reason why he had been taken somewhat by surprise when this motion was adopted.

Mr. DOBSON said, he had promised the gentleman from Allen to move a re-consideration, for the purpose, as he supposed, of giving the gentleman an opportunity to argue the question.

Mr. BORDEN. Not at all, sir. I did not wish to argue it, but merely to record my vote.

The yeas and nays were demanded upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CARR said, that, upon reflection, as there seemed an unwillingness to re-consider the vote, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. DUNN of Perry renewed the motion to re-consider.

Mr. BORDEN renewed the demand for the yeas and nays.

Ten members rising, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARKE of Tippecanoe inquired of the Chair whether the motion to re-consider must not necessarily lie over one day.

The PRESIDENT replied that it must lie over.

Mr. CLARKE was proceeding to address the Chair, when

The PRESIDENT reminded the gentleman from Tippecanoe that there was no question before the Convention.

On motion by Mr. RITCHEY,

The Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. BORDEN rose and said, that when the Convention adjourned there was a motion pending to re-consider the vote that had been taken upon the motion to go into an election for State Printer, at 2 o'clock that afternoon. He had no objection, so far as he was concerned, to going into the election of State Printer; all that he wished was to have the yeas and nays taken on the motion to re-consider. He trusted that by the unanimous consent of the Convention the call of the yeas and nays might be proceeded with.

Mr. OWEN said, he had but a single word to say in reference to this subject. It had occurred to him on several occasions, and he had so expressed himself to many of the members of the Convention, that he had never been a member of a legislative body where so much courtesy was exercised by the members towards each other, and where kindly feelings so generally prevailed as in the present Convention. He understood that the minority had no desire to delay the election of a State Printer, but were perfectly willing that it should take place immediately. They were simply desirous, for reasons of their own, of having the privilege of recording their votes on the journal, and he did hope that that privilege would be granted unanimously.

The question being put on the reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Carr, submitted by him this morning on the subject of electing a State Printer to the Convention, and the yeas and nays being demanded by ten members, they were taken with the following result:

AYES.—Messrs. Balingall, Beach, Borden, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hovey, Howe, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Nave, Shoup, Spann, Terry, Watts, and Work. —ayes 30.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Vanbenhusen, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—noes 89.

So the vote was not reconsidered.

ELECTION OF STATE PRINTER.

The Chair announced the first thing in order to be the election of a Printer to this Convention.

Messrs. Carr and Colfax were appointed to act as tellers.

Mr. EDMONSTON presented the name of AUSTIN H. BROWN, as a candidate, and

Mr. COATS presented the name of SOLAN TURMAN.

Upon the counting of the first ballot it appeared that

Austin H. Brown received	78 votes.
Solan Turman	35 "
Jacob P. Chapman	6 "
Scattering,	11 "

AUSTIN H. BROWN having received a majority of all the votes given, was declared duly elected the Printer to this Convention.

After a few remarks by Mr. WALLACE, in explanation of his vote for Mr. Chapman, as Printer to the Convention,

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

The Journal of the preceding day was then read.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. OWEN, agreeably to notice previously given, introduced his resolution of inquiry, in relation to the rights of married women.

The resolution was as follows:

"That the committee on rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, inquire into the expediency of incorporating in the bill of rights the following section: Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and laws shall be passed securing to them under equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, devise, or descent, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

Mr. OWEN said, he wished to offer a few words of explanation with reference to the precise character of this resolution. The change proposed by it differed essentially in character from any of the changes which had already been made in various States of the Union; for example, in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maine, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, and several others. The changes which had been made in these various States in regard to the holding of property by married women, were changes affecting existing relations—affecting the property of those now married. Now he would ask the Convention to observe that in this resolution, which he proposed to incorporate in the new Constitution, there was nothing but what was strictly prospective—relating to the property of women hereafter married. The difference he regarded as a very important one; for if this was made to apply to future marriages only, and among those about to be married, there were any who thought, or whose parents thought, that the old law was better than the new law, nothing would be more easy than to come under the old law. The day before the marriage the bride had only to transfer to her future husband all her personal property and the rents and profits of her real estate, and she would be placed at once as under the old law. It was, therefore, a matter of choice with her whether to come under the provisions of the old law, or to avail herself of the provisions of the new. He would not, at this stage of proceedings, argue the question whether the principle involved in the proposed change was right or wrong; he was simply desirous of calling the attention of the Convention to the particular character of this resolution. It would be discussed, he trusted, at length, by the Convention in a few days.

He would remark, in connection with this subject, that the people of the State of Indiana had already acted upon the subject. It was not a new matter even among them. There was, upon the Statute Book now, a law which made provision in regard to the real estate of married women, and the rents and profits of that real estate. The words of the law were, "that they should be deemed and taken to be her separate property." Whether it was the design of this law to give to the wife the sole management and control of her real estate, and its rents and profits, he did not assume to decide; not belonging to the profession he would not offer any legal opinion himself on that point. He had heard various opinions in regard to it, some asserting that it did give to married women such rights of control, and others that it did not. The legal distinction in regard to these matters was of a very nice character. The words "to her sole use and disposal," are admitted to confer exclusive management, while the words "for her own use and benefit," have been held not to bar the marital right.

He would only say, in conclusion, that he had not brought up this matter hastily, nor without deliberation, nor; he would add, without consultation with wiser and more experienced persons. Many years ago he had written in regard to the subject to two of the most eminent jurists of this or any other country—Chancellor Kent and Judge Story—and at the proper time he would lay before the Convention their opinions on this subject, as they were given to him by letters addressed to himself.

Mr. KELSO remarked, that the very clause of this resolution of the gentleman from Posey, quoted by him in its favor, appeared to his mind the most fatal objection to it. It might do well this morning after having just emerged, as it were, from the large company of beautiful young ladies that graced the Governor's levee last evening, to come forward in favor of the rights of unmarried ladies—but he (Mr. K.) had considerable affection for one married lady, and he could not perceive any good reason for making such ample constitutional provision for the rights of unmarried women, in preference to the rights of those already married. He would have been pleased if the gentleman from Posey, had stated whether he occupied the position, that this Convention had not the power to apply this provision to the protection of the rights of those ladies who were already married; if that was his opinion, he must say that he differed from him entirely with regard to its propriety and correctness. He had no objection to the proposition if it went no farther than appeared on its face, because they had a law of similar character now on the Statute Book to which the gentleman had referred, but if they were to embody it in the new Constitution, he would enquire why its provisions might not be applied for the benefit of all women alike, both married and single. For the purpose of taking the sense of the Convention on this point, he would move to strike out from the resolution the word "hereafter."

Mr. OWEN had but a single word to say in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland. Individually, he was in favor of the amendment the gentleman had suggested, but he was not sure that the matter had been sufficiently discussed throughout the State to justify the Convention in going so far as it proposed, and the adoption of this resolution would not prevent the Legislature from carrying out the design of the gentleman's amendment at any future period. By this provision they would instruct the Legislature to go to a certain point; that would not prevent them from going further if they desired. He was very far from asserting that we had no right to extend the provision to those now married as to property hereafter to be acquired; and he was most decidedly in favor of such extension, if it should appear that the people of the State generally were ready to receive and approve it.

He apprehended that the gentleman from Switzerland was in error when he said that this resolution differed but slightly from the existing law on the subject. The law now on the Statute Book gave to married women, at most, control over real estate, and its rents and profits only, but embraced no provision at all in regard to personal property.

Mr. KELSO observed, that that was the only difference. The idea that they were to do their business by halves and depend upon the Legislature to perfect it, he did not subscribe to. If they were going to make a constitutional provision in regard to this matter at all, why not make one sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the provision he had suggested? If the Convention inserted the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Posey, in the Constitution, the Legislature would take it as a criterion for their action on the question, and would shield themselves under the plea that the Convention had duly considered the matter, and had seen fit to go so far and no farther, and therefore they would not transcend the bounds of the action of the Convention. He contended that if the Convention had the right to pass such a provision, embracing the whole subject, it should be done at once and not left for the action of the Legislature. He hoped his amendment would prevail—as it was merely a matter of inquiry—and if upon examination the committee should esteem it necessary to make the change now proposed they could report accordingly.

Mr. OWEN said he consented to the gentleman's amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) and it was concurred in;

And the resolution as amended was adopted.

RESOLUTION ON NEWSPAPERS.

On motion of Mr. KELSO, the business was suspended and the report of Mr. MORRISON of Marion, chairman of the select committee in relation to taking newspapers, was taken from the table.

The question being upon the amendment submitted by Mr. EDMONSTON to the resolution reported by the committee,

Mr. NAVE said, that he had some knowledge with reference to the taking of newspapers for the purpose of distributing them among the voters of Indiana, as he had had occasion for several winters to vote for or against a similar proposition, and from the experience he had had on the subject he was satisfied that the adoption of such a course was an unnecessary waste of the public money.

I believe, continued Mr. N., if the Convention take the number of papers proposed in the resolution, or a lesser number as proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) that but a comparatively insignificant number of the people of Indiana will receive even a copy of the papers thus ordered—and I ask gentlemen, what information of any value can accrue to the people of this State by purging such a course? Occasionally an individual would receive a single isolated copy of the paper containing our proceedings, with a report of our action upon several distinct propositions, but of what benefit will that be to him? Unless they have a connected history of the proceedings here they most assuredly will fail to understand the reasons for, and the result of our action on, the various propositions that will come under the consideration of the Convention. I consider then that this resolution will result in no way to the benefit of the people of Indiana, but, on the contrary, that it will have the effect of adding to the large amount of taxes under which they are already groaning, the sum of four thousand dollars. And, sir, I would respectfully inquire for what purpose is this new tax to be levied? I answer, simply for the purpose of aiding the pecuniary interests of a few editors in this city without any prospect of advantage resulting to the people of the State. For one, sir, I conceive that this resolution will not be the means of imparting information concerning our proceedings to the masses of the people of Indiana; a few leading men in each county may receive a copy of the newspapers occasionally, but any general diffusion of information concerning our action among the people generally, by the proposed resolution, I consider hopeless. I shall vote against the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "at the expense of the delegates."

The question being taken upon the adoption of the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend the amendment so that three daily copies of the State Journal and State Sentinel should be taken on the terms proposed by Mr. Defrees.

The amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. KELSO. I have a word to suggest in favor of this proposed expenditure of the public money for newspapers. The people have sent us here to revise and amend the Constitution of this State, and the law that authorized this Convention provides, also, that the instrument which may emanate from our hands is to be submitted to the people for adoption at one of the regular elections of the State, or an election to be provided for hereafter; and it depends on their vote whether our labors here are to have force and effect or to be null and void. In order to advise the people of what we have done and the reasons that have led to our action, it has been thought prudent to distribute among them as much information as we can during the term of our deliberations; and the only two papers in which it is thought proper to publish a report of our proceedings are those proposed in this resolution—the number of copies ordered being five for each member, and my friend from Dubois (Mr. Edmonston) proposes to make even that small number still smaller, giving three copies only for each member. The gentleman from Dubois and myself have been together in this Hall before; and upon various occasions he has been in favor of taking newspapers and I have opposed him—and now in a certain degree our positions are reversed, he being in favor of taking the smallest, I the largest, number of papers. Now, sir, I go for taking the largest number proposed of those papers which will publish our proceedings and debates in full. The people of our State, or at least seven-tenths of them, will as readily understand what we are doing from these proceedings and debates as we can ourselves, and therefore it is that I think we should distribute the papers containing them, freely and extensively, among our constituents.

Sir, there is another reason why I think we should vote for this resolution, and it is this: Questions of vital importance will come up before this Convention, and it is essentially necessary that the debates which may occur upon them may be at hand for immediate reference. It is absolutely important that each member shall have upon his desk every morning the proceedings of the previous day. Suppose that an important question is under discussion for several days, can it be expected, for instance, that an argument made on Monday by one member can be replied to on Saturday by another member, unless he is furnished with it in extenso. The Stenographer will write out the debates, to be sure, but he cannot furnish a copy to each member every morning. The newspapers must take his manuscript and print it, and then we can be supplied with our proceedings.

Another great benefit to result from this resolution is to be found in the fact that each member will have the opportunity of sending a copy of the paper containing our daily proceedings to every local paper in his county; and those local papers will copy the proceedings, and having a general circulation among the people, every section of the State will be made acquainted with our doings. It is a mistaken notion to suppose that not one in fifty of the people of our State will read these proceedings. Why, sir, the action of this body is regarded with the most intense interest; a greater interest, even, than was felt at the time of the adoption of our first Constitution—in fact the people are expecting more than they will get from us. They want to know our reasons for acting this way upon one proposition, and that way on another, so that they may themselves be enabled to pass a correct judgment on the result of our labors. I contend, then, that we should vote for taking the largest number of these papers that will publish the Stenographic report of our proceedings in full, and that we should not take any at all of those papers that will not thus publish our proceedings.

It is said, sir, that we are now about to pay a Stenographer the sum of ten thousand dollars to report the proceedings of this Convention, and for what purpose? Is he not employed to add to the general information of the people, by preparing a faithful record of all our transactions? Those proceedings will be published in book form, and a copy given to each member of this Convention, and a certain number of copies to the State Library; but when will the people be able to obtain them? Probably not under six, eight, or nine months. If, then, the Legislature should, in their wisdom, decide that a special election for the decision of the people upon the adoption of the new Constitution shall be held at the earliest opportunity practicable—which course will be perfectly proper—these books might not be yet printed or distributed among the people before the election occurred. Is it not, then, all important that a speedy and general diffusion of a knowledge of our proceedings, among the people, shall be made? I apprehend that they will count the proposed expenditure as nothing, in comparison with the knowledge that will accrue to them of the action of this Convention.

In regard to the editors who it is said will reap the pecuniary benefit of this resolution, I can only remark, that they furnish the necessary medium for communicating with the people. I have been abused and villified by this class of men, probably as much as any other man in the state, and especially at Indianapolis, nevertheless they are here, and we must take them as a kind of necessary evil. We are, to be sure, giving to the editors of this city, some advantage over the editors of other papers in the State, but through their instrumentality is to be furnished a great and valuable amount of information to the people of the State. In conclusion, I feel bound to say, sir, that I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Dubois, and in favor of any proposition for increasing the number of papers to be taken by this Convention that shall publish our proceedings entire.

Mr. FARROW said, he was opposed to the resolution. The people of the State generally, he believed, understood to a great extent, already, the questions that would come before the Convention. He represented a constituency of three thousand persons, nine-tenths of whom were a reading people. The subscription books of the papers of this city would show that a large number of papers were taken in his county. Those papers would, of course, have an account of these proceedings and this constituency would thus be notified of the work going on here. It was thus with the people of other counties. Many took the papers published in Indianapolis, others took papers which would doubtless, copy from the papers published here, all that was necessary to an understanding of their action. He was opposed, to scattering a few papers throughout the State for the of benefit a few local editors.

Mr. SHERROD said, he hoped the resolution as amended would not pass.

He was well satisfied that its passage would fail to accomplish the good predicted by its friends. Gentlemen talked eloquently about extending light and knowledge by keeping the good people informed of the proceedings of the Convention, and for one he desired that they should know what was going on in that body. But he doubted the means proposed by the resolution. He contended (and with great deference to the opinions of the members of the committee) that it was a useless and worse than useless drain upon the public treasury. He would appeal to the House, and ask, in all candor, was it right, was it just, was it in harmony with the spirit and genius of our institutions, to tax the mass of the people for the benefit of the favored few? For one, he could not subscribe to such doctrine. He had been taught a different lesson. He had learned that when the mass of the people were taxed for any purpose whatever, it should be for the benefit of the whole, and not the few. This he believed to be the true doctrine. It was the American doctrine; it was the doctrine of our ancestors. It had stood the test of scrutiny, and would continue to stand as long as our institutions remain permanent.

He could not see, for his life, what they were to gain by the adoption of this measure, and he was willing to view it in its most favorable aspect. Suppose they took these papers, he would ask how many of the people of each district represented upon that floor would be benefitted by it? How many would receive these papers? Perhaps one in every twenty. And even those who received them would be benefitted very little, if any. To-day he would send a paper to this friend, and to-morrow to that one. And the people would receive the proceedings of the Convention in such a disjointed manner, that it would be of no service to them whatever. If gentlemen were determined to appropriate from four to five thousand dollars for the benefit of their constituents, as they contended, he would say, in the name of reason, let them apply in such a manner that it might have the desired effect; and, in his humble opinion, that could only be accomplished by printing the proceedings of the Convention in a pamphlet form. Then if they were distributed over the State, those who received them would get them in a tangible shape. However, he regarded the whole matter as a useless expenditure. In his opinion, the people were not particularly interested in what the peculiar views of this or that gentleman might be upon the various subjects discussed there. They were only interested in the result of their deliberations, and when submitted to them in the shape of a Constitution, they would be governed by their own view of right and wrong. They would weigh it in the scales of equal laws and equal rights, and not the opinions of any one man or set of men.

Gentlemen had talked about liberality, and had said these papers should be sent to the hard-fisted yeomanry of the country. This was all well enough. But this thing of being liberal at the expense of the people, was a kind of liberality that he did not approve of; and, if he was not much mistaken, it was one for which the people of Indiana would not thank them. It was not among the objects for which they had been sent there. If gentlemen were determined to have these papers, and in that way extend their liberality to the bone and sinew of the land, he thought it would look much more consistent, more patriotic, to run their hands into their own pockets and pay for them; it would prove one thing at least, that they were sincere in their professions.

The people of Indiana were taxed to death. They were groaning under the burthen of taxation, originating from a State debt, that was overhanging them like a mighty incubus, which had well nigh crippled the energies of this otherwise prosperous and happy State.

These complaints had been heard. Reform had been the watch-word. It had been preached during the last canvass, from the centre to the confines of the State. This was the great object for which that honorable body had been convened; and for one he had pledged himself to economize, to watch and guard the public treasury; or, in other words, to keep his eye steadily fixed where the cloud gathered darkest, and do what could be done to lessen the burthen of taxation.

He must confess that he was astonished at the spirit of extravagance manifested upon that floor. Here was a proposition to impose a direct tax upon the people of from four to five thousand dollars, and that, too, for an object, as he had contended, that was useless, and worse than useless.

At least he would have to hear a different tone of argument, backed by better philosophy than he had, before he could be convinced otherwise. Other gentlemen might vote upon this question as they pleased. For one he could not give his consent to support such an unjust measure. He was not there to represent sectionalism or favoritism. He was there to defend the rights and interests of the masses. He could not think of setting an example there that would not only exert a pernicious influence for the present, but would be handed down to posterity.

Mr. FOSTER said, he understood that this resolution provided for the taking of a certain number of copies of the papers publishing their proceedings, and also for the payment of the composition of those proceedings. This, he would remark, was not the usual course heretofore pursued by the Legislature. If, continued Mr. F., I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dubois, it proposed to take a less number of papers and pay for the composition. Now, sir, I do not like the tenor of the resolution or the amendment. It is proposed that the State shall pay for the publication of our proceedings in the newspapers; but, sir, I am of opinion that the people will derive but little benefit from them. I am disposed to think that the proper course to pursue, is to take this money intended to be appropriated for these papers and composition, and have a large number of copies of the old Constitution, with the amendments that are offered here, printed to distribute among the people for their consideration. This, I think, would be much more satisfactory to them than if they received detached portions of our proceedings. They can then form their opinion of the new Constitution without recourse to the arguments of gentlemen in this Convention. I shall, at the proper time, present a proposition to this effect, that the Convention shall be supplied with one copy for each member of each of the newspapers which publish the proceedings. I move that the resolution and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, and

It was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

Mr. BADGER rose and said, he was inclined to the opinion that almost every gentleman on this floor must desire to have this question relating to the newspapers settled; for until it was definitely settled it would be called up to-day and voted down, and again called up to-morrow and again voted down. And when they reflected that every speech of two minutes in length draws from the public treasury five dollars, it ought to admonish them that their words should be few and well ordered.

I have risen twice (continued Mr. B.) to ask a suspension of the regular order of business, in order to present a resolution, and both times I have failed. Resolutions embracing the same proposition, however, have been introduced by other gentlemen under a suspension of the order of business. In relation to that I have nothing to say, but I ask again a suspension of the order of business, so that I may introduce a very short resolution, and if there are nine gentlemen who will be kind enough to vote with me in calling the yeas and nays, I shall feel very much gratified.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will take no newspaper for distribution at the public expense.

On the motion to suspend the rules the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OWEN rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER, interposing, said he had an amendment to offer.

Mr. OWEN. I will give way to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting the following:

"That the Secretary be directed to procure one copy each of the daily and tri-weekly papers published in this city, for each member of the Convention."

The PRESIDENT ruled the amendment out of order.

It was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. OWEN. Of all the resolutions that have been proposed here, I consider that of the gentleman from Monroe the worst. If we would do anything in regard to this printing, it seems to me the important thing to do, is to have the debates published and disseminated among the people now, whether we take a single paper or not, and I care very little whether a paper is taken by any member of the Convention. The important matter seems to me to be, that the debates should be published in the daily papers of the city, in order that they may go to the country editors, so that they may select from the debates what they choose to re-publish. Now, sir, we ought not to conceal from ourselves that a large part of the expense of this publication we have already incurred. The gentleman from Switzerland estimates the cost of reporting our debates at ten thousand dollars. I suppose it may cost some two or three thousand dollars, but having a Stenographer, the question is, whether the result of his labors shall be circulated throughout the State now, or whether the publication shall be deferred for six months or a year, when the interest in our proceedings will have comparatively subsided. Now I do not think it very important whether we take any newspapers or not; but I do think it important that we should make an arrangement, if we can do so on reasonable terms, for the immediate publication of our proceedings, and I believe that such an arrangement can be made. I believe that if we adopt a resolution that we will pay twenty cents per thousand ems, we can have the work done, and that without rendering it obligatory upon us to take any newspapers. If we take them we must also pay the postage upon them, and this will be a very considerable item. If we go to this expense, I would much rather pay a fair compensation to those journals that will publish our proceedings daily, in full, so that every country editor may be supplied with a copy. I do not know whether the resolution as it stands would prevent you from paying a fair compensation for publishing the debates in full, without which every body knows they could not be published. The editors cannot afford to publish them without being paid for it.

Before I sit down, permit me to say a word in regard to some of the observations of the gentleman from Hendricks. The gentleman asserted that it was solely for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of a few editors in this city that the proposition was made. Now, in the first place, the remark of the gentleman is unparliamentary. No member has a right to impute any such motives to his fellow members. I do not impute to the gentleman from Hendricks a deliberate intention to charge us with what would be little short of corruption. Does he mean to say that the publishers have come to members of this Convention and induced them, by some undue influences, to vote money into their pockets?

Mr. NAVE. I had no intention in anything that I said to impute any such motives.

Mr. OWEN. I take it all back, sir, but I am sorry that the wording of the honorable gentleman's remarks would seem to convey the imputation. If this resolution for taking the newspapers had no reference to paying for composition, I do not know that I should object; yet, probably the Convention, if they hereafter determine to pay for composition, might choose to order one or two copies of the paper for each member.

Mr. COOKERLY rose to a question of order. He desired to know if the debate was in order.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam. Debate is in order.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, it appeared to him that there was a good deal of misunderstanding in regard to this matter of printing, especially in regard to the expense. I desire, said he, to direct some interrogatories to the gentleman last up, who, I presume, is as competent to give us information as to the manner in which this work is to be done, and as to whether the reports of our debates are to be published promptly, as any other gentleman. We have now a printer to this Convention, and I desire to know if the gentleman can give us the information whether our debates can be published daily, so that a copy may be laid upon the desk of every member on the morning of the day succeeding that on which the debate takes place?

Mr. OWEN. I understand, sir, that if we adopt the resolution to pay for the composition—and I believe that if we pay twenty cents per thousand ems for the work the printers will be satisfied—but, at any rate, if we pay for the composition, we shall have the debates and proceedings of one day laid upon our tables on the morning of the next.

Mr. SMITH. It was to that point that I wished to call the attention of the Convention. Then I understand that the journal and debates can be kept up in book form, and laid, in that form, upon the desks of members every day, if the Convention now vote twenty or twenty-five cents per thousand ems for composition. I desire to know if that will be sufficient to pay in full for all this work.

Mr. OWEN. I do not say that that will be sufficient to pay for the publication in book form. I am not prepared to say that. I merely said that the proceedings could be published from day to day for that amount of expense.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I desire to ascertain if an arrangement of that kind could not be made to bring out the debates in book form.

Mr. McCLELLAND (addressing the President). What is the question before the Convention?

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam.

Mr. McCLELLAND. Well, sir, I am in favor of the resolution. I am opposed to taking these newspapers at the public expense. I have no feeling against any of the publishers of newspapers in this city, but I conceive that we have no right to appropriate the money of the people for the purchase of newspapers. I represent some three thousand voters. Suppose I have three newspapers every day to send to my constituents how much will the whole of them be benefitted? I think it could not fail to operate unjustly and unequally. I do not conceive that we were sent here for any such purpose. I am opposed to appropriating money which does not belong to us for the purpose of benefitting a portion of the people of this State. If the gentleman from Monroe would offer his resolution again, that the expense of these newspapers should be borne by the members themselves, I would appropriate my own money as liberally as any member of this Convention; but when gentlemen propose to appropriate for this purpose the money belonging to my constituents, I cannot go with them. If some Delegate would move an amendment, declaring that we will take so many copies at the expense of the members of the Convention, I would support the proposition.

Mr. COLFAX said he rose for the purpose of making a single remark, which was elicited by what had been said by the gentleman from Ripley.

It seemed to be considered desirable that the expense of these newspapers should not be thrown upon the public treasury, and one of the propositions that had been submitted was, that members of the Convention should subscribe and pay for the newspapers, out of their own private resources. The voluntary subscriptions of members, he apprehended, would go but a little way towards remunerating the publishers for the expense to be incurred in publishing the debates, and it appeared to him that the object contemplated by the appointment of a Stenographer to report the debates of the Convention would not by any means be attained by reserving the reports to be published in book form after the close of the sitting of the Convention, and if reserved to be so published in book form, members would have no opportunity to correct any errors that might be made in the reports; and to suppose there would be no errors would be to suppose that which had never happened in the case of the reports of any deliberative body. How often was it that members misapprehended each other—was it to be supposed that, amidst the din and confusion which frequently prevailed, the reporter could comprehend every thing that was said, with perfect accuracy? Clearly not, and it was important therefore, that an opportunity should be afforded to make the necessary corrections before the reports became a permanent record. It appeared to him, therefore, that it would be proper for many reasons, that the Convention should agree to the resolution, which proposed to give a moderate compensation to the publishers, and to subscribe for one copy of the paper for each member.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, he was inclined to believe that if the members of the Convention, generally, knew as much about this business of publishing as he did they would entertain a different opinion from that which seemed to prevail. Some delegates, however, might perhaps think that it was proper that information should be withheld from the people. Such gentlemen he would have no hope of convincing, but as there were some, who were desirous that information should be disseminated, he would give them the benefit of his opinions which were derived from experience, and which might therefore be worth something. From the demonstration that had been made after the committee had reported a plan, it appeared that the Convention looked upon the expense as being too great, and he would say that the committee were compelled to report as they did, from the fact that the publishers declared that they could not set up the debates from the manuscript unless they were paid for the composition. By reducing the number of papers to be taken, as contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Dubois, the whole expense attendant on the publication would not exceed $2,500. Whether the Convention would subscribe for any papers to send abroad among the people would be for themselves to determine. He desired that there should be a fair distribution, however, of the work among the different papers—not as was intimated by the gentleman from Hendricks, to fill the pockets of the publishers with money, but to disseminate the reports of our proceedings among the people of the State, because information of this character was only derivable from papers printed at the Seat of Government, and if the papers here did not receive the patronage of the Convention to enable them to publish these reports they could not be sent abroad in any other way. How, he would ask, were the people to be enabled to arrive at a correct conclusion, and to give a vote understandingly upon the amended Constitution, unless they were furnished with the reports of the proceedings and debates of the Convention? Under this view of the subject he would leave it to the Convention to determine whether they think it is doing justice to the community to withhold from them that information which was only attainable through the newspapers of this city, under the patronage of the Convention.

Mr. WOLFE remarked, that gentlemen could accomplish the object proposed by putting their hands in their pockets and paying for the papers. He was not for suppressing information, and he was ready to contribute his proportion of the expense out of his own pocket. As regarded taking three copies of the daily newspapers for each member, he thought it was wholly unnecessary; they would go a very little way towards affording a correct view of what was done.

Mr. MAGUIRE said that, in his opinion, this was simply a business transaction, and it should be so considered and treated. If these papers were useless to the people they should not be taken. The arrangement was not, he supposed, a matter of very great importance to the publishers of newspapers, and if it were, it would not be proper to make it for their benefit unless it would be really advantageous and useful to the people. It had long been the custom of the Legislature to take the papers here for the purpose of sending out their proceedings to the people; and if it were important that the proceedings of a Legislative body should be known, he regarded it as of much more importance that this Convention should disseminate information as to their action. Sir, the people are to be called upon at an early period—perhaps in the spring or early part of the summer—to vote on the amended Constitution, and without these papers they would have very little opportunity to investigate the nature of the amendments or the arguments, by which they were sustained or opposed. He cared but little about the matter personally, as he did not expect to make many speeches, but he did think it important that the constituents of members should have as much opportunity as could reasonably be afforded them to see the proceedings of this Convention as they came fresh from the newspaper press. That was probably the only way in which any information could be received by the people previous to the time when they will be called upon to accept or reject the labors of the Convention. It is not yet determined that the Debates shall be published in a volume by the order of this Convention, and if that should be done it will probably be several months before it will be completed—and furthermore, after it shall be published, very few of our constituents will have time to examine its contents. It had been correctly remarked by the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) that the proceedings and debates here would be a sealed book to the members unless they were published in the newspapers, and an opportunity thus afforded to gentlemen to revise the reports of their speeches; and the volume containing them would forever remain a sealed book to the mass of the people unless its contents were made known to them through the press here in the first place, and then copied by the papers in other parts of the State. The volume of course will be printed, either by order of this Convention or of the Legislature, but the number of copies will be small, and nine-tenths of the people perhaps will never see it. To the proposition that each member should pay for his portion of the paper he had no personal objection. He would say however that if the papers would be valuable to the people—and if not they should not be subscribed for—there was no impropriety in paying for them out of the Treasury. As the agents of the people we send them the papers for their own benefit and not for the benefit of the members. The constituents whom he had the honor in part to represent could feel but little interest in the result of the question. They all had the best opportunity to make themselves acquainted with the doings of the Convention, both by personal attendance upon the sessions of the body, and through the medium of the city press. He trusted that the question would be decided at once. It had been several days under consideration, and he thought it must be well understood by this time. He again disclaimed any personal interest in the matter. He repeated that it was a mere business transaction. If the papers were not worth the price demanded for them they should not be taken. If however it was important, both to members of the Convention and to their constituents, that information should be disseminated through that channel, let the papers be taken.

Mr. WATTS said, he was constrained to acknowledge that his constituents, generally, had more information than himself; therefore, he did not feel like distributing much of what information we possessed, to be scattered broadcast over the State, for fear it might produce a bankruptcy here. But, as he had said on a former occasion, this proposition to send out newspapers was not a means by which the people could be informed of the proceedings here. If they could give the people regular files of these papers, daily or weekly, something could be known by them; but sending them out in the detached parcels, as proposed, they could know from them nothing satisfactory about what had been done here. He had no objections to taking newspapers, two or three from each office of the city press, and sending them to their constituents, or to the local papers. The people at home, he believed, were as well advised of the requisite constitutional amendments, as their delegates here, and there was as much uniformity of judgment amongst them. Therefore, when the Convention should have completed their work, he thought it would be advisable to print all the amendments in pamphlet form, and scatter them broadcast amongst the people. For the people desired chiefly to know what was done. They cared but very little about the whys and wherefores which might be employed here. These were his views. He thought them correct, and intended to act upon them. He was disposed to take the newspapers here, but not at the expense of his constituents. He did not think it a correct principle to tax the many for the benefit of the few.

Mr. FOSTER proposed to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That one copy of each of the newspapers in this city shall be taken."

Mr. KELSO said, that if anything at all could be done with this matter, it appeared to him that it must be by way of compromise, and if he was not mistaken, the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax,) had submitted the most practicable view of the case. He would therefore suggest, that, in the first place, they should refuse to amend, and then vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) for the purpose of affording an opportunity for a proposition of this kind to be made, namely: That there be taken one copy for each member, of such daily papers as would agree to furnish the proceedings and debates in full. One of the advantages of this arrangement, was this: whenever the arrangement should be made for publishing the proceedings and debates in full, though but a single copy for each member were taken, the proceedings and debates in full would necessarily run through the whole edition of the paper, furnishing a good opportunity, on all hands, for those gentlemen who talk about paying for their papers out of their own pockets, to go to the publishers and order any number of copies, which, in their benevolence, they might be disposed to distribute. For himself, he was too poor to distribute many papers in this way; but, if this arrangement were made, he would purchase and distribute as freely as he could afford to do. He would like, also, as a part of this arrangement, to bind the publishers of these proceedings to exchange with all the local editors of the State.

Mr. McCLELLAND proposed to amend the amendment, by inserting at the proper place the words, "at the individual expense of members."

Mr. READ of Clark said, he was satisfied that a majority were in favor of this proposition in some shape or other; but it seemed they could not come together. He thought there would have to be a compromise, and, preferring that compromises should be made in a committee room, he would move that the resolution and pending amendments be referred to a select committee of one member from each Congressional District.

Mr. OWEN said, for the purpose of bringing this matter to a point in a few words, he would ask leave to read a resolution, which, as soon as it might be in order, he proposed to offer. It might be that upon hearing it, the Convention would be willing to adopt it. The original proposition involved an expenditure of about $4,000, while the resolution in his hand would incur an expense of less than $400—striking off nine-tenths of the original amount; and he thought it would attain very nearly the same object.

Mr. OWEN read his proposed amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Convention be authorized to ascertain from the Editors of the Daily Journal and Tri-Weekly Sentinel, whether the Daily Journal will publish in its daily issue, the entire debates of the Convention, if paid for the same at the rate of twenty-five cents per thousand ems, the said debates being thence copied, in whole or in part, into the Tri-Weekly Sentinel: Provided, that one copy of each paper be subscribed for, for each member and officer of the Convention; and if he agree to the proposal, then the Secretary be authorized to make such an arrangement.

The question being taken on the motion to refer, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered, and being taken were yeas 60, nays 63, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs Alexander, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Holliday, Hawkins, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Schoonover, Shannon, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Trimbley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—60.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bascom, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Werrick, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Reed of Clark, Ristine, Sherrod, Sims, Smith of Park, Stevenson, Terry, Todd, Vanbenthussen, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—63.

So the resolution and amendments were not laid on the table.

Mr. KELSO called for the reading of the resolution and amendments, and they were accordingly read by the Secretary.

Mr. TAYLOR, in order to give the gentleman from Posey an opportunity to offer his proposition, moved to lay the pending amendments on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the original resolution offered by the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Badger,)

Mr. OWEN moved to amend by striking out and inserting the proposition which he had just before read.

The amendment being read by the Secretary,

Mr. KELSO said, if he understood the reading, members were to subscribe at their individual expense.

Mr. OWEN. One copy for each member at the public expense.

At the request of several members, the amendment was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. BERRY said, he believed the object would be best attained by taking the vote directly upon the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam, and so determine, at once, whether they would take the papers or not; and in order to bring the proposition before the Convention, he would call for the previous question.

Mr. COLFAX inquired what would be the effect of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT said, the first question would be upon the amendment.

The call for the previous question was seconded by a majority of the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays upon the main question, and there was a second.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that heretofore the effect of the previous question had been to cut off all amendments; but under the 18th rule for the government of the Convention, the first question would be upon the pending amendment.

The main question being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, was ordered to be now put.

The yeas and nays being taken upon this question, the Secretary reported—yeas 76, nays 49, as follows :

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Boone, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kindley, Maguire, March, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ristine, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Vanbenthusem, Wiley, and Mr. President—76.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Carter, Coats, Crawford, Duzan, Farrow, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hardin, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—49.

So the amendment was adopted:

And the question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The yeas and nays being demanded, ordered and taken upon this question, it was decided in the affirmative.

AYES—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beary, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, March, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Ristine, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Vanbenthusem, and Mr. President—69.

NOES—Messrs. Badger, Berry, Bicknell, Borden, Carter, Coats, Crawford, Davis of Vermillion, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hardin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, non, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Underlich, Yocum, and Zenor—55.

Mr. COOKERLY moved that Mr. Niles be added to the committee on the Practice of Law and Law Reform.

Mr. COLFAX moved to amend by substituting the committee on the organization of the Courts. He thought there would be a peculiar fitness in his occupying a place on that committee.

Mr. NILES remarked that he was obliged to the gentlemen for the compliment, if that was its character, but that they would justify him in the assertion that it was in no way sought or desired by him.

Mr. BORDEN believed that the State would be benefitted by the services of the gentleman from Laporte on both of the law committees.

Mr. NILES was then added, by a vote of the Convention to committees number five and seven.

THE PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES IN BOOK FORM.

Mr. MAGUIRE asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Convention for a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Printer to this Convention be directed to print — copies of the proceedings and debates of this Convention.

But, before the question was taken thereon,

On motion of Mr. WILEY,

The Convention adjourned till Monday morning 9 o'clock.

MONDAY, OCT. 21st.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CAMP.

The journal having been read.

Mr. KELSO rose and said, that he should be under the necessity of asking the Convention to suspend the order of business for the purpose of enabling him to introduce a resolution, and making this request, he supposed it would be proper for him to explain the object of the resolution which he desired to offer. It seemed that, as they were now proceeding, the Convention was making up more journal, to be published at the public expense, than could be either useful or proper. They were making out a complete journal by the Stenographer, and the Secretary was keeping his journal, as he, most rightfully, ought to do. He maintained that one complete journal was enough, and it was the object of his resolution to define what portion of the journal should be furnished for the Stenographic report. For the purpose of settling this question now, he asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution, which he read as follows:

Resolved, That a record of the proceedings of this Convention shall be kept in the following manner, to-wit: All that class of legislative matter usually contained in the journals of the Legislature shall be journalized under the direction of the Principal Secretary. He shall prepare, or cause to be prepared, an index to said journal, and if the printing of said journal be ordered, he shall superintend the same. He shall also prepare, or cause to be prepared, a manuscript copy, to be deposited by the President and Secretary in the office of the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the 14th section of the act entitled an act to provide for the call of a Convention of the people of the State of Indiana, to revise, amend, or alter, the Constitution of said State.

There shall also be kept a journal of debates under the direction of the Stenographer; but said journal of debates shall not contain that class of matter usually embraced in Legislative journals, farther than may be actually necessary to identify and give a correct understanding of the subject matter under discussion.

The rules were suspended, and the resolution having been read by the Secretary, it was adopted by unanimous consent.

THE CONTESTED SEAT OF THE DELEGATE FOR UNION COUNTY.

Mr. KELSO, from the committee on elections, submitted a report, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, no person has been legally elected to the office of Representative Delegate to this Convention from the county of Union, and that the seat of such Representative Delegate in this Convention is vacant.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. RARIDEN said, he would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether there was, or was not, evidence before the committee, that the sitting member (Mr. Brookbank) was familiarly called and known by all the various Christian names found upon the tickets in the ballot box, which were referred to in the report?

Mr. KELSO said, there was no evidence of that fact, but the committee had given him credit for every such vote, including the votes given for I. Brookbank, and Franklin V. Brookbank.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he understood then that only two votes for Brookbank were rejected, one which he received for Senatorial Delegate, and the other decided to be illegal because the voter, having previously resided in Union county, had removed to Ohio, and remained there some ten or eleven months, and then returned, sometime in the month of February last, and located himself again in the same county.

He would confess that this was rather a delicate case, but he was not exactly satisfied with the conclusion that the committee had come to, although they had investigated the case with better opportunities for arriving at a just result than he possessed. But in a case of this kind, he was in favor of waiving all matters of mere form, and settling down upon the individual whom the people had intended to designate as their delegate. This was all he wanted to know in regard to any election. This matter, it seemed, had been in the first place duly investigated by the men presiding over the ballot boxes in Union county.

He understood that the committee on elections were not disposed to disturb any of the conclusions which the officers of the election had come to, except to exclude from Brookbank the two votes he had named. Now it struck him that since this man, Brookbank, was running for Representative Delegate, and other gentlemen were running for Senatorial Delegate, the manner in which the votes were printed would render the voter very liable to misname his candidate, as was manifest in the result. The name of the sitting member had been written upon the ticket in the place of the candidate for Senatorial Delegate, by mistake. It was obvious to him, from the circumstances, that the voter intended to cast that vote for Brookbank for Representative Delegate; although there was nothing of the kind in the report. He would like to have heard whether, upon the same paper, there was a Senatorial Delegate voted for. If that fact could be ascertained, the mistake would be most certain and obvious.

He was not sufficiently conversant with the law regulating the elective franchise, to enable him to discuss the legality of these votes which had been discarded. Whether a voter, who had been living in the county of Union, by going to the State of Ohio and remaining there ten or eleven months—raising a crop there and then returning to Union county—whether such a voter would lose the right of citizenship, so far as to require a twelve-month's residence in the State to regain it, he could not determine; but it struck him that when such an individual had voted, by the consent of those who resided in the county, and when the officers of the election had decided upon his right to vote as a matter of certainty, and when the committee reporting were far from being decided upon which side the right was, it would be better to leave the matter where it was placed by the authority of the canvassers in the county. If there could not be found some obvious reason for reversing the decision of the canvassers, he was for allowing the matter to remain where they had placed it. For this reason, and for the purpose of testing the opinion of the Convention, with reference to the case, he would move to modify the resolution reported by the committee, so as to declare, that the seat of Representative Delegate from Union county, was rightfully filled by Mr. Brookbank.

The PRESIDENT requested the gentleman to send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. KELSO said, that, for himself, he did not care the weight of a feather what disposition the Convention might make of the report. He did not object to taking the question upon the amendment. The committee had come to their conclusion upon this ground: there were some two or three different aspects of the case which would have enabled them to come to different conclusions; so that they could have decided, with about the same plausibility, either for the contestant or for the sitting member. The committee were satisfied, in the first place, with respect to the first vote claimed for Brookbank by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) that no other man for Senatorial Delegate was voted for upon that ticket but Brookbank. Could it be contended, then, that the vote was for Representative Delegate? It seemed, from the evidence, that a large number of tickets were printed at the instigation of a Major Watt, who was a candidate for Representative in the Legislature, in which all the names were left blank except his own: and, as it appeared at home, by the use of these tickets several of the friends of Brookbank had mistaken the writing of his name. In all these cases, where the canvassers had determined that the intention was to vote for the sitting member, the committee had left the matter as they determined: although no witness swore that he ever was known by any other than his proper name, and although it appeared that he had a brother by the name of F. Brookbank. But the case of the vote for Senatorial Delegate was so palpably miscounted that they could not but deduct it. The next vote rejected was that of Knowlton, who had removed to the State of Ohio, raised a crop there, remained eleven and a half months, and then removed back, in February last. This man voted for Brookbank, whilst he admitted, himself, that he had no right to vote; but he did so because the judges told him he might. The committee considered this vote, also, to have been illegally counted, and, being taken away from Brookbank, it left a tie between the candidates. The committee being unable to come to any more correct conclusion, thought it best to let the people determine the case for themselves. They could not think themselves any better judge of the case than the people at home.

Mr. ANTHONY said that both of the votes that had been rejected by the committee, were rejected with the approbation of counsel, and yielded without argument, and he believed that if the depositions in relation to all the contested votes were examined here, the decision of the committee would be sustained by the Convention. With regard to the other vote—referred to in the report—the ticket printed upon both sides which seemed to have been fairly intended for Osborn—it was excluded, under the law, by the judges of the election. The committee considered that that vote should have been included, but they did not feel disposed to disturb the decision of the canvassers, and if they had included it, there would have been other votes to be included or excluded, which would have kept the balance even. In short, they found the matter surrounded with so many difficulties, which could not be explained by testimony, and which, as they were informed by counsel, were totally inexplicable, that they were constrained from a desire to do exact justice in the case, to make the report which had been submitted. He had entered upon the investigation with his mind prejudiced, if either way, rather in favor of the claims of the sitting member, but he found that he could not discharge his duty in any other manner than by subscribing to this report.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he understood that the ticket alluded to, with Osborn's name upon it, was not a double ticket, but printed on both sides.

Mr. ANTHONY said, it was a single piece of paper printed on both sides with the same matter.

Mr. HOLMAN remarked, that the decision upon this report would involve the question whether the county of Union should have a representative delegate in this Convention: for it was probable the principal portion of the business of the Convention would be transacted before a return could be had from another election. Considering the large body of information brought before the Convention by the report of the committee on elections; and considering the fact that many members were totally unadvised of the circumstances of the case, it would be extremely difficult to arrive at any degree of correctness in any decision to be made at this time; and considering further, that that they had no opportunity of investigating the matter at once, and that perhaps many members would like to have time to examine the evidence before the committee, and by which the committee had conceived themselves to be justified in making their report. Upon this ground, he would be glad to have the subject postponed until to-morrow, at any rate, and if no other gentleman desired to be heard, he would make that motion. He would move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed, and that it be made the special order for to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. KELSO said, he hoped the gentleman would modify his motion so as to lay on the table and allow the evidence to be printed.

[Several voices—"No, no, no."]

Mr. HOLMAN said, he would confine his motion to the report itself. His motion was, that the report be laid on the table and printed, and be made the special order for to-morrow morning at ten o'clock; but at the request of Mr. Colfax, Mr. Holman withdrew the motion.

Mr. COLFAX said, it seemed to him that, in any deliberative body, the members should endeavor to settle contests like this, if possible, so as to have every seat constantly filled; that every county entitled to a representation should have that representative here, and thus be entitled to an equal right and privilege and vote with others. In his estimation, the sitting member from Union county had been fairly and legally elected; and if they should send that gentleman home, and refer the contest to the people, the gentleman who might be successful in that contest, could not arrive here until towards the close of the Convention, and Union county would be thus virtually disfranchised so far as her representative delegate was concerned. He concurred, therefore, with the suggestion and motion of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). Notwithstanding his belief that the committee had done their duty honestly, faithfully—composed, as that committee was, of members of both political parties, and making a unanimous report, it would seem that their report would certainly meet with the acquiescence of the majority. But, notwithstanding all this, he was reluctantly compelled to differ with them; not because he sympathised politically with the sitting member, but because he differed with them in their conclusions, as set forth in the report itself. After stating that they had dismissed all matters of mere form, presented by the contestor, and had given to Brookbank all the votes claimed for him, as it was proper that they should, they say that, upon this count, he had a majority of two votes. But subsequently, upon a re-count, it appeared that his majority was increased to four; however, the committee would not consent to allowing these two additional votes for Brookbank, discovered upon a re-count made at Mr. Osborn's demand; though, if the contestor had found two extra votes for himself, as he doubtless hoped, he would certainly have claimed them as sustaining his contest. Then, by throwing out the vote of the man who removed for ten months to the State of Ohio, and the vote cast for Brookbank for Senatorial delegate, the result was a tie. Now, he was compelled, first, to dissent from the disallowance of the two additional votes found for Brookbank at the new count; because this re-count was taken at the instance and demand of the contestor himself, and made, too, officially by the officers of the election board. He would ask the chairman of the committee if this fact was not clearly in evidence?

Mr. KELSO replied that it was.

Mr. COLFAX. The re-count, then, was made at the request of the contestor, in the hope that, by so doing, he might be able to diminish the majority of Brookbank; but, upon the result of this second count, it appeared that Brookbank's majority, instead of being diminished, was increased to four votes. The committee decided that this count should not be regarded, for it had elicited the further information, that two more votes were counted than there were names recorded on the clerk's list; whereas, in this case, it would have been more properly the duty of the judges of the election, upon ascertaining this discrepancy, to have drawn out two votes from the ballot box. If the officers had done so in this case, it was in the highest degree probable that they would have, at least, drawn out one vote for Brookbank and one vote for Osborne. Making then, an equal division of the loss of these two extra votes—and what would be fairer, (for might not the clerks have casually omitted the names of the voters, as often is the case?)—Brookbank's majority, upon the second count, would be increased to THREE votes; and then, even according to the report and conclusions of the committee, he would be elected by a majority of one. Should it be presumed that both of these extra votes were cast by Mr. Brookbank's friends? If so, why?

He admitted, however, that the vote of Knowlton, who removed to Ohio, was, as the committee reported, clearly illegal. But the vote for Senatorial delegate, it seemed to him, should be counted for Brookbank. It was clearly the wish of the voter that that gentleman should represent him here—should be his delegate. This is not denied. Besides, the language of the law was, that the officers of the election should count the vote, if they could satisfy themselves as to "the office intended" by the voter. Every body who thought of the distinction between Senatorial and Representative delegate, knew that Brookbank was not a candidate for Senatorial delegate, but for Representative delegate. This distinction which the law had made between Senatorial and Representative districts, had made confusion too in other parts of the State. The mistake occurred by merely putting the name into the wrong blank; and it was a matter clear enough, it appears, to the board of canvassers, that the vote was intended for Brookbank as Representative delegate. According to the calculation which he made, Brookbank was entitled to his seat by two majority.

Mr. BALINGALL proposed to amend the amendment, by substituting a proposition to the effect that both the contestor and the contestee have a right to be heard in the Convention, either by themselves or their counsel.

The PRESIDENT ruled the proposition to be out of order, on account of incongruity.

Mr. NAVE said, if the question was to be settled at this time he desired that the ayes and nays should be taken.

Ten members rising to second the demand, The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FOSTER said, he had no doubt that the committee had bestowed considerable labor and attention upon the subject, but still he must dissent from the conclusion to which they had come. It appeared to him that they had rejected two legal votes for the sitting member; one of which was cast by mistake for Senatorial Delegate, and another, which was cast by the individual who moved to the State of Ohio, but was not absent from the State so long as twelve months. It was suggested by a gentleman on his right, that a man could not lose his residence until he had actually obtained a residence in another State. He thought it would be a very pertinent question to know whether this individual was a land-holder in this State. It might appear, from the answer to this question, that his residence in Ohio was intended to be only temporary. He would ask the chairman of the committee whether it was in evidence that this individual owned any landed property in this State?

Mr. KELSO said, the evidence was, that he expected to get a place from his brother-in-law, but failing in that, he went off to Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER said, he had always understood (without pretending to be anything of a legal man himself) that no man could lose his residence in this State, (a laugh,) at least unless he had been absent twelve months. He understood that to be the case in so many words, and it was generally so understood in his diggings. But, from the evidence, it appeared that this man was absent from the State only eleven and a half months. If that was the case he thought that the sitting member was entitled to his seat.

Mr. BERRY said, that he had as much confidence as any man in the committee on elections; but yet he thought they had rejected some testimony, which the committee could not reject if they understood the history of the case. Osborn claimed that five illegal votes had been cast for Brookbank, and proved it by heresy testimony. And when the question was asked of one of the men themselves, "For whom did you vote?" Brookbank stopped him and arrested the answer, upon the plea that it was illegal; thus taking advantage of this kind of testimony, and throwing the contestant back upon his second-class evidence. When Osborn was ready to produce first-class testimony they refused to receive it. He understood, from the report, that the evidence on the part of the contestant was thrown out entirely. He was satisfied that if the testimony were read before the Convention, they could not resist the conclusion that Brookbank had received the number of illegal votes which Osborn alleged that he had. He moved to lay the motion on the table; but at the request of Mr. Kelso, withdrew the motion.

Mr. KELSO said, that the law was, that you might call on a voter and require him to testify and declare who he voted for, if it should appear that he had voted illegally. But this man went on and made it out that he had cast a legal vote, therefore it was decided that he should not be asked how he voted.

Mr. BERRY enquired whether the papers did not show that Brookbank objected to the man's telling for whom he voted.

Mr. KELSO replied that they did not.

Mr. BERRY. Was it not in evidence that more than one illegal vote was cast for Brookbank?

Mr. KELSO. It was in evidence that four or five voters were charged with voting illegally for Brookbank. There was evidence of charges being made of illegal voting on both sides.

Mr. BERRY. Was it not in evidence that Van Metre voted for Brookbank?

Mr. KELSO said that it was; but he was not going to accuse any man of perjury.

Mr. BERRY then renewed his motion to lay on the table;

Which was rejected.

The question recurring upon Mr. RARIDEN'S amendment,

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, that when the report of the committee was presented, he noted as carefully as he was able, the points made in it; and he thought the committee had acted liberally in coming to the decision reported, and he thought their liberality was especially extended toward the sitting member. He certainly felt nothing but a desire to do justice to both of these parties, and settle the question upon its merits. He was a little astonished at the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, to amend the resolution reported. He could see no very good reason why gentlemen advocating the cause of the sitting member, should be desirous of disturbing the report. The report was too liberal to the sitting member. The committee had assumed the position, that they would not go behind any decision of the county board of canvassers. The Convention, under the law by which it was authorized, was clothed with power to determine upon the qualifications of its members. This being the case, there certainly could be no reason why the committee should not have submitted the facts, and called upon the Convention to decide, notwithstanding the action of the board of canvassers. If he understood the report, the committee took all the votes, as decided upon by the board of county canvassers, except one vote, which was cast in duplicate for Osborn—not deceitfully as he believed—and this left them equally balanced. The gentleman from Wayne had said, that all he desired was to get at what was really the intention of the voter. He concurred with the gentleman in this. It was a correct principle, that the voice of the people should be heard; and he considered that a vote taken in this manner as clearly indicated that the man wished to vote for Osborn, as it was manifest that the man who voted for Brookbank for Senatorial Delegate, intended to vote for him as a Representative Delegate. The law prescribed that when a vote was cast deceitfully it was illegal; and if this position could be maintained, with reference to this vote for Osborn, then it was rightfully cast out. But, upon going into the facts, it appeared that the man only neglected to tear two tickets apart, and that, there being no deceit in the act, the vote should have been counted for Osborn. Then was it not a stretch of liberality to say to the man holding the seat, merely, that he should hold over? It was a very delicate matter to say to a man holding a seat here, that he should take his hat and be off. But still, he wanted the matter determined exactly upon the principles of right and wrong. He was a democrat, and Mr. Osborn was a democrat; the gentleman holding the seat for Union county was a whig, and the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) was a whig; but he could not see how any gentleman could appropriate every favorable consideration presented upon one side, and eschew everything favorable upon the other side.

The PRESIDENT announced that the hour had arrived for the consideration of the special order of the day; the resolution for the abolition of the Grand Jury system.

Mr. PETTIT remarked, that this special order was made on his motion; but he had been impressed with the idea, that the consideration of the matter of the report of the committee on elections was privileged above all other questions.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that a special order supersedes all general orders.

Mr. PETTIT then moved that the special order be postponed until 2 o'clock this afternoon; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELSO said, he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). The committee on elections had taken up and considered only such as they were well assured was safe and positive testimony, and from that they had come to the conclusion which he had submitted. The committee could not go any further without a resort to guessing; and he had ascertained to his satisfaction, that if they went into guessing, the chances were about two to one in favor of Osborn; therefore he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he did not know but that the course proposed by the committee was wiser than the course he had proposed; nor would he hesitate to withdraw his proposition, if he thought it was likely to be a means of embroiling the House in an angry and ill-natured debate. He did not look upon the question whether one or the other of these gentlemen should occupy a seat in this Convention, as so important a matter as to justify an ill-natured discussion in this body.

But he was going to say a word with reference to his position, in order that his course might be clearly understood. He did think that his position was now quite above and beyond the influence of party. He asked nothing of party, he wanted nothing of it, and he expected nothing from it. He had at length arrived at that period of life when he could afford to pay the debt he owed to a generous community as well as any other man; and that debt was to do his duty. He admitted that the report might be liberal and fair, and a just expose of the testimony, in setting aside the two votes which had been counted for Brookbank; and he admitted that he might entertain the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) with reference to the double ticket—that, properly, it should have been counted for Osborn; yet all this would not exclude Brookbank. The case was well illustrated by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax). It was the dissatisfaction of Osborn as to the original count, which called together all the elements of the case for a new count; and from this new count it appeared, that two votes more should be added to the majority for his competitor, which made Brookbank's majority four votes instead of two. But it was ascertained out of doors, that, in two townships, there was one ballot more in each box than there could be found names on the tally-papers. There were two ballots in the boxes for which there could be found no names corresponding upon the clerk's list. These two names were rejected; and they were stricken off from the majority of the sitting member. Why this was so, he had not yet heard. Brookbank only got the votes which were cast for him. Why then should it be supposed that the two ballots for which there could be found upon the lists no names corresponding, were given for Brookbank? This was the ground over which the committee went; and although it could be accounted for in various ways honorable to the committee and to both parties; yet, the only rational way in which this discrepancy could be accounted for, was, to suppose, that the clerks who kept the lists were negligent and neglected to record these names. There was no inference, no suspicion, that there was any double or false voting. It was not pretended that any votes were found deceitfully folded together, but only, that there were two votes, one in each township, for which there was not a correspondent name upon the tally-papers. Upon this ground, alone, two votes were stricken off from the number given to the sitting member; but that would still leave him—counting the double ticket that was rejected for Osborn, and giving to him those two votes to which he at the first referred—a majority of one vote.

Notwithstanding, these were the settled convictions of his mind, he would feel as though he was serving his country better by withdrawing his proposition to amend the resolution, in preference to having one hour's angry debate upon this floor. He would not hesitate one moment to withdraw it if he thought such would be the consequence of its introduction; but, like all other men, he was desirous to see how many would agree with him. Nevertheless, if it were to be the means of irritation or of plunging the Convention into the broad ocean of guessing, he would withdraw it. For, almost anybody could out-guess him. He would not set himself up in competition with any man upon that subject. If the spirit of irritation were engendered, he knew too well how that would act; and would much rather withdraw his proposition, and let the subject go to the people, unless there should appear to be a decided opinion in favor of the sitting member, and that he was entitled to the seat.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon Mr. RARIDEN'S amendment, and the Secretary reported yeas 36, nays 92, as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Barbour, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hogin, Holman, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Steele, Stevenson, Terry, Thomas, and Todd—36.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Taylor, Trimby, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BASCOM proposed to amend the resolution reported by the committee, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

"That JAMES OSBORN is duly elected Representative Delegate for the County of Union, and hereby admitted to his seat."

The question being upon the amendment offerred by the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. BASCOM,)

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that he regretted exceedingly that the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) with all his experience upon matters of this kind, and upon a proposition so liberal under the circumstances as that offered by the committee, should propose that the gentleman now occupying the contested seat shall retain it. He had anticipated that a proposition of that character could not be offered without the presentation of a counter-proposition, like that which had just now been submitted. He regretted it the more, because it must be apparent to every gentleman, that there was a great deal of doubt hanging over the election of both of the claimants to the contested seat—a doubt, too, which was calculated to arouse a general feeling of excitement among the members of the Convention. He thought that the committee on elections had acted upon the most generous and liberal principles possible, in making out their report. The question, to say the least of it, was a very doubtful one, and the committee, in the report they had made he thought, had acted perfectly right. If they had acted upon probabilities, they would have been two to one in favor of Mr. Osborn; but he trusted that the pending amendment would be voted down; and that the Convention, by an unanimous vote, would send the question back to the people, and thus prevent any exhibition of party feeling, or any kind of excitement upon the question in this Hall. He did not wish that any feeling of the kind should be aroused among the members of the Convention during its sittings, and he hoped that the amendment would be voted down, and that the report of the committee would be concurred in.

Mr. BASCOM said, that as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) had seen fit to propose that Mr. Brookbank should be considered the delegate to fill the contested seat, he thought it perfectly proper and right to present the claims of Mr. Osborn, and let the Convention decide between them. He thought that as the committee had not been able to decide in favor of either of the gentlemen claiming the contested seat, that the Convention, if it were possible, should decide the question, either in favor of one, or the other. If the matter was sent back to the people of Union County, they all knew that by the time the new election was held, the sittings of the Convention would be nearly completed; and, therefore, that the election would be almost unnecessary.

As the delay in the decision of this question had almost virtually deprived the people of Union County of a representation in that Hall, he thought that they should not adopt the report of the committee, but endeavor to fill the contested seat with one of the two gentlemen claiming it. Perhaps the report had better be printed before they finally decided the question.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. BASCOM accordingly withdrew his motion.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the report of the committee, the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, resulted as follows :

Those who voted in the affirmative were ,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beard, Bicknell, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogan, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—103.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Bascomb, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Clark of Hamilton, Crawford, Edmonston, Gootee, Gregg, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, May, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Prather, Steele, Stevenson, Trimby, Wiley, and Yocum—23.

So the report of the committee was concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES.

The resolution offered by Mr. MAGUIRE on Saturday, in relation to the number of copies of the proceedings and debates to be printed, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that in offering this resolution he was influenced by no feelings of ill will whatever to the present State Printer ; he disclaimed any other motive than that of desiring to forward the business of the Convention. It was exceedingly important for the Printer to know how many copies were desired by the Convention, as the work would probably progress in connection with the newspaper publication of the proceedings. He made this explanation because he did not wish that it should be supposed that he had brought forward this motion for the purpose of interfering with any existing legal right which the State Printer might think he had to do the printing.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. KELSO remarked, that there was a blank to be filled.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting the following : "That the State Printer shall print one thousand copies of the proceedings and debates of the Convention in book form, with an index."

Mr. KELSO said, he was very much inclined to think that they could get along with the Printer they had already elected.

Mr. BORDEN desired to have the yeas and nays on his amendment. The Legislature, he said, had provided a Stenographer to report the proceedings and debates, and it seemed clear to him, whatever might be said in regard to the printing of the Convention, that the printing ordered by the Legislature should be given to the State Printer. Entertaining this opinion, he wished to have his vote on the question recorded.

Mr. WOLFE thought the Convention, before ordering the printing to be done, should find out whether it could be done any cheaper than it was generally, by transferring the printed matter in the newspaper to the book form. If not, he should move to fill the blank with one copy, which it was requisite should be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, and let the Legislature attend to the printing of the extra copies. He would inquire of the President if he knew anything about the matter.

The PRESIDENT said, he could give the gentleman no information on the subject.

Mr. LOCKHART moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) on the table.

Mr. BORDEN asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken with the following result—yeas 92, nays 25.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Trimby, Vanbenthusen, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—92.

YAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bicknell, Borden, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Gregg, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hogin, Howe, Kinley, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Nave, Newman, Read of Clark, Smiley, Spann, Terry, and Wallace.

—25.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

The question then being upon the adoption of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,)

Mr. PETTIT said, that he had voted to lay the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allen on the table, not because he had altered his views as to the correctness of the claim of the State Printer to do the printing of the Convention, but because he thought that the Convention had no authority whatever to authorize the printing of their proceedings in book form; for that reason, also, he should vote against the resolution. The fourteenth section of the act providing for the call of the Convention contained the following language:

“The roll containing the draught of the amended Constitution adopted by the Convention, and the proceedings of said Convention, shall be deposited by the President and Secretary thereof in the office of the Secretary of State, who shall file the same, and cause said Constitution to be entered on record in his office.”

By this clause it was plainly evident, that when the Convention had deposited the journal of its proceedings, and a manuscript copy of the new Constitution in the Secretary of State's office, its work would be ended. There was no authority given for the printing of any number of copies of their proceedings in book form at all. It was upon this ground that he had voted against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allen; and it was upon this ground that he should vote against the pending resolution.

Mr. KELSO moved to fill the blank with “one thousand.”

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland. (Mr. Kelso,) and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the original resolution,

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that he hoped some gentleman was prepared to inform the Convention as to the number of copies necessary to be struck off. He supposed every member of the Convention would be entitled to a copy, and that a copy should be deposited in the office of the clerk of every county in the State, and a number distributed among the various colleges, libraries, and public institutions of the State. It was necessary to ascertain the number that would be wanted for sale, as well as for distribution.

He trusted some gentleman would make a calculation, and inform the Convention of the number of copies necessary to be printed.

Mr. BORDEN said, that he would state in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ripley, that he thought, if the Convention should determine to have their proceedings and debates published in book form, they should order at least one thousand copies. He supposed that one copy would be supplied to each member and officer of this Convention, one to each member of the last and the succeeding Legislature, one to each of the counties of the State, and one to each of the states of the Union; and he thought the remainder should be placed in the State Library, to be disposed of hereafter, as the Legislature should direct.

While he was up he would avail himself of the opportunity to say a few words as to who should do this printing. He looked upon the proposition of the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,) to employ the printer to the Convention to publish their proceedings and debates, as a direct infraction of the law passed at the last session of the Legislature, calling this Convention. He had had something to do with preparing that bill—he did not speak of it boastingly, but simply for the purpose of explaining the views of those who were instrumental in drafting it. Several years since a vote of the people had been taken on the question to call a Convention to revise and amend the Constitution of this State. His venerable friend from Clark (Mr. Read) and himself, had then prepared a bill, to be introduced into the Legislature, calling a Convention. It was introduced by him, in the Senate, and ordered to be printed, and a copy of it sent to him (Mr. B.) by that gentleman. About a year since, the Senator from the district which he represented, and a member of the House of Representatives, from a portion of the district which he (Mr. B.) represented, prepared the bill convoking this assembly, which was finally enacted into a law. They made the bill, originally prepared by his friend from Clark (Mr. Read) and himself, the basis of the present law. Some very important amendments to it were made in the two Houses, particularly in the Senate, and he had been informed by the Secretary of State, that it had been so badly engrossed as to have caused some egregious blunders, not only in the phraseology, but also in the substance of the law. One of the important alterations made in the Senate, was in regard to the stenographer. The bill, as originally drawn, had left it optional with the Convention to elect such an officer or not, as they chose, and to fix his pay. This was struck out, and it was so amended as to peremptorily require such an officer; and the power was taken from the Convention to appoint him, and was conferred on the Governor. Provision also was made for the payment of his services and the mode of that payment, thus taking the whole matter of the reporting and printing of the proceedings and debates of this body out of the hands of the Convention.

He would further remark, that it was the intention of those who drew up the act to fix the compensation of every officer of the Convention, so that no discretion should be allowed to the Convention in the matter. The reason why the Stenographer's compensation was not fixed, was because—as the act originally stood—it was not known whether the Convention would, or would not, elect a Stenographer. It was, however, the intention, with regard to every other officer, to fix permanently the compensation that should be paid beyond cavil or dispute. It was unquestionably the design that the Convention, under no pretence whatever, should attempt to draw money out of the treasury otherwise than as specially authorized by that act. The first thing done was to provide for the payment of the members, which, in the twelfth section, was fixed at three dollars per day. Now he would ask if any gentleman would rise in his place and contend for a moment that they could add one dollar to, or subtract one from, the compensation fixed by the act? It would be seen also, by the same section, that the compensation of other officers and attendants was to be the same that was paid to the officers of the General Assembly for similar services. The next thing was to provide for stationery; and by the thirteenth section of the act, it would be seen that it was the duty of the proper officers to furnish the members with such stationery as they might require during the session, to be paid for in the same manner, and out of the same fund, that the contingent expenses of the General Assembly were paid. This was a particular fund, and over it the Convention possessed no control whatever. He presumed it would not be contended that the Convention could proceed to rescind the contract which the officers of the State had made for supplying the State with stationery, and if they could, would some gentleman be so kind as to point him to any law of the State authorizing them to draw money out of the treasury for such a purpose? The law having thus provided for all the expenses of the Convention except printing, the question next arose as to who should do the printing for the Convention. By turning to the Revised Statutes of the State for 1843, it would be found that all the public printing of the State was provided for by law, and that that law had not only placed the matter beyond the control of the Convention, but beyond the control of the Legislature itself for three years; and he would assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the Legislature itself had not the power, much less could it have conferred it upon that body, to rescind the contract with the State Printer, and to confer the public printing of this body upon another. It appeared to him that no one could read that law without coming to the conclusion that all the printing ordered by the Convention should be done by the Public Printer, and that the taking of the smallest portion of the printing away from him was a violation of the contract, and entitled him to compensation from the State for such violation. Much less could the Convention, without even the authority of the Legislature to justify such a course, proceed to take it from the present State Printer and confer it upon another.

He knew it had been asserted by some gentlemen on that floor—for whose legal opinions he had the highest respect—that this body could go beyond the act convoking it, and not only elect a printer, but draw the money out of the treasury to pay him for his services. But there were other gentlemen for whose opinions he entertained also the highest respect, and in whose opinions he concurred, who thought that to attempt to give the publication of the proceedings away, other than to the Public Printer, would be an open violation of the existing contract, and in its consequences draw an additional sum of fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars out of the treasury to pay the damages sustained by the loss of said contract. He supposed, however, that a combination had been formed in regard to the printing, too powerful to be resisted, and he spoke under the embarrassment of addressing an assembly which had already prejudged the case. The people of Indiana were already borne down with a heavy taxation to pay the interest on their State debt, and he could not sit by in silence and permit this, the proposed action to which he had been alluding, without, in behalf of those he represented, entering his protest. He had heard the opinion expressed by one of the ablest jurists in the State, that the bond which this Convention had a few days since required from the person they had elected as Printer, was entirely nugatory, because there was no law authorizing the taking of such a bond. If the Convention would leave the printing where the law had placed it, no difficulty would arise, as the law provided what compensation should be paid for doing the public printing—the manner in which it should be measured and certified, and out of what fund it should be paid. Over this fund the Convention possessed no control, and he was at a loss to see how money could be drawn from the treasury under the act providing for the payment of the printing, unless it was done under the general law of '43, which provided for the public printing. If they went on and directed their proceedings and debates to be published by the printer they had elected, he would inquire what price they intended to pay, and who was to measure and certify the work? The Secretary of State, who was authorized to attend to this work for the State under the law as it now stood, was not compelled to perform this duty for the Convention. Again, if they took this duty out of the hands of State officers, who would be responsible for the manner in which this contract was to be executed? He desired to say nothing against the gentleman who had been elected, for he presumed he would do his duty; but was it wise or prudent in them to take this business out of the hands of the officer of the State, and then leave every thing in regard to the public printing in an unsettled condition? Again, if these officers believed that they could not either give the warrant or pay the money for this printing, he was fearful they would involve themselves in difficulty with them, for whatever they might say there in regard to the extent of their power, still the drawing of money out of the treasury was a practical matter and must be done in pursuance of the law. The old Constitution, was not yet abrogated, which required them to bear constantly in mind that no money could be drawn from the treasury only in consequence of appropriations made by law. These officers would be liable to impeachment and removal from office if they were to audit or pay any money out of the treasury unless authorized to do so by law. He hoped the Convention would take time to reflect upon this subject before they voted definitely in regard to it, as he apprehended that it required a more mature consideration than from present appearances they were disposed to give it.

Mr. OWEN hoped that the printing would go where the Legislature desired it to go, and that no engagement would be entered into with any other printer than the one authorized by the State. He was in favor of postponing any action upon this subject, and leaving it entirely in the hands of the Legislature. He would not assert that under the existing law authorizing that Convention, that they were compelled to delay the publication in book form of their proceedings, but it did appear to him from the reading of the law, that that was the design of the Legislature. A copy of their proceedings had to be filed in the Secretary's office at the close of the sittings of the Convention, that copy to be at the disposal of the Legislature. They had already very wisely made provision for the publication of their debates in newspaper form, and if, in connection with their publication in this manner, some arrangement could be effected whereby the type used in those papers could be transferred to the book edition, thus lessening the expense of the publication, why it was a matter worthy of consideration. In a few weeks, however, the Legislature would be in session, and the question could be settled by that body satisfactorily. He considered if there was any doubt as to whether they should give the printing of the Convention to the State Printer or to the Printer of the Convention, that they should postpone action upon the subject and leave it to the consideration of the Legislature. He thought, also, that the members of the Convention would prefer obtaining a copy of their proceedings and debates by a vote of the Legislature than from any vote they might take among themselves.

Mr. GREGG moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. OWEN said: Mr. President, I hold in my hands a resolution which if acted upon at all, should be acted upon now, and for the purpose of offering it for the consideration of the Convention at this time, I will ask for a suspension of the rules. The resolution which I presented on Saturday, relative to the publication of the debates and proceedings of this Convention in the daily papers of Indianapolis, and which was adopted, was hastily drawn up, and I wish now to amend it by adding these words, (where it is resolved to take one copy of the Indiana State Journal,) "one copy of the Indiana Statesman, and one copy of the Volkstblatt." When I offered that resolution I had no intention whatever to make an invidious distinction between the newspapers published at the Capital.

The Convention refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio offered a resolution, in substance as follows:

Resolved, That from and after the expiration of the present charter of the State Bank of Indiana, all connection between the State and Banks shall cease.

Mr. KELSO. I believe, Mr. President, that the resolution just offered by the gentleman from Ohio, is an imperative resolution; if so, I would move to amend it so as to make it a resolution of inquiry, simply.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I was in hopes, sir, that the gentleman (Mr. Kelso) would have permitted me to say one word, relative to the object and import of the resolution which I have just now offered, before he made a motion to change its entire character. I desire to make a few remarks upon the subject involved in that proposition, for I deem it a very important one; but, although I am firmly of the opinion that we should engraft upon the Constitution we are about to frame, a principle in consonance with the spirit of that resolution; although I believe the highest and best interests of the State would be secured and furthered by its adoption, still the matter is under the control of the Convention, and I shall cheerfully acquiesce in whatever disposition it may see fit to make of it. It is due to every member here, that he be allowed the right fully to discuss every proposition presented in this chamber. I do not intend to make a long speech upon the subject; it is not my habit to make lengthy speeches; but as it is near the hour of adjournment, and as gentlemen would listen to what little I have to say, with less patience now than at another time, I will, if it meet the wishes of gentlemen, move that the Convention adjourn until 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. PETTIT rose and said: I know, Mr. President, that there is a resolution pending, which has been made the special order for this hour, and I would not, without sufficient cause, move a suspension of the rules which preclude all other business, but there is a matter, connected with the contested election case which was reported upon this morning, which should receive the immediate attention of the Convention. I shall, therefore, move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution.

The rules were suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. PETTIT then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President certify the mileage and per diem of Benjamin F. Brookbank and Joseph Osborn, up to this day inclusive, allowing each of them the legal rates of a member of this Convention; and the President inform the Governor that there is a vacancy in this Convention of a Representative Delegate from the county of Union.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. PETTIT remarked, that the object of the resolution was so obviously right and proper, that he should not make any further remarks on the subject.

The resolution was adopted.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The special order, being the consideration of the resolution relative to the abolition of the present Grand Jury system, was then taken up.

Mr. ANTHONY rose and said: Mr. President, I have paid some attention to the subject embraced in the proposition now before us, and feeling considerable interest in it, I will offer a few remarks in relation thereto, more, however, for the purpose of opening the discussion, and preparing the way for those who are fully competent to discuss the subject, than to make a speech myself. At this time I will merely look at the subject in its economical relations. We have in Indiana ninety counties. The Grand Jury, along with the Circuit Court, assembles twice each year, and is generally composed of from sixteen to eighteen individuals. We generally sit ten days, and as we may set down their per diem at one dollar and twenty-five cents each, the total expense of Grand Juries to the people of this State, is some twenty thousand dollars each year. And, sir, for the payment of this large sum, remember, that the people must be taxed, in addition to their other burthens, twenty thousand dollars for Grand Juries alone! In addition to this should be estimated the fees of bailiffs and other incidental expenses, occasioned by the finding of unjustifiable indictments by the Grand Juries, in their secret sessions. And we might add the expenses of petit juries, engaged in trying individuals upon these indictments, so many of which would never have been found had the sittings of the Grand Jury been in public, and their decisions found after an impartial hearing of the testimony on both sides.

I am not so well prepared, sir, to discuss this question as I should have been, had we been supplied with the additional information this Convention has endeavored to obtain. But there is enough already known to show us that the expenses entailed by Grand Juries are greater than the entire expense of our whole judicial system besides. We should thoroughly investigate this matter, and if it is possible to establish a more economical system, and one which should secure all the ends of justice and social order, we are bound to do so.

It has been remarked and objected, that we have not the Constitutional right to abolish the system of Grand Juries. We have cited to us the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States, which says that, "In criminal prosecutions, no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a Grand Jury, except in cases occurring in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

But, sir, I have not thus construed that provision of the Federal Constitution. I do not consider that the terms of the fifth article were intended to, or do, prohibit the sovereign States from doing away with what may indeed be "the time honored institution" of the Grand Jury. If we examine the history of the formation and adoption of the Federal Constitution, we shall discover that at the time it was sent to the several States for their consideration and adoption, this identical clause—the fifth article now relied upon as a conclusive bar to the abolition of the Grand Jury—was not in the Constitution at all! It was one of the amendments afterwards made and adopted, and it was introduced to limit the Constitution and to confine the powers of the General Government. It was for the purpose of forever prohibiting the General Government from taking the life, liberty, or property of a citizen of any of the United States without his being first indicted by a Grand Jury and afterwards tried by a jury of his peers. It has been decided by more than one court, that those articles of a general nature in the Constitation of the United States were designed to restrict and confine the powers of the Federal Constitution—not to extend them. Such was the decision of the Supreme Court of New York, reported in Wendell; and in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in the seventh of Peter's, Marshall, Judge says:—"The provision of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as claiming that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation is intended, solely, as a limitation on the exercise of power by the government of the United States, and that the Constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States for themselves; for the government of individual States. Each State established a Constitution for itself, and in local Constitutions, provided such limitations and restrictions on the powers of its particular government as its judgment dictated. The people framed such a government for the United States as they supposed best adapted to their situation, and best calculated to promote their interests. The powers they conferred on this Government were to be exercised by itself, and the limitations on powers, if expressed in general terms, are naturally and necessarily applicable to the government created by the instrument. They are limitations of powers granted in the instrument itself; not of distinct governments framed by different persons and for different purposes."

This decision of Judge Marshall is deserving of great consideration, as is every opinion emanating from that distinguished jurist, but this decision comes to us with additional weight when we reflect that Mr. Marshall was one of those who, at the organization of the Government, was strongly in favor of extending the powers of the Federal Government. When such a Judge, holding such a peculiar position in this regard, gives such a decision as I have quoted, there can no longer remain any doubts in the minds of gentlemen as to the right and the power under the Constitution to abolish Grand Juries whenever the people through their delegates shall demand such a change. Behind these decisions we intrench ourselves, and here, for the present, we will leave the consideration of the Constitutional feature of this question.

It is alleged that the Grand Jury system was established, originally to protect the rights and privileges of the subject against the encroachments of kingly and unlimited power. It is very easy for us, Mr. President, to understand the reason why all English writers have uniformly given this as the reason for the establishment of Grand Juries. If we look at the Constitution of England, though ever so cursorily, we shall discover a vast difference between it and our own. In England all power is lodged in the King, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. All power, all authority, and all patronage flows directly and exclusively from the King, who is Supreme Head of the State, and also of the Church.

Every officer in the kingdom is the agent and servant, not of the people, sir, but of the King, to whom, and to whom alone he is responsible for all his acts, and on whom he is dependent for the amount and payment of his salary. The Sovereign appoints even the Justices of the Peace as well as all Judges. It is true that by virtue of recent acts of Parliament, forced from that body by the irresistible pressure of a public opinion and a popular will, which, even in absolute monarchies, cannot be wholly suppressed, the Judges are made somewhat more independent of the Crown. From this glance at the British Constitution, it is evident that if the King wanted an indictment found against an individual, no matter how slight the cause, personal pique, or animosity may prompt the whole, he has but to command it and the thing is done. Thus we see that the real object of the institution of the Grand Jury system in England—that it was not so much for the protection of the people's rights and franchise, as it was a convenient and most powerful prerogative of the Crown to the aggrandizement and strengthening of which it has always contributed.

But in this country every thing is different. Instead of the King or the Government in any form, and under any name, being the fountain and primal source of honor and patronage, the people is the acknowledged source of all honor and every officer in the Republic, from the President of the Union down to a township "fence viewer," is responsible solely and directly to the people; hence no such institution as a Grand Jury is needed to stand between the people and of a King or the Sovereign authority. To those who tell us that the Grand Jury was established in England, and has been used for the protection of the rights and privileges and freedom of the people, I would reply, that History does not sustain them in that position. In all the important State trials in England, from the time of Sidney down to the trial of the great Irish agitator, O'Connel, the Grand Jury has not been effective in the service of popular rights. When the whole British Empire was searched to discover the author of "Juries" the system was not thus effective. The Grand Jury system did not shield and foster popular rights when it found a bill of indictment against Thomas Paine for publishing some of the soundest and most brilliant essays on Political Economy and the inherent rights of man, that have appeared in any age of the World. The Grand Jury, in our own times, did not serve the noble ends attributed to it, when it found a bill of indictment of Daniel O'Connel for libel. History will bear me out in the assertion that whenever it has suited the interests or the will of the King to have this or that subject indicted, whether the object was the ruin of private character or the against sequestration of rich estates, or the gratification of private pique and animosity, the Grand Jury has ever been found the willing instrument of the Crown.

But, sir, admitting for the moment, that Grand Juries originated in a desire to protect the people from the encroachments of kingly prerogative—that they were instituted to protect the liberties of the people, and to stand between the subject and the Crown, and saying to the latter “thus far shalt thou come and no farther.” I say admitting all this, we in these United States, need no such barrier to the encroachments of the Government on the rights of the people, for the object of the assembling of every Legislature—the object of every law that is enacted, is for the protection and guaranteeing of the rights of the citizens. In England, laws are passed for the benefit of the Crown and an hereditary aristocracy.

It is true, sir, that the resolution now before the Convention proposes a radical reform, and one that has not yet been so extensively and fully discussed as it should be. But the abolition of the Grand Jury system, should we be able to effect so desirable an object, and one that would relieve the tax-payers of the State from a burthen of some twenty thousand dollars a year, would be no more radical than that other reform, which will unquestionably be made by this Convention—the election of all State officers by the people. It is not so radical and uncertain in its policy as the proposed reform in the practice and forms of the law. I consider the doing away with all special pleading, and the abolition of all distinctions in the form of different actions, a much more radical reform than the one of which I am an humble advocate. Experience, which should be our great light and guide in the formation of an organic law for the people of this great State, has clearly demonstrated that the election of Judges by the people has been productive of all those beneficial results which were anticipated and predicted by its friends. Experience has also proven that the abolition of special pleading, so far as it has been tried, works well. And, sir, allow me to say that experience will demonstrate the practicability and the great utility of doing away with our system of Grand Juries. It would be the accomplishing of another stride forward in the march of reform and progress.

But, sir, this objection to a good measure, on the ground of its being radical and “ultra,” is not a new one, nor is it now first urged against this proposition. The same reasons were urged and the same argument used against the proposition for the election of Judges by the people. The same cry of “too radical,” and “too ultra,” was raised in opposition to the measure for the abolition of life terms in office, irrespective of good behavior. This custom of making the Judges’ term of office for life, without the tenure being dependent upon the condition of good behavior, was, like the Grand Jury system, copied from England.

But, Mr. President, gentlemen ask us “what do you propose to substitute in the place of Grand Juries, should this Convention see fit to abolish that system?” The resolution before us proposes to substitute, in the place of the discarded Grand Jury, a system of public examinations. At another time I will go more fully into the subject of a substitute, unless, in the mean time, other friends of this measure discuss that branch of the proposition. I have already occupied more time than I had designed, and, for the present, will leave the discussion to abler hands.

Mr. RARIDEN Being one of the “seniors” in this Convention of the delegates of the people of Indiana, as well as one of the “seniors” in the legal profession, it becomes me, perhaps, to take some humble share in this discussion. The law has been the study of my life—especially those legal institutions connected with the administration of justice, and I shall, in a few brief remarks, endeavor to place the institution of the Grand Jury before this Convention, in the position in which it justly belongs.

And first, sir, let me apprise gentlemen, old or young, experienced or inexperienced, that, when they undertake to pull down and rashly demolish this part of the American Judicial system, they are embarking in a cause too weak to carry them, and too heavy to be carried by them. Yes, sir, the Grand Jury system is too deeply rooted in the confidence and the respect of the people of this State, and the people of the American Union, to be torn up in this day of light and general information.

In briefly remarking upon this subject, I shall refer to no books—shall quote no authorities, but shall discuss in an elementary manner, merely, the philosophy of our Government, and the reason of the introduction of this Grand Jury system into American Jurisprudence. I shall endeavor to show that, whatever the system may have been under a monarchy—for whatever purpose instituted—its workings have been highly beneficial in this country since the period of the revolution.

It has been claimed and asserted, that Grand Juries have, in England, been an auxiliary to kingly prerogative—an ever-willing instrument in the hands of the king to strengthen his position, and maintain his power. I am ready to admit all this, and I believe that I shall succeed in convincing the Convention that this very fact strengthens my position in favor of the perpetuity of the Grand Jury. In all governments, other than this, which, I believe, is sui generis—has no parallel in the world—(I mean in all monarchical governments)—their very existence is based upon the theory that all power vests absolutely and solely in the sovereign, and that the people have no power and no rights, except those which are specifically vouchsafed to them by the sovereign. Now, to enable the king to sit securely on his throne, and to maintain, unbroken, all his prerogatives, it was necessary that there should be an institution like the Grand Jury, for he could not be perpetually traveling in all parts of his empire, and visiting each borough and neighborhood, for the purpose of inquiring what offences had been committed against the peace, what treason had been contemplated against the security of his rule and the permanence of his throne. Hence arose the necessity for the Grand Jury, for the strengthening of those prerogatives which he was kindly presumed to use for the good of the subject. All mankind admitted the source and repository of all power to be in the crown, and assented to any provision, having for its object the maintaining of the power and prerogatives of the crown in all their vigor, trusting that, in proportion as the hands of the sovereign were strengthened, and his power made absolute, the greater would be his willingness and ability to protect the rights of the subject. Now, sir, by the American Revolution, we overturned this whole system of things. We turned the whole fabric of government "bottom upwards," so to speak. We based the whole theory of government on the great principle that all power resides originally with the people absolutely, and that the crown, the Government or the President, whatever you choose to call the representative of power, had no prerogatives, no power, except what was expressly and specifically delegated to it by the people. We may call the State the crown, and I will speak of this matter at this time as though there was but one state. While the founders of our Government based all their action upon the principle that all political power was inherent in the people, they still admitted and acted, upon that definition of civil liberty given by Blackstone, and assented to by every sensible statesman; viz: "Civil liberty comports with such restrictions upon individuals as are necessary for the good of the community or of society." Then we readily perceive that, although all power is vested in the people, still the people must impose upon themselves such restraints, and must yield the exercise of such natural rights and privileges as would conflict with the well-being and prosperity of the community at large. It is evident that it would not do to allow all men the unrestrained and unlimited exercise of all their natural rights; the property, the reputation, and the personal security of each individual member of society, the poorest as well as the richest, the weak as well as the powerful, would not be secure. So, with the admission and reception of such general principles, by common consent we made a King, which we call a State, and clothed it with power enough to enforce and execute the will of the community, expressed through its delegates. A way was prescribed in which that will of the whole should be carried out.

There was another thing—another right which, in the compact of government, was surrendered by individuals—the right to redress private and personal wrongs. I do not mean, sir, that we surrendered the natural right of self-defence, but I mean that in becoming members of a great political society, each individual binds himself not to take into his own hands the adjudication and the settlement of his own wrongs where his life is not in immediate peril, but yields to the King or the State the exclusive right of redressing wrongs. Then, in order to enable the government to carry out and perform its duty of hearing all complaints and redressing all wrongs, it must have an additional power conferred upon it to enable it to execute all the behests of society and regulate its intercourse. We declared that government should consist of a legislative, an executive, and a judicial department. The legislative department is to provide remedies for wrongs—to enact that a certain punishment shall follow every crime. Then the judicial department was organized to think, if I may so speak, for the body politic. We could not assert our own rights and redress our own wrongs, so we agreed to take the opinion and the judgment of the judiciary, and to yield our private judgment implicitly to its decisions. Then an executive department was organized, to fulfil and carry out the will of the other departments.

A fundamental idea at the basis of this Government, thus constituted with its legislative, judicial, and executive functions, is, that the majority—the great mass of community—is moral and virtuous, and that the Government must be so administered as to give a virtuous direction to the public mind; for if vice and evil triumph over virtue and good morals, no power could be bestowed upon any government to maintain and protect the rights of individual members of society. But the judicial department, constituted of supreme, circuit, and other judges, cannot, from the very nature of the case, inquire into the habits and conduct of every man, and cannot go to every individual and tell him what he must do and what he must omit doing, for the good and peace of society. So we write out a code of morals for the community, prescribing what acts may be committed and what the good of the community requires should not be done. The theory of our government in all this is, that it prohibits only what is wrong and ought not to be done, while it protects the exercise of those acts deemed to be right. Government also affixes certain penalties to the omission or commission of certain acts. But the judges, as I before stated, could not ride into every neighborhood and inquire into the propriety of the acts of this and that individual, in order to decide whether there was sufficient cause for the expense and exposure of a public trial, and hence the institution, most wise, in my opinion, of grand juries. And although this institution, in the hands of arbitrary and irresponsible power, may have been abused, yet in this country it can be productive only of good and promotive only of good order.

In England, to which we have been cited, the members of the grand jury were selected by the King, or indicated by him, and it is easy to see how unjust practices may have been countenanced and wrong done; but in this country the case is entirely different, and all cavils and objections founded on the construction of this jury in England, fall to the ground when applied to the system in this country. Here there is no patronage to corrupt the grand juror; the office is neither one of profit or of particular honor, and as it is held but for one term, all temptations to do wrong are excluded. Here the grand jurors are the representatives of the people, of whom they form a part, and in the midst of whom they sit and act, and are directly affected by the good or bad example, the beneficial or the pernicious tendency of their acts. It is more to their interest to act for the interests of the community in which they live than for the interests of any designing men high in place and power; in a word, sir, the grand juror has, comparatively speaking, no temptation to do wrong.

The gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Anthony) points us to the examples of the perversion of the institution of the grand jury in England, in assailing the rights and liberties of the people when indictments were sought to be found against Thomas Paine, Daniel O'Connell, and the author of the Letters appearing over the anonymous signature of "Junius." I reply, that the very fact that neither of these men were victimized, as might have suited the desire of government, is an evidence that this very system of grand juries had so impregnated the community with liberal notions that it was found to be impossible to crush these men by their means. Imbued with the spirit of liberty, which had its inception in the institution of grand juries, they brooked the King and all his minions; and, sir, that spirit went on and grew stronger as it grew louder, until it reached its climax in the Revolution.

As I before remarked, the whole of the old theory of government is turned bottom upwards in this country; the pyramid, to illustrate my meaning, which before the period of the American Revolution, was placed by the monarchists of the old world upon its apex or little end, was reversed and set upon its base—the big end down—just as it ought to be. [Applause.] All power emanates from the people, and we have only delegated power to the State of Indiana so far as is necessary for the protection and welfare of the people of Indiana. The grand jury system is but an auxiliary to the system of common schools, and churches, and Sabbath schools, and all institutions for the furtherance of good morals and the well-being of society.

But, sir, if it is determined to abolish grand juries, let us make clean work of it, and abolish the criminal code altogether, by voting it in unjust, unnecessary, and inconvenient restriction upon the exercise of our natural rights. I presume that this would be a great convenience to some aspiring men. There are many men of an aspiring turn of mind, of large expectations in the future, who exceedingly much dislike to be brought up before a grand jury, and there have their iniquitous practices disclosed. I know that it is very humiliating, especially for political men, who are exceedingly anxious to stand well before the country, to be subject to such an annoyance as a grand jury; and I presume that some such will be found ready to lend a hearty support to this measure for its abolition. But, sir, none but the guilty need be afraid. The Bible says that the wicked flee when no man pursueth, and so it is of a class who are so desperately fearful of some unjust proceeding on the part of a grand jury. I know that it is humiliating to be brought before this tribunal; but, sir, it is not so bad as under the old Jewish law. There the culprit was brought up before the judges, with the eye of all Israel upon him. That was more humiliating to a proud, aspiring man, but then the penalty was not so severe, for the Israelite got off with an offering of incense and a sacrificed calf, [laughter,] whereas we send the culprit to the State's Prison. [Renewed laughter.]

I shall not deny but that there may be some abuses connected with the system of grand juries, but they are easily remedied. One of these incidental evils may be mentioned: the facility with which the guilty sometimes escape punishment. This, in very many cases, results from the election of young and inexperienced lawyers to the responsible and important office of prosecuting attorney, which should be filled with the ablest lawyers and men of the soundest judgment in the circuit. And it not unfrequently happens that an innocent man is convicted, through the over-zeal of a young prosecuting attorney, who is over anxious to distinguish himself by procuring the conviction of every indicted person. But these are evils which are the fault, not of the system, but of the people in the selection of officers. The system itself is a most valuable one. Let us protect and guard it from abuses—growing up around it as around every good system—on the one hand, and from the rash attempts of innovators on the other.

Mr. NAVE said, it had always been the case that when any change was proposed to be made in any of the long established usages of courts of justice, those who had been all their lives accustomed to those usages, and who had consequently become wedded to them, were invariably found to set themselves in opposition to all change or improvement. In like manner every effort that had heretofore, at any time, been made to reform and simplify any of the forms of proceedings of government, by which the destinies of mankind were controlled and regulated, was invariably opposed by those who had been taught from their infancy to reverence those forms. Such was the case with his venerable friend from Wayne—a gentleman for whose opinions he had the highest respect, and whose talents he admired—in reference to the Grand Jury system; that gentleman was wedded to the system. He had been educated to admire it, and to cherish it, as had indeed the American people generally, and, therefore, they could expect nothing else than to find him standing up in opposition to the proposition that had been introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe; neither was it surprising to find him denouncing those who advocated the abolition of the Grand Jury system, as persons desirous of opening up the flood gates of vice and immorality, by which he apprehended the country was to be overwhelmed. Let us, said Mr. Nave, look for a moment at the facts of the case now presented before us, which are derivable from our experience. Let us see if the Grand Jury system is essential to the administration of justice, and the suppression of vice. Let us ask ourselves if it has heretofore had this salutary effect upon the people of Indiana. How are we to come to this conclusion?

There is, I will venture to say, no individual in favor of abolishing the Grand Jury system who does not act from the best of motives, who does not desire as anxiously as any gentleman on this floor can do, that vice, immorality, and crime, may be punished; and it cannot be denied that, to a great extent, crimes at present go unpunished. I think I can prove the truth of this assertion by the testimony of every gentleman who is in the practice of law in Indiana, that not more than one out of every two that are indicted are convicted.

Let us examine this matter in a different point of view. All those offences that are capital, or that amount to felonies, are cognizable in the first instance before a justice of the peace, and it is this which has produced the confusion and difficulty, and which has occasioned the Grand Jury system to receive from the people of Indiana condemnation instead of approbation. It is trivial breaches of the peace, alone, that Justices of the Peace ought ever to have jurisdiction of. There is no case, unless it be committed at the time of the sitting of the Grand Jury, which has not gone before a Justice of the Peace for preliminary inquiry, and afterwards it is submitted to the Grand Jury for inspection or investigation. Then we discover that under the present Grand Jury system while the blessings contemplated by the gentleman from Wayne have not been enjoyed by the people of Indiana, they have been taxed heavily to keep up the system without any commensurate result in the punishment of crime. The object of every penal code of laws should be to make the punishment of crime certain, for by making it certain you deter men from committing crime; but under the present Grand Jury system, it is uncertain, therefore, men are not deterred from the commission of crime. It becomes important, therefore, that we should ascertain whether a better system may not be devised, so that when crime is committed it may be punished, and speedily punished, whereby offenders against the law, and those who feel disposed to offend, may be deterred from the commission of crime.

As the law anciently stood in England, Trustees of Assizes and Justices of the Peace had jurisdiction of every offence committed, including treason. But in the reign of Henry VIII, at the instance of Cardinal Woolsey, this law was repealed, for the purpose of enabling the administrators of the law to bring innocent men to the scaffold for high treason, when they had committed a mere breach of the peace.

When you trace this system, continued Mr. NAVE, as it has existed, and as it now exists, you will find that the more uninformed and unenlightened the people, the more has it been revered. It has always been used as an instrument of cruelty and oppression. And when you trace its workings in this Republic, you will find it a machine, by means of which the worst portion of mankind are enabled to carry on their evil practices in security; for when brought before the Grand Jury, a great portion of what is disclosed in the jury-room—where only the eye which beholdeth all things sees them—becomes known, and the culprit is acquitted on his final trial by the traverse jury.

I ask, then, if it is not the policy of a free people to introduce public examinations? Let a man be accused publicly, and let him confront the witnesses against him face to face. What objection can there be to this? If a man commits a felony, let the witnesses be examined in the presence of the accused; let their testimony be taken down, both for the accused and against him. I ask, then, what is the object of a Grand Jury? It is clearly contrary to the spirit of our republican Government.

Is it absolutely necessary, sir, that, in order to prove the crime and commit the criminal, the testimony in the case should be brought before the Grand Jury, and considered by them in secret? Would not an open court of justice effect the same object in less time, and with greater certainty, without the action of a Grand Jury in the premises? Suppose that A steals a horse, and B is acquainted with the fact, and C is the owner of the horse that A stole. C then goes before a Justice of the Peace and swears to the ownership of the horse, and B testifies to the theft. Is not this sufficient to justify the Prosecuting Attorney in drafting an indictment against A? Would the case be any stronger if it were brought before a Grand Jury? Upon what principle, then, can gentlemen insist on continuing the system of Grand Juries?

An objection may be advanced to the total abolition of Grand Juries, that an individual who commits a crime and flees the county, cannot be brought to justice. Let us look at the question for a moment. If an individual commits a crime, and leaves the county wherein it was committed, then a Justice of the Peace can constitute a Court of Inquiry, call all the witnesses who are cognizant of the crime before him, and take down their evidence. A copy of the evidence can then be filed in the office of the County Clerk, and the Prosecuting Attorney can cause a writ to be issued for the capture of the fugitive criminal. If he has fled to a neighboring State, a requisition from the Governor of this State upon the Governor of the State to which he has fled will insure his capture, and then the punishment can be meted out to him that the crime deserves.

I reiterate, sir, my former assertion, that I am in favor of the entire abolition of the Grand Jury system; for I consider that it has been an instrument in the hands of bad and designing men to set aside the claims of justice; and I insist that the system of public examinations is better calculated to suppress vice and punish crime.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) by making it a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of abolishing the Grand Jury System.

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wells, to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Grand Jury System, by making it an inquiry as to the expediency of changing that system.

Mr. BASCOM said, he would accept the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland as a substitute for the one he had offered.

Mr. KELSO. I wish, sir, to say a few words in regard to this subject. I do not see how gentlemen can be serious in proposing to abolish the Grand Jury System unless they offer something in its place that will fully accomplish the object for which that system was instituted. The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) has suggested a plan in lieu of it, which, with all due deference to his learning and abilities, I consider the most abominable thing I ever heard in my life—and he is the only one who has attempted to suggest anything to take the place of it. It certainly cannot be expected that men will be put on trial without having a charge of some kind preferred against them.

The gentleman from Hendricks is of opinion that a justice of the peace can be substituted in the place of the Grand Jury to perform its duties. Now, sir, if this proposition had come from any other source I should have thought it was offered in jest. Talk about the expense of the present system! why, if justices of the peace are to be invested with this power they will not only make a good living but get rich at it. Does the gentleman from Hendricks suppose that they will discharge this duty without fee or reward? You could not get the most stupid individual in the community to accept of that office and perform its duties without receiving a remuneration for his labors. You have in this county, I believe, ten townships, and the lowest number of justices allowed to each township is two. This will make twenty for the county. This township has at least four and thus you have twenty-four justices in the county of Marion. Invest these justices with the powers of the Grand Jury and you will have twenty-four Grand Juries instead of one; and you would have them continually in session instead of occasionally, thus greatly augmenting the expense of the system. What benefit, sir, would accrue from the adoption of such a course? A justice of the peace has to hear the cause of a man who may be brought before him on some charge of misdemeanor—and then recognize the man before he can be indicted. It is then made the duty of the Prosecuting Attorney to draft a bill of indictment; that bill is then filed and the court issues a writ for the arrest of the criminal. But, sir, the evidence must be there, the witnesses in the case must be subpoenaed before an indictment can be had. Why may not the Grand Jury pursue this course and ransom the county for witnesses instead of having twenty justices of the peace sending out their officers with pockets crammed full of subpoenas to call men before them for the same purpose?

But the grand objection made to this tribunal is its secrecy. How, I ask, will the adoption of the plan that has been offered be an improvement so far as this point is concerned? I have no objection to let the subject go to a committee for the purpose of inquiring into its expediency, and if the committee after due investigation, believe that an improvement can be made by making these examinations public instead of private, let them bring in a recommendation to that effect, and we can decide as to whether it shall be adopted. Let us for a moment look at this proposed change. Suppose you make these examinations public, and even go further and receive testimony on both sides of the case—what is that short of a trial of the man? You have the man brought before the Grand Jury. If evidence is to be heard against him, will it not be right to give the accused the benefit of counsel—the Constitution of the United States awards to him that protection, and they are to appoint him counsel, if he be too poor to employ counsel. Will not this be trying the man? Why not give the Grand Jury at this stage of the trial, the right to decide upon the punishment of the offender? That would shorten the proceedings, and save the State considerable expense. If gentlemen wish to make the Grand Jury a trial jury, and to try men without the aid of courts, why, then, let them abolish the courts, and retain the Grand Jury.

I will not pretend to say, sir, that a change may not be made in this system, from which good may result. I am desirous that an investigation shall be made into the subject and that the committee shall report upon it, and then we shall be better prepared to act. I trust that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CARTER. This resolution, sir, as it now stands without any amendment, imperatively requires that the proposition embraced in it shall be referred to the committee on the organization of courts, and that the committee shall report favorable to the total abolition of the Grand Jury system.

Now there is a committee appointed, having for its proper object, all matters pertaining to criminal law, and I am of opinion that to this committee this subject should be referred.

If I understand the object of Grand Juries they have been constituted as much for the benefit of the criminal, as the security of the people, against the perpetration of crime, and, although the Grand Jury has a connection with the court, that connection does not render it either solely an appendage to, or subordinate to the court.

It is true the court fills the vacancies occurring in the Grand Jury, &c., and instructs them in the law and the proper spheres of its duties, but in many other respects it is viewed as an independent body, sitting on its own adjournments, and receiving its own business, and as much as it may deem proper, so that I conceive that the whole matter more properly belongs to the committee on criminal law. And, indeed, one of the designs of organizing this committee was in reference to this very subject.

But, sir, as I am called to vote on this resolution, and its being of an imperative character, I must say that I am opposed to it, and upon reasons different from those advanced by gentlemen who concur with me in opposition to the resolution.

I am aware that the Grand Jury is a secret and ex parte tribunal, and that its origin is English, and comes from an age of despotism; but it is equally true that but two governments in the world know anything of Grand Juries, and they, too, are the most free and independent governments on earth. I refer to England and the United States. It is true, we long since separated ourselves from, and dissolved all connection with the British Crown; but it is equally true, that there are many valuable laws and institutions which we have derived from the mother country—a fact which we are compelled to acknowledge, however much we may oppose and condemn the general system of English Government.

I do not base any argument in favor of Grand Juries on the fact of the antiquity of the system. I am not one of those who constantly dread the innovations of the present on the workings of the past—who would rather, bear the burthens of ancient wrongs, simply because they are ancient, than boldly assail their incorrectness; but I do say that I am unwilling boldly to throw aside the accumulated wisdom of ages, the precepts of our National Constitution—a work without blemish, and the pride of every freeman—the opinions of the fathers of the Constitution of 1816, and the corroborating testimony of at least twenty other American Constitutions, for an experiment untried and new, and so far undefined.

The imperfections of the Grand Jury system I have seen, and I wish to see the remedy applied.

It is an expensive system, its annual cost being to the State about one hundred thousand dollars each year; and this is an argument against it, and I am willing to admit that this defect should be remedied right speedily, if possible, not, however, by opening a flood-gate to crime; for dollars and cents weigh but lightly in the balance against public security, the dignity, and violated laws of the State.

The secret of opposition to the Grand Jury is not owing to any material defect in itself, but in the abuse which is made of it, and the defects arising out of our statutory laws. To that tribunal now is sent the most trifling and insignificant violations against our penal code. Crime of a high order is comparatively unknown in our State to what it exists in older communities. Now, in a county of ordinary dimensions, it is natural to suppose, instances of the perpetration of minor crimes will be numerous. By our laws, it is the duty of the Grand Jury to inquire into these. The result is, that some man or set of men, feeling that the salvation of the community rests on their shoulders, are very officious in bringing offenders before the Court; witnesses are subpoenaed without number, the jury sits some six or twelve days, finds a number of indictments against men for retailing, gambling, or an occasional fisticuff, and at the end of six months the prosecuting witnesses are called to testify in court again, and generally receive no pay, besides losing much time. Now, the offenses on which they have been called to testify are of such a character as do not particularly outrage the feelings of community as a robbery or a higher crime, and the consequence is, that witnesses feel a grievance at the hardship the law places them under in losing time without an equivalent. Or the man is prosecuted by an enemy, then the accused and his friends, having their feelings aroused, abuse the system which permits malice to be the incentive to prosecution. But such is not the case in crimes of a higher order, such as startle and alarm the community; and I venture that no gentleman on this floor can say when any community ever felt aggrieved at a Grand Jury finding a bill against a horse thief, unless, indeed, it be the rascal himself; and you know,

"The thief who felt the halter draw Ne'er had a good opinion of the law."

And, sir, another reason why I imagine the Grand Jury has become to a certain degree unpopular is the present mode of the election of Prosecuting Attorneys. The office is a most responsible one; but by the present law the compensation is so small, and so arranged, that able men will not accept the post. The result is that either the youngest or weakest member of the bar is selected. His office becomes to him his means of livelihood, and the law fixing his compensation holds out to him a continual bribe, in the shape of contingent fees, allowing him payment in case of successful prosecution only. He prosecutes for dollars and cents, and the law makes him do it, too, and not for the dignity and character of the State. Every inducement is held out to him to become a common informer, and with a zeal to prosecute the criminal for hire and pay; and in too many cases he is not qualified to give wholesome counsel to the jury. Is there much wonder that the system should get into disrepute? Then a simple modification of the present system will accomplish all that is desired. Say that the Grand Jury shall sit in cases of felony alone, or, in other words, bring it back to its original position, and let the petty offences go to the townships and neighborhoods in which they occur, to be punished by Justices of the Peace, and let the Grand Jury be divested of such offences, and the whole object will be accomplished. The expense will be curtailed. Each community will punish its own petty offenders and violators of the law, and more good will be done than by carrying into effect the plan embodied in the resolution before us.

And I inquire again what this resolution proposes? Does it give us any other system in detail, of the correctness of which we can form an opinion? It gives us no such information, and we are compelled to judge solely by the arguments of gentlemen in its defence, that those public examinations will be before Justices of the Peace. Suppose that we adopt the plan, in all prosecutions of an aggravated character. I ask, will one man called a Justice of the Peace, under a bond of a few hundred dollars, for the faithful performance of his duties, be more honest or reliable than sixteen free holders chosen from among the most intelligent citizens, and bound by oath to perform these duties without fear or malice, and having no extraneous influences working upon them? He may be as honest, but can he be as reliable? I am unwilling to wholly adopt this system, and thus place the life and liberty of the citizens in the hands of one man, rather than sixteen high-minded and intelligent men, under the able advice of the bench, and under a solemn oath, too, taken before a high tribunal, and in the presence of high Heaven, that they will present no man through malice or withhold from presenting him through fear, favor, or affection. The many is the safer depository of power, than the one individual, and above all when the dungeon and the scaffold are the impending penalties.

Then, sir, I oppose the resolution, and favor a modification of the system, from a belief that it is right and an obligation imposed on me by those who sent me here; and whenever that modification is proposed I will vote for it. I will do more. Propose a plan in which I can have an assurance that it will be safe, and better than the system now in use, and I will vote for it. But I can see no change for the better in the resolution now under discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a view of this question that has not yet been taken that strikes my mind as an improvement upon any that gentlemen have seen fit to present. I think that the various arguments that have been introduced here in defence of, and in opposition to, the present Grand Jury system plainly show that this subject is more appropriately a subject for legislation than of constitutional reform. At the proper time I propose to offer a resolution providing for the reference of this subject to the Legislature, as a substitute for the resolution now before the Convention. I think it comes more appropriately under the cognizance of the Legislative Department of Government than it does under the revision of this Convention.

There are many arguments advanced against the present Grand Jury system which I am inclined to think would justify considerable modification in the system. Recently there have been certain acts passed by the Legislature, however, which are in operation in some twenty or thirty counties in this State, that have greatly ameliorated the evils resulting from this system. By the Constitution of the United States, no person shall be held to answer for capital or otherwise infamous crimes, except upon the presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury. The Constitution of the State of Indiana provides that no person can be held to answer to any criminal charge in this State except upon presentment, indictment, or impeachment, and the words indictment and impeachment have a technical signification and must be interpreted by reference to the common law. Under this provision of the Constitution of Indiana, by acts of the Legislature it was thought that criminals could not be brought to trial except upon indictment or presentment. This has prevented to a great extent, any efforts being made to remedy the evils of the Grand Jury system. One of these evils was the entailment upon the State of a vast expenditure of money for the support of these Grand Juries in punishing petit offences. Another evil is to be found in the great hardships inflicted upon those citizens who are compelled to leave their families and their ordinary avocations of business to appear as witnesses against men guilty of the most trivial offences.

It should be observed, however, that during the last three or four years, a more enlightened view had been taken of the subject. In twenty or thirty counties of the State a very important reform has taken place. The justices of the peace in those counties, by special enactment of the Legislature, have been exercising exclusive jurisdiction in all cases where the offences committed were of a trivial character, and the Grand Jury can only take cognizance of the higher misdemeanors, and those offences that are punishable by confinement in the Penitentiary, or capital crimes.

It appears to me, sir, that the object of the people of the State of Indiana, in calling together this Convention, was to organize a basis, upon which the necessary legislation of the government could be built, and certainly with all deference to the opinions of able men around me, this is a subject strictly legislative in its character, and one with which the Convention has nothing to do. The subject of the punishment of crime, in no wise comes under our supervision. The present evils of the Grand Jury system of which the people are so justly complaining, results from the clause in regard to the indictment of criminals, to which I have already alluded, which was inserted in the Constitution of 1816. As that clause providing for the indictment, presentment, and impeachment of criminals, necessarily implies the organization of the Grand Jury, and consequently no reform until recently has been attempted to be made in that system. Instead, therefore, of making this a matter for constitutional reform, it should be left to the action of the Legislature. All that the Convention can do, is in the formation of the new Constitution, and leave out entirely any provision for the continuance of the system of Grand Juries. The subject will be then entirely under the control of the legislative department of government to which it appropriately belongs.

Mr. BORDEN said, that there was a motion to refer this subject to the committee on the organization of courts of justice, and he understood that there was also a proposition, or, perhaps, only an intimation from some gentleman that it should go to the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law. He had not risen for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the merits of the Grand Jury system, but to suggest that the whole subject should be referred to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the state. If he was not greatly mistaken, the right and privilege of being presented for trial only by his peers, was considered and treated, not only in our own constitution, but in the constitution of the other states of the Union, as among the natural rights of the citizen and inhabitant. The bill of rights of our own state, which secured this inestimable privilege, sections five and twelve, had already been referred, with the remainder of the first article, to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this state; and he thought that the resolution now under consideration, whether mandatory in character, or passed only as a matter of inquiry, should also take the same direction. It appeared to him that they were getting into some confusion in sending the same subject matter to different committees; he, however, would make no motion, but rose only to make this suggestion to those who seemed to have charge of this matter, and who were participating in the debate.

Mr. PETTIT said, he should ask the indulgence of the Convention, after a few words, to entertain a motion to adjourn. He certainly had not intended to allow this resolution to go over without speaking upon it himself. He supposed it might be that there were other gentlemen who desired to speak; and if there was, he would be most willing to listen; but if no other gentleman desired to speak, inasmuch as it was now nearly four o'clock, and the length of time which he expected to occupy would extend beyond the usual hour of adjournment, he would now move.

Mr. BIDDLE interposing, said he did not wish to speak upon the resolution. The question, he believed, was upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) which was to change the proposition from a resolution of instruction to a resolution of inquiry. If the amendment were to pass it would end the discussion, but if it should not pass, he should like to have an opportunity to be heard. He wished to see a full and free discussion of the subject, but that could not be obtained, at present, if the resolution were referred as a matter of inquiry.

Mr. PETTIT said, he should insist upon instruction—the positive resolution. If no gentleman desired to speak, he would now make his motion, that the Convention adjourn.

And thereupon the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. Hull.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of Mr. PET-

TIT'S resolution instructing the committee on the organization of courts of justice, to report a proposition for the abolition of the Grand Jury system—the question being upon Mr. BASCOM's amendment, changing the character of the proposition so as to make it a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PETTIT rose and said: Mr. PRESIDENT: I come to the consideration of this question with the full conviction, in my own mind, of its propriety. Of the correctness of the position which I occupy—that the resolution ought to be adopted—I have no doubt at all; and I trust much to this conviction—this strong persuasion in my own mind—to carry me safely through the labor before me. And I would devoutly pray that the spirit of persuasion may so rest upon my lips and guide my tongue, that others may be impressed as I am. For I protest that in this, as in every other action here, I am guided only by that spirit so eloquently prayed for by the reverend gentleman [Rev. Mr. Hull] who has just addressed the Throne of Grace before us; and an earnest wish that we may do nothing here but what shall redound to the glory of God, and the advantage of the people of the State of Indiana. I am guided by no other desire, or feeling, or motive, than this.

Mr. President, the question before the Convention, for consideration to-day, is the adoption of a resolution directing the committee on the organization of the courts of justice, to bring in a constitutional provision abolishing our present Grand Jury system, and substituting public examination of criminals in its stead.

I know that people are wont to approach long established customs, for the purpose of abolishing them, with timidity and doubt; and it is perhaps well that we should so approach them; but it bespeaks the coward to hesitate faithfully, and boldly, and readily, to apply the pruning knife to all the decayed and worthless branches of the political system. Nor should we distrust our own capacity in such a course as this, any sooner than we would distrust our integrity. We are certainly as competent now to change, modify, and re-arrange our political system, as were those people in barbarous ages, before the dawn of civilization had fairly swept the mists of moral darkness from the mental vision of the inhabitants of Great Britain.

These remarks, Mr. President, are merely preliminary—they do not touch the question. They are only made with reference to the temerity evinced by some gentlemen in alledging that we ought to be careful about touching any measure which comes down to us with a hoary head, and sanctioned by time. If it were a mere question of time, sir,—if we were bound to maintain this system merely because it has existed for so long a time that, to the contrary thereof the memory of man runneth not, then there are other measures which we would have to adopt for the same cause. While the advocate of the Grand Jury system can look back for a thousand years, and say it has existed throughout that period, in one form or another, in the hands of our ancestors, I can say to that same advocate, that, for twenty-five hundred years back we can see the gems glittering in the British crown; and if this is any good reason for sustaining the one, why not adopt the other? I thank the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden)—I will not say "I thank thee Jew for that word," but I do thank the gentleman—for his admission, that, in the first organization of the Grand Jury system, it was designed as a prop and support to the crown of Great Britain. No more certain and truthful history could be given of the origin of this system. Its design was to operate as a secret spy for the King, which he should have and maintain in every part of his dominion—consisting always of a body of wealthy land-holders well affianced to the crown—that they should meet in secret conclave for the purpose of bringing in witnesses, and informing upon all who were suspected of infidelity to the crown of Great Britain. I repeat, that this system was created as a prop to the crown of Great Britain—without which it could not possibly have stood so long. And now, in the classic language of the gentleman from Wayne, since "we have turned this crown bottom side upward," why should we continue to maintain this, its most efficient prop? You have hurled the crown into nothingness, why then maintain the very instrument by which, more than by any other means, the authority of the crown was so long maintained? It is a solecism without a parallel in the history of argument, reason, or debate.

Well, sir, my sole object in introducing this resolution is, to establish for the people of Indiana such a system of criminal jurisprudence and practice, as shall certainly punish the guilty and as certainly shield the innocent from blight and mildew. If this Grand Jury system is best calculated to produce these two objects and ends, if the Grand Jury be best calculated to insure the conviction, the certain conviction, of the guilty, and secure to the innocent portion of our citizens all the enjoyments and immunities of freedom and free government, without spot or taint, then I am for it. But if there be another system that shall bring the punishment of crime to the guilty as rapidly and certainly as the thunder follows the lightning's flash, and that will as certainly shield the innocent, then for that system am I. And, though the other system may have gray hairs, and the hoary head of the dotard, it shall have no reverence from me.

Well, sir, how then stands this matter? In the way of preliminaries, I have made, perhaps, remarks enough. The origin of Grand Juries was as has been named. The first authentic traces of the system are to be found in Great Britain, for, let me say distinctly, that Grand Juries never existed in any other country than Great Britain and the United States. It is an appendage of the common law, but I will not deviate from my track for the purpose of passing an eulogy upon that ancient system of law, which, like every other thing beautiful and useful, has its spots and its defects, which we ought either to hide or remove. This system had its origin in Great Britain, whence we have derived it. It would be in vain to think of finding anything like it in the institutes of the twelve judges, or in the legal remains of Rome, of Greece, or of Sparta. If we search all these, we shall find nothing that runs a parallel with this institution. It had its origin in Great Britain more than a thousand years ago. It is first found under the reign of king Ethelred, in the early part of the ninth century—a little earlier in that century than we are now in the nineteenth century—and it has existed in that realm ever since. I grant that it has had different forms in different ages, such as different modes of summoning, and different grades of power, but in one form or other it has existed in that country for ten hundred years past. But still it is “the self-same old jack-knife,” no more nor no less. If the Convention will indulge me, I will relate the anecdote of the boy’s jack-knife. Said one boy to his fellow, “There is my jack-knife, which was owned by my grandfather, and handed down to me.” “Well, but,” says the other, “has it never had a new handle?” “Of course,” replied the owner of the knife, “it has had four new handles and six new blades, but it is the same jack-knife yet.” And this Grand Jury system is the same system yet. It is the same secret spy, the same inquisition, inefficient to punish the guilty or protect the innocent.

Its original design was, that it should stand as a prop to the British crown. But have we any crown which needs to be propped up? The metamorphosis presented yesterday by the gentleman from Wayne, I am utterly unable to master. It is utterly out of my power to ascertain the parallel which he would seem to draw between the fact that we have turned the British crown bottom side up, and the necessity of the existence of this system as a part of our free institutions. Our government has no secret enemies, while the other government has them. While the crown of Great Britain has had frequent occasion to punish those suspected of infidelity, we neither have nor can have any such occasion. I think it the wiser policy for the State of Indiana to show to the world, by the abolition of this system, that her citizens are incapable of committing a crime that needs to be examined in secret. Thus it would appear that our citizens are not over anxious to clog the Jeffersonville Penitentiary with convicts, either guilty or suspected of crime.

Sir, in the proportion that you have convicted felons in the penitentiary, in the same proportion is our whole population disgraced. How would you feel, sir, away from home, suppose you were in New York or Philadelphia, and were to hear a comparison instituted between the number of convicted felons and the number of the inhabitants of each state in the Union, and it should turn out that Indiana had a greater proportion of convicts than any other; I say how would you feel as a citizen of the State of Indiana, upon being caught abroad under such circumstances? I admit that, at home, you should be very desirous of punishing criminals; but out of the State, if such a comparison would show that Indiana has more felons in the penitentiary, in proportion to her population, than any other state, (having sent her people to the penitentiary, whether guilty or not, it would be set down that they were really guilty,) the fact would affect you. I say to you, whatever might be your position, fellow-delegate, you would feel that you were greatly bored; you would take the suggestion as an unkind cut, and feel it sensibly, so that your State pride would not run so high as you would be glad to have it. I make this appeal to show that it is more desirable for the State, that she should save from punishment those who are not guilty, than that she should actually punish to the fullest extent every guilty man; and that maxim of the law comes in here, which says, “It is better that ninety-nine guilty persons should go unpunished, than that one innocent man should suffer.” This is a maxim of the common law, and which has long been very generally approved by civilized man.

Well, sir, with reference to the mode of prosecution, by Grand Juries. The proceedings here are all ex parte, and let us inquire for a moment, how far this mode of proceeding can favor the elicitation of truth? Let us suppose a Grand Jury to be empaneled; it must consist of over twelve men, and under twenty-four men. They come into the court, and although the young gentleman in my eye says they were entirely independent of the court, I shall not take the trouble to contradict him expressly; but old practitioners know better. They know that Grand Juries are subordinate to the court. They cannot adjourn finally without the permission of the court, although they may have the gracious privilege of adjourning an hour before the court, or an hour afterwards; they are not servilely compelled to hold on to the garments of the court all day. But, as I was saying, the Grand Jury come in, and they are seated by the court, and the judge turns round a little to the left and charges them. You have all heard many a charge to a Grand Jury. I have heard very creditable stump speeches made in this way. I have heard the system extolled by those who approve of it, on such an occasion, by hoary headed dotards upon the bench. [A voice —“who does he refer to?”] He will know who I mean when he sees this. But now what is the charge of the judge. I will give you an example. I will epitomise a common charge to a Grand Jury: “Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, you are called here for a very important purpose. You are to go into your room secretly, gentlemen, for the purpose of receiving and giving information whether there has been any crime, high or low, large or small, committed in your county." This is the first charge. The judge then says: "You will consider the dignity and importance of your station, and to aid you in the prosecution of your work, you will send in to the clerk a slip of paper containing the names of such witnesses as you may be advised will be able to develop crime, and give the best information of criminals, and you may be assured, gentleman, that these witnesses will be brought in privately by a special bailiff, appointed for the purpose." This is another charge, which rendered into plain English is this: You will send out for the names of men to bear witness secretly against their fellow-citizens, and hear one side only; and refuse to allow of any kind of cross-examination, or the introduction of any exculpatory evidence whatever. This is the charge, and the judge proceeds: You very well know, gentlemen, that you are to keep all your proceedings, all the sayings of witnesses, and all that may be said by the counsellor for the State, a most profound secret. Let all this be forever buried in your bosom of bosoms, which is only to be unlocked in eternity. Such, sir, is the sum of the instructions of the judge to the Grand Jury. And now, I ask, if this savors anything, either of the spirit of republicanism, or of common justice. I protest now, and here, against the whole system. There is neither fairness nor honesty about it. No sir, let me have a system which admits foe to foe, complainant and complained of, and witnesses, face to face.

Sir, is there any reason for continuing this system; is there any justice in it; is there any necessity for it? None whatever, that I can find. With all due deference to the gentleman from Wayne, to whose arguments I listened with all attention, I would suggest that we came here to repair a dilapidated system, and to consult together, and to act like men of discretion. We came not here for the purpose of seeking any advantage for any particular institution, or of desiring any provision in the Constitution that our judgment does not approve, having had full opportunity for discussion and reflection.

Sir, the whole Convention will bear me out in saying that in this matter I have not been precipitate. I first gave notice that I would introduce a positive resolution on this subject. I did introduce such a resolution. It lay over a day, and I then moved to make it the special order for that day week. That day came and it was again put off; and now that it is before the Convention, regarding it, as I do, as a question of the utmost importance, I hope the Convention will duly deliberate upon it. Let us have no catch-penny work; but all know when questions of importance are to be discussed, and let all take part in those discussions who may desire it.

Well, sir, have not Grand Juries their weaknesses—their errors—like all other men? All experience tells us that they have. Sir, I have undertaken to say—and I know that I shall be borne out by all the members of the bar, by the clerks of the circuit courts, from whencesoever they may come, and by many others whose testimony is of equal weight—that in cases of felony, where the incipient steps have been taken before a Grand Jury, not one in twenty ever result in conviction. Now, sir, I repeat it. Here is this boasted institution for which so much perfection is claimed; and it is provable beyond question, that of the number of indictments for felony in which the incipient step is taken before a Grand Jury, and no previous arrest or examination has taken place, not one out of twenty result in a conviction. And so it will ever be. A reflecting man will ask himself the question: "Why is this so?" Why, sir, it is just as plain as that misfortune follows error and falsehood; it is just as certain as that good follows truth, that wretchedness follows vice, or happiness, virtue. This arises from the very organization of Grand Juries. When they undertake an examination of a case, we all know that that examination is merely ex parte. They hear but one side of the evidence, with, perhaps, all the coloring of the State witnesses, to which, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the bitterness of the heart is put forth with all the venom of the serpent's tongue. There is no cross examination; no contradicting of witnesses; all—all is one-sided, ex parte, unfair; and hence a Grand Jury, however pure their motives may be, however excellent men of themselves, cannot, in the very nature of the system, arrive at the truth. If they should happen to do so, it is more by accident than as a consequence of the system. I repeat and insist, that by the very constitution of the Grand Jury system, it is not once in twenty times that they arrive at the truth at all. They may find honestly and purely; they may act with the utmost purity of motive—nor would I have it thought for a moment that I would impugn the motives of any of them. As a general practice, they are selected from the best men of the county; they are generally men of some standing, and who are supposed to combine among themselves both education and intelligence. But, sir, I care not for all that. No, sir. The fault is not with the jurors, but with the system. You may take the angels of Heaven, and lock them up in a Grand Jury room, and with the evidence of devils before them, it will be impossible for them to do right.

A MEMBER (in his seat). That's a pretty strong figure.

MR. PETTIT. Not a whit too strong. That is precisely the character of the Grand Jury. It is our duty to protect the character of the people as well as to protect their persons and their property. No one will doubt that it is of as much importance that we should establish such institutions as will preserve the character and reputation of our people unspotted, unblemished, untarnished—that we should establish such institutions as shall prevent the indelible spot from being placed upon the escutcheon of an innocent man—as that we should make acceptable provision for the protection of his property and person. The one is not more nor less our duty than the other. Well, sir, then upon the point I have taken, that out of twenty indictments for felony which originate before a Grand Jury, not more than one results in a conviction—upon that point, I say, I defy contradiction. I know, indeed, that it is not improbable, that when some gentleman comes to answer me, he will probably advert to all the little indictments for whiskey selling, betting, &c. That is not my point. I refer to indictments for felonies only; and if the position I have taken be true, what is the consequence? Why, that nineteen out of every twenty of the population thus indicted are subjected to a most material injury. Tell me not, gentlemen of the Convention, that he who, being innocent, is yet indicted for larceny, or perjury, or forgery, or arson, is not injured in his reputation in consequence, even when a traverse jury have set him free. Tell me not that the foul breath of suspicion is thus easily exhaled—the foul stain thus easily wiped away. It is not so. There is scarcely a gentleman on this floor who cannot point to some victim of this secret inquisition in his own county, upon whom the pestilential and blighting hand of this Grand Jury system has not been laid without cause, without justice, without reason of any kind whatever.

I have no complaints to make against this Grand Jury system, for any personal inconvenience I have ever suffered by it—none whatever. My opposition to the system is generated in feelings of a higher purpose. I come not here opposing this system, with the view of redressing any wrong of my own, but to aid in laying the foundation of a system for the administration of justice, both civil and criminal, in this State, that shall operate equally upon all, and produce the great end for which all such systems ought to be framed. Some men will say, that it does no harm to present a man before a Grand Jury of sixteen men, and have him indicted, and then to put him on his trial before a traverse jury, six months or a year afterwards. Is there no harm in all this? Grant that a man can give bail, and is not confined in jail during the interval between indictment and trial—an interval which often extends over a period of twelve months—the thing is still hanging over him. He is finally brought to trial, and then, after a labored prosecution, the traverse jury says, he is not guilty. Every one who hears the trial admits that there is neither truth nor color in the charge; and why is it then, that by our institutions we should thus call upon an innocent man, not only to sacrifice time and money, but character, and everything dear to him, to a secret inquisition like this. You say that he is not injured. I contend that he is injured; and that most materially. The Grand Jury who sat in secret, and heard the evidence against him, and found that there was evidence enough to indict him, will ever afterwards have the impression of his guilt upon their minds. They are not present a year afterwards when he is tried; they have not heard the plain and evident statement of the man's innocence before the traverse jury; and they, together with their bailiff, go off, and forever after believe the man to be guilty.

Let me say here, Mr. President, that I have been a practicing counsel in our State for twenty years, and have had no little to do with the defence of criminals, as well as with prosecutions. I never, indeed, was before a Grand Jury except in the capacity of representative of the United States, in this State; but in that capacity I have had sufficient means of becoming acquainted with the transactions of Grand Juries. I have not been an unobserving member of society on this subject, and you may depend upon it, gentlemen, that that Grand Jury will go away with the impression that the man was guilty. They will say, "Now that fellow has got off; but I know very well he is guilty, for I heard all the evidence; I would not trust him any more at all." Another will reply, "Then how came it that he was acquitted by the traverse jury, where he had an opportunity of meeting his enemy, and being before his accuser face to face?" To which it is again answered, "Oh, the witnesses, perhaps, were not all there; if they had been, you would have seen a different state of the case." Again, it may be said, and the gentleman from Wayne knows it very well, that the defendant had the ablest lawyer; that he escaped through the trickery of his attorney, and the ignorance of the prosecuting attorney. That is the whole amount of it; and you never can erase the impression of his guilt from their minds.

And thus it is not only with the Grand Jury themselves, but with the man's neighbors and acquaintances. By holding up to their gaze the finding of the traverse jury and the instructions of the court, you never can efface either from the minds of the grand jurors themselves or that of the public the suspicion of the man's guilt. You never can eradicate it. It goes with him wherever he goes, and follows him like a stalking pestilence. That is not all. Let a little trouble arise politically, or in the church, if you please—and I have known some instances of this sort—no matter how good his character may be, or how virtuous and religious he really is, you will hear it tauntingly said in his hearing, "I would not like to have been indicted for perjury or for larceny," and thus the unfortunate man who has been accused perhaps with no better foundation of his guilt than the mere malice of an enemy, is wounded in the most sensitive part—his honorable name—and feels that he would rather have parted with property and perhaps with life than have been subjected to such ignominy. I think there can be very little doubt that almost every gentleman here will be able to recollect one or more cases of that kind. Let it not be said that a man thus presented and indicted is not injured! Sir, he is injured? A stain has been cast upon his character; an injury has been inflicted upon him from which he can never escape, but which he must carry with him to his grave as certainly as the grave awaits him—as certainly as that that faithful grand juror will carry to his grave the secret of the evidence which fixed that stain upon his neighbor's fame. These, then, are some of the errors that arise under this system. I think that men under this system are more subject to be led astray, that they are more liable to be made the dupes of secret machinations and secret influences, than they would be in having an open investigation of the case before a public magistrate. It is, then, a system on which secret influence may operate, and it is one which may be led into the commission of error, however pure and excellent the motives of those who are called upon to act under it. It is a useless and an expensive system, and for the reasons which I have assigned, and those which I shall hereafter assign, I think it is one which ought to be dispensed with, and I shall therefore propose a substitute for it. I have spoken of the expensiveness of this system. Allow me to say, however, that I merely mentioned this incidentally; because if I could be satisfied that Grand Juries were necessary for the punishment of crime or the protection of innocence, I should regard the expense as nothing; I should care nothing about it; I would not even enter into the consideration of it. I would say, give me that institution which will secure the punishment of crime, and under which innocence will be safe, and I will not inquire at all into the expense. Any society whatever that deserves to live is capable of and willing to incur all the expense necessary to eradicate crime and to punish it, and to protect the innocent members of its body from unjust prosecutions and disgrace. As to the question of expense, then, I will not regard that, although, as has been said by the gentleman from Porter, it costs you more than all your judges of all your courts. Supreme Court Judges, and Circuit Court Judges, and your Probate Judges, and all others put together do not cost you as much money as holding these secret inquisitions, to say nothing in regard to the loss of character and reputation. Why not, then, have an open investigation! The one is a sure safeguard, acting in open day and before all the people; the other is a certain blight and mildew acting in secret. Is it at all strange then, Mr. PRESIDENT, that a secret inquisition held in each county should cost you more than all the other expenses of the administration of justice? No sir; it is not strange at all; for in all countries wherever secret inquisitions have been resorted to they have cost the governments more to maintain them than all the other departments in the administration of justice. Let me point you to the Inquisition of Spain. It cost the government of that country more money to maintain that unholy inquisition than it did to sustain all the other departments of the judicial authority.

It is not strange, sir, that this institution, in this particular, should resemble the secret inquisition in Spain; for like things have like tendencies.

It was my intention next, Mr. President, to proceed to the consideration of the argument involved in the question of the legal power of the people of this State to abandon this system, but I am informed that it is the intention of the opponents of this reform not to urge that point, but to concede that the people have the power. I am therefore saved a considerable degree of labor so far as that part of the question is concerned. I had made preparation to discuss the legal question, but I will not go into it now, as I understand that all our opponents on this subject have abandoned the idea of raising that objection, and admit the authority of the State to do as she pleases. The doctrine is laid down in 7th Peters' Reports.

I will mention here, in passing, that in February last I wrote an article for the "Sentinel" on the subject of Grand Juries. Shortly afterwards some sprightly young gentleman from Terre Haute came out, thinking he had found a mare's nest in the Constitution of the United States, [laughter,] by which he thought he had satisfactorily proved that there was a provision in the Constitution of the United States which would prevent us from laying a finger upon this Grand Jury system. Well, that young man was very precocious, certainly. I am unwilling to make any personal references, but I must say that I should not be at all surprised if, by next spring, the cows should take him for a cowslip and devour him as something very green. [Laughter.] Sir, the States never surrendered to the General Government the right of determining how they would punish offenders within their jurisdiction, and so the Supreme Court of the United States has said in plain terms. But as that proposition is to be abandoned, I will pass it over, and come to other questions connected with this subject.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this institution, so far as its secrecy is concerned, is anti-

American. Where, in what other department, for what other purpose, either for the protection of property or life, or the protection of character in any other situation—where is it necessary to hold a secret tribunal? I know it is said that the two Houses of Congress may sit with closed doors. But when do they do it? The House of Representatives never sit with closed doors. The Senate of the United States, when they desire to indulge in some debaucheries, or when they want to give some consequence to their secret meetings in ratifying a treaty with a foreign power, the whole of which is known beforehand, and which has been in every newspaper throughout the Union—the Senate of the United States, under these circumstances, must shut themselves up in secret for the consideration of that very secret subject which is known all over the world, [laughter,] and which has come before them for ratification. I assert now, as I have often asserted before, that the practice is useless—utterly useless, and ought to be done away with; that the fact of making treaties ought to be known, and the reasons publicly given why they should be adopted or rejected. There are a few Senators who have always been battling against this secret system of doing business, and some of them have even insisted that even the debates in regard to nominations and appointments should be public. Suppose, sir, that you or I should be nominated for an office there—a thing that did happen with me once, and I believe the nomination was unanimously confirmed—would we not rather that the doors were opened, and that we should have an opportunity of hearing what objections, if any, were urged against us? Most certainly we would. As a usual thing, when a citizen is nominated for an office, they close the doors; and this, I suppose, is done in order that they may have an ample opportunity to abuse him, or to investigate his character precisely as a Grand Jury would investigate a presentment—that is, considering only one side of the case. I have seen the workings of the system, and I know that it gives rise to many abuses. I will not stop here to pass any eulogies on the Tyler administration; but there was a Mr. Henshaw who was nominated for Secretary of the Navy under that administration. Secret information, and anonymous letters, were sent into the Senate, blackening his character. A vote was taken on the nomination, and the gentleman was rejected. Well, sir, to my certain knowledge, many of the Senators asked his pardon for the gross assaults which were made upon his character in executive session. Some of them, to my certain knowledge, have told him that they were deceived; that his character had been belied, and that had they known the truth, they would have voted otherwise. But where is the redress for the injury which that man sustained in his reputation and character? Sir, I am firmly convinced that that, as well as all other American tribunals in which character is to be tried, should be open to all; open as day; open to every man, if the love of liberty and of truth is to prevail in the country.

I wish to say to you, Mr. President, and through you to the Convention, that this is not a new subject—it is not now broached for the first time. Public opinion has been thoroughly awakened upon this subject, both in this country and in Europe; and I shall ask the indulgence of the Convention while I read, or ask the Secretary to read, several extracts from prominent journals, published in New Orleans and St. Louis, and from English newspapers. I am the more disposed to ask the attention of gentlemen to the reading of these short extracts, because our opponents ask us, "what do you propose to substitute in the place of Grand Juries?" By these extracts from English papers I wish to show the Convention that in Great Britain—the land of the birth of this infamous system of Grand Juries, for it is indigenous to English soil—the system has been abolished in London itself; and a suggestion will be found in these extracts as to the substitute which may be made for the Grand Jury.

Will the Secretary read the extracts which I hand him?

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.—We indulged a hope, that a bill doing away forever with Grand Juries and their absurdities, would, ere this, have been introduced to the Assembly. If any further demonstration were needed of the mischief they are capable of inflicting, than that furnished in the Espana case, where, according to Judge McCaleb, the very embodiment of respectability and wisdom presided, we think it can be found in the high English authority which, on the occasion in question, we considered it our duty to place before the public.

We challenge the advocates of the system to adduce a single good reason for the longer toleration of this institution, an obsolete fragment of a remote era; or to furnish on the score of expediency, a sensible plea for its continuance.

If no instance had ever occurred in this city calculated to attract public attention to the nefarious purposes to which Grand Juries may on occasion be applied; still, their secret character, irresponsibility, and anti-republican tendency, are well calculated to produce in the minds of reflecting men an anxious determination to do away with the whole system.

There is nothing so conducive to a healthful dispensation of the laws, as publicity; without it, judicial corruption or tyranny, and dishonesty in the jury box, might be practiced to any extent; while inhuman enactments repulsive to feeling, and disgraceful to legislation, might remain, to disfigure the statute book, for years. Every thing secret, every thing mysterious, should be eschewed in our courts; the accused should be confronted with his accusers, hear every tittle of evidence that may be adduced against him, so that, if innocent, he may establish it; if guilty, receive the punishment due to his offence. As it is, we trust that we shall not again have occasion to refer to legislative forgetfulness on this point; but hope to be able, at no very distant day, to chronicle the abolition of the system, or such a change in it as will do away with its secret and inquisitorial character; as well as take from the hands of judges the present power they possess, to pack it with favorites, whom they are anxious to serve, or solicitous to use.—N. O. Delta.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.—Popular opinion, however, has already assailed it, even in England, whilst in the United States, where, and in the British Empire alone, of all the world besides, this clandestine and iron institution prevails; very little has been said, and less thought of, about a matter that pervades every avenue of civil life. The very source from which it derives its origin in this country, would of itself have made it a subject of suspicion amongst us, were it not that the imitation faculty of our nature, and the backwardness to undertake heavy labor in reaching and remedying the foundations of great institutions, have operated, if not as efficiently with a republican people as with others, still so powerfully, as to leave us yet many, very many, vestiges of the abhorrent feudal tyranny of England; hence the Grand Jury system has flourished amongst us since the foundation of this government, in full vigor, producing such fruits as secrecy of inquisition, violation of the cardinal rule of civil right, in jeopardizing if not condemning a citizen unheard; encouraging conspiracy and personal enmity, and, most strange of all, demanding of a body of men upon oath, to render a verdict of guilt or innocence against a party without affording them the evidence upon which a conscientious finding could be made, thus encouraging the risk of the commission of an awful crime upon the part of jurors themselves.

The power of fiction over fact, however, has not prevailed of late so strongly in England, as in America, for we find that the Grand Jury system has stood in need of defence from the bench in the former country, against the influence of public opinion.

The following article and extracts are contained in the Worcester (England) Herald:

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.—The experiment of dispensing with the ceremony of a Grand Jury, in the administration of justice, is about to be made by means of an act now passing through its last stages in [the last] Parliament, which abolishes that tribunal in the metropolitan districts, including, of course, the Central Criminal Court.

We have called the Grand Jury a ceremony, because when it does no mischief it is so, and nothing more; but it may become, either accidentally or designedly, exceedingly mischievous. For example, it is a ceremony in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, where true bills are found, as in these the accused parties have been committed after a far more searching judicial investigation of the charge preferred against them, than ever takes place in the Grand Jury room. The intervention between the committing magistrate and the jury, who are to try the accused, of a tribunal, which simply inquires whether there be prima facie, that is, a probable ground of suspicion, against them, is at best, therefore, a useless ceremony; but we shall also prove conclusively, that it may be rendered a serious evil. Accidentally it may defeat justice, as where the witnesses against the accused fail, from some fortuitous circumstance, to attend before the Grand Jury; and, designedly, it may have the same effect, as where witnesses are kept out of the way on purpose. There are many other ways in which the noxious capabilities of this weed of our ancient judicial system may be brought into pestilential activity. Two bills cannot be found against any one for the same offence; and, therefore, an accomplice or friend may, in many cases, prefer a bill of indictment, before the Grand Jury, against an individual in order to prevent a party really aggrieved from obtaining justice. In such a case, no evidence is offered before the Petit Jury, and they return a verdict of not guilty. This mode of "cooking" Grand Jury bills, was formerly extensively practiced to extort money from keepers of gambling houses, and probably is so still.

The bill to abolish Grand Juries, above referred to, is founded upon abundant evidence of their plain evils.

Mr. Humphreys, a solicitor in extensive criminal practice, says:

"My objections to the Grand Jury system are, that it is injurious frequently to innocent parties; and that it is a protection very often to guilty parties; and that it assists the compromise of offences which have been investigated fully before the magistrates; for by means of its secret acting, there is no opportunity of knowing what takes place before it, and consequently the evidence which has been given before the magistrate may be increased, repressed, or diminished before the Grand Jury."

Mr. Mirehouse, the assistant Judge of the Central Criminal Court, has tried 25,000 cases, and he says:

"I do not know one single argument in favor of the Grand Jury system. I should be glad to hear any one put any question as to any point in favor of retaining them in the Central Criminal Court. I never heard one argument in favor of it, that has been conclusive in my mind."

The press is nearly unanimous in condemning Grand Juries. The Times, for example, says:

"The Grand Jury is a relic of another condition of society, of a method of administering justice now entirely reformed. Whatever was originally valuable in such a jurisdiction has passed into other hands, and is exercised in a manner far more conducive to the general advantage. The police magistrate, who conducts his inquiry with open doors; who confronts the witnesses with the accused; who admits the legal advisers of the supposed criminal to his court, and permits them to argue against the propriety of his committal, either on grounds of law or fact; and who, above all, must exercise his solemn and important functions without forgetting the reporters in his court, and the great body of the nation out of doors, whom they represent;—such an officer, we say, exercising his jurisdiction in such a manner, offers far more valuable guaranties to the public than any mystical tribunal such as the Grand Jury, whose proceedings are the very reverse of what we have just described. The natural results follow from the existence of such an abnormal jurisdiction in the modern system of administering criminal justice. It is determined to extort money from persons moving in a respectable sphere of society, and who would rather suffer any pecuniary sacrifice than have their names brought before the public in connection with an odious charge? the extortioner prefers a bill of indictment before the Grand Jury. Against the innocent it remains a terrible instrument of oppression. Is it the object of an experienced thief to get off after committal?—it is to the Grand Jury he looks as his sheet anchor. "I consider," said Mr. Mirehouse, who has filled the office of common sergeant of the city of London for the last fifteen or sixteen years, "that a thief has about twelve or fourteen chances to get off, and that (the Grand Jury) is the first and great chance. Generally, a man of the swell-mob has plenty of money, or he is connected with those who have. Then he buys off the witnesses, and gets them to stay away, and not go before the Grand Jury." These are the two main and leading reasons for the abolition of the system, inasmuch as they point to the great evils which cannot be suffered to disgrace a modern system of jurisprudence when they have been once pointed out.

It is well urged by the Essex Herald:

"The Grand Jury system is in the present day but a form, and in great cities, as it has been proved, frequently a mischievous one, leading often to the escape of the guilty, and sometimes being made an instrument of extortion. The duties which the Grand Jury was originally intended to discharge, are now performed by the committing magistrate—he stands between a party wrongfully accused, and a long imprisonment before trial; and we see no utility in another shifting of the case before the prisoner is called on to answer the charge against him. And the alteration would have this advantage—the class now summoned as special Jurymen would be thrown into the general panel, and thus the standard of intelligence in the jury-box would be raised—an improvement which those accustomed to watch the administration of public justice must have often felt to be desirable."

Under certain conditions we can see no danger in committing to one competent, honest man the task of investigating and deciding in charges of a criminal nature to the extent of ascertaining whether there be probable grounds for sending the prisoner before a jury, who shall hear the evidence on both sides and determine accordingly. The most important of these conditions would be that every investigation at which any person is committed or discharged by any police magistrate, or justice of the peace, shall take place in an open court, and it shall not be lawful for any magistrate to hear and determine, so far as committing and discharging, any charge whatever in private."

Mr. PETTIT, resuming. And so say I, Mr. President.

I remarked that my desire was not merely to see the Grand Jury system abolished, but to establish in its stead such an institution as would insure punishment to the guilty, and certain protection to the innocent. If the Grand Jury itself be the most eminently desirable institution, and the only one that can effect that object, then I go not only for the present establishment of the Grand Jury, but for its perpetuity. But, sir, I am convinced that such is not its character, and acting up to my convictions I desire to see the system abolished. I have had these extracts from influential and able journals read, not because they are the only ones, or the best that could be brought forward, but because they are convenient, and because the Espana case alluded to by the New Orleans Della is familiar to all. It seems that in Louisiana there is no Constitutional provision against an abolition of the Grand Jury system by the Legislature, and the newspaper I have quoted very properly wonders why so odious an institution is not immediately done away with. The second extract is from a Missouri paper, and embodies the same principle. The other extracts are from papers published in England—the country from which we derived this hoary-headed relic of a feudal age—and shows that the people of that monarchical form of Government are actually in advance of us, who profess to lead in political reforms of the age. They say that the Grand Jury is but a ceremony, and that it is frequently an injury to innocent parties, while it is very often a protection to the really guilty. And as to a substitute, we find that in the city of London the Police Magistrate, who now takes the place of the discarded Grand Jury, who conducts his inquiry with open doors—who confronts the witnesses with the accused—who admits the legal advisers of the supposed criminal to his court, and permits them to argue against the propriety of his committal, either on grounds of law or fact—and who, above all, must exercise his solemn functions in full view of the public eye, and in full hearing of the public ear, such an officer is found to offer far more valuable guarantees to the public than any mystical tribunal sitting in secret, such as the Grand Jury, whose operations are the very reverse of those I have just described.

Mr. President, is it not apparent that we, in this country, can easily enough substitute public examinations before a proper officer, for this Grand Jury system, which works quite as badly here as on the soil to which it is indigenous? It is easy enough to select an examining magistrate from one of our judicial officers. We have a Supreme Court Judge, a Circuit Court Judge, Associate Judges, and in some of the counties the Probate Judge has authority. Beside these, there are the Justices of the Peace, who might be empowered to sit as magistrates in public examinations. And now, I would ask, why not make this change—why is it not practicable and expedient? Let us reason together on this subject: if I am wrong do not abuse me, but reason me out of my mistake, if I be laboring under one.

Some have said that they might be induced to support a proposition for the abolition of the Grand Jury system, so far as minor and petty offences were concerned, but they are in favor of retaining the institution for the examination of all crimes and felonies. But, sir, I should support a proposition just the reverse of this. If the Grand Jury must be retained at all, let it be for the minor offences, leaving the charge of crimes and felonies to be made before an examining magistrate sitting in public. But I would much prefer that the institution should be abolished altogether. And let me say to you, and to all, whether agreeing with me or not on this question, that there is no medium course—no middle ground—no half-way line in this matter. You must either nourish and protect this Grand Jury system as it is, or pull it up by the roots.

It has been said here that you may remove from this institution the feature of secrecy and preserve the rest; but when you do this, you make of your Grand Jury something very like a mob—you take away its distinctive character. Remove the injunction of secrecy and the vital force, the existence of the system is gone. Take a jury of sixteen or eighteen men, with the lawyers and witnesses assembled: the prosecutor opens, the counsel for the defendant rejoins, and there will be uselessly spent day after day in an angry contest as to points of law and evidence, for you will have no judge legally appointed, sitting there to decide questions of law and to enforce order, to say thus far you may go; this question is relevant and that irrelevant; but all are judges and jurors, and all will be confusion worse confounded. Sir, there is no half-way ground, we must either cut off this noxious weed: lop off these useless branches upon the fair trunk of American jurisprudence, or we must heal up the bruised reed and leave the old and unsightly branch to disfigure the jurisprudence of the State.

Sir, what do you do—for instance, a man steals a horse from your neighborhood, what is the practical use of a Grand Jury? Half a dozen or more men are upon the instant of alarm, in full pursuit of the thief, and there are always enough to file an affidavit against the thief. You will always find men ready to make complaint of the commission of any crime in the dark catalogue of human depravity.

By abolishing this Grand Jury system you will add to the manly firmness and dignity of your population. Teach them that there is a public officer before whom they are liable at any time to be dragged, upon charges made by individuals, and a feeling of fear of suspicion will always influence their minds and actions.

Let us look now at the security of this institution. The man is brought up and examined before a justice of the peace in the manner alluded to in the London Times, which I have just had read. And here let me say to this Convention, that the authority of the London Times is not to be sneered at, for that paper has done more to advance human liberty than all the newspapers of Europe put together have done. It has been the first to rebuke tyranny and oppression, and to defend the rights of humanity, and it deserves an eulogy far greater than my feeble powers could bestow upon it. The defendant is there with his counsel, and the State witnesses are there, and a searching investigation takes place. I ask why not write down the evidence—why not make it a part of the duty of the examining magistrate to take down the evidence of the witnesses for and against the accused and have it filed in the Clerk's office?

The party accused, as I have said before, is brought up before the justice of the peace. The prosecuting attorney for instance then appears in behalf of the State, and I appear in behalf of the accused. The public are all around us, and hear the evidence on both sides, and the justices take down the evidence, and if they are of opinion that the accused is guilty, they file the evidence in the office of the Clerk of the county in which the offence may have been committed. The prosecuting attorney then goes, and upon his oath as an officer and his character as a professional man, decides whether the evidence will sustain an indictment or not—and I ask if the Grand Jury does not then decide in accordance with the opinion of the prosecuting attorney? If the prosecuting attorney tells the Grand Jury to bring in an indictment, do they not bring it in? and if to the contrary, do they not drop the subject? Why, sir, I never found but one stubborn Grand Jury in the course of my experience as United States District Attorney in my life, and that jury reported me to Judge ——— because I would not write an indictment against a citizen they wanted to prosecute without any just grounds. His honor very properly told them that they ought to be ashamed of themselves to find an indictment on such a state of affairs.

The finding of a Grand Jury is upon the evidence presented under the direction and counsel of the prosecuting attorney. If his counsel is to bring in an indictment, and the evidence in the case is sufficient, they bring it in. If it is his opinion that an indictment should not be found, the case is disposed of very speedily. The prosecuting attorney simply writes out the bill of indictment, and all the Grand Jury have to do is to take a vote upon it, and endorse it a true bill. Sir, the whole system is a ridiculous absurdity. Let us rise a little above the narrow contracted views of early education and prejudices on this question, and take a common sense view of the matter. Why may not the enforcement of law and order and of justice be conducted in this practical way? What is the use of the intervention of the Grand Jury in such a case? Why, the accused has been publicly examined, the evidence is conclusive, and he is required to appear at court to answer the charges made against him, or he is committed for want of bail. Where, then, is the necessity of the intervention of the Grand Jury? The attorney discharges all these duties, prepares the charges, and draws a bill of indictment. The sixteen men composing the Grand Jury are guided entirely by his counsel, and if he were allowed to exercise the authority vested in the Grand Jury, and which he in fact directs as he chooses, there would be no necessity for the intervention of these sixteen men—nor has there ever been. They are the machinery, as it were, which the prosecuting attorney sets in motion. What, then, is the use of this body of men?

But it is suggested to me, by way of objection, that the examining magistrate, upon hearing the evidence adduced, may discharge the accused when he is really guilty. Well, sir, if he should there are ten thousand chances for the correctness of the magistrate's decision, to one for that of the decision of the Grand Jury—and why? The examining magistrate, in the first place, has had more experience in reference to law matters than the Grand Jury, and in the next place, he has heard the evidence of the witnesses on both sides, and the arguments of the counsel for the prosecution and the defendant; he is therefore better prepared to decide with certainty whether the accused be guilty or not guilty.

Every gentleman will admit that we desire, in the administration of the law, to have such organizations only as will insure safety to the innocent and punishment to the guilty. Now how often is it, under the Grand Jury system, that a man who has been indicted and held to recognizance, has been discharged and had his indictment ignored? We do not know the reason of it. Perhaps the necessary witnesses are not present, or testify differently from what they did before the examining magistrate, or have forgotten the material portions of the evidence, and cannot testify clearly upon the question. The witnesses, perhaps, have been tampered with, and thus the really guilty go unpunished. This is one of the evils attendant upon the delay which characterizes the action of the Grand Jury. Suppose a riot occurs, and it is desired to bring the participants in it to immediate justice. You can get nobody to testify in the case. The Grand Jury will soon set, say the spectators, and then we can give our evidence in secret, and no one will know anything about it. And when the Grand Jury commences its sessions, how often is it that the participants in, and spectators of, the riot have left the county for a few days. Many are paid to keep away during the sittings, and they travel like birds of passage as the Grand Juries are coming on. If, on the contrary, your courts were always open, and these matters were given in charge of the justices of the peace, you would see a speedy administration of justice, and a prompt punishment of all offenders. You would witness none of the scenes that take place during the sittings of the Grand Juries that I have depicted.

But another objection is urged—that the justice might accidentally let the man go, after all this examination, who was really guilty. As I have remarked before, there are ten chances in favor of the magistrate's arriving at the truth of the case, where the Grand Jury have one. These magistrates are greatly less liable to err than the Grand Jury.

In order to make this system of public examinations operate to the satisfaction of all, let the prosecuting attorney, if you choose, in all instances where he may have reasonable doubts as to the guilt of the accused, have the power to order an appeal, which, in behalf of the State, shall operate to stay the charge against the defendant—operate as a sort of recognizance upon him. Whenever he thinks that the justice has decided wrong, let him take an appeal upon his own responsibility. Where is the necessity, then, of the further continuance of this system? I ask gentlemen seriously to say if they do not think a better system can be devised for bringing offenders to justice than this secret inquisition? Great Britain and America, the only two countries in which this system exists, are not the only two governments in the world in which crime is punished. Has not crime been punished, and that, too, with great severity, in France and Germany, and other European countries? Did not Rome punish her offenders with as certain security to her citizens as ever did Great Britain or America? You may now and then find an extravagant case in the books and statutes, where an undue exercise of authority has been made by the presiding magistrate of the country, as in the case of our Saviour, who was so cruelly persecuted by the Jews; I fear, however, in that instance, whether a Grand Jury found a bill of indictment or not, He would have had to suffer.

There is an impression that has gone abroad among the younger members of the bar, that this is an institution that has received the warmest sanction of the most eminent of the English jurists, lawyers, and judges, in their writings.

I would state to the members of this Convention, that this is a mistake; there is not a word to be found in any of the books of the English Jurists, that praises the system of Grand Juries. Their organization is silently admitted; but their utility is not commended. You cannot find in the English law books a paragraph as long as your finger in favor of it—even Bacon in his abridgment says nothing in its favor.

I do not wish gentlemen to mistake this statement. You have read, doubtless, of the opinions of English Jurists upon the subject of trial by jury, and they have advocated it in all its beauty and perfection, as the palladium of their liberty; but you should not be misled or confounded that subject with the Grand Jury system. There is no such intermingling in the legal offices in England. Let me say to gentlemen that the Grand Jury has been a cause of terror in England. Tell me not that it was there the protection of the subject, and the shield from wrong. When it existed in the reign of bloody Henry the Eighth, and of James the Second, with his infamous Jeffries, did this shield the people from the vengeance of those tyrants? Did it stay the hangman's hand, or the axeman's blow? No sir—no sir. Sir, a bad system may possibly be well administered, but we had better have a good system at once, and then we will have less danger of a bad administration of the laws.

It will afford protection to the citizen it is urged. Sir, I deny the possibility of its affording any such protection. I despise the protection which a secret tribunal affords, that examines my enemies behind my back. I loathe the idea of protection from such a body.

But I am told that secrecy is necessary and due from the community to him, who informs of a misdemeanor. I repeat it, sir; none but the dastardly and the cowardly will ask such a shield and protection, for the performance of what should be a solemn duty to society. No; the man who acts from a conscientious desire to rid society of those whose "evil communications corrupt good manners," will always be found willing to make complaint, before an examining magistrate, sitting in public. It becomes every man's interest as he loves his own peace, the security of his property, and the quiet and happiness of his family, to give prompt information of the disturber of the public peace; and of those whose presence threatens the security of property, or person. Rest assured then, that no crime worthy of punishment will go unwhipped of justice, for the want of complaining parties, should this odious Grand Jury system be abolished, and public examinations substituted in its stead. Aside from volunteer complainants, there are the constables, whose duty it would be to make known the authors of all disturbers of the peace—they are the conservators of the peace, and it is their place ex-officio, to enquire into everything militating against good order. But I am told that some mean men have been in the habit of writing anonymous letters to the foreman of the Grand Jury, or other officers, saying, "if you will send for such a man, in such a place, you will receive full information of the commission of such a crime, by such a person, and the time when." But experience tells us that the result will always be that, when the examination or trial comes on, one of the main, and perhaps, most forward witnesses will be the very person who dictated that anonymous letter—he wants it to say hereafter, that he "was dragged into the trial against his will," and that he was "forced" reluctantly to give his testimony in such a case. There are many here who understand the whole modus operandi of these very modest persons, who first write anonymous letters, implicating the character of their neighbors, and thus get the opportunity of venting their malice under the cloak of a forced witness. The friends of the Grand Jury tell us that, in this way many criminals have been brought to justice, and punished; whereas, if the system were changed, many evil persons would escape through the unwillingness of their neighbors to prefer open charges against them. This, sir, is a mistake, for even mean and disreputable conduct can be turned to account for the public interests. Will not the same persons write the same anonymous letters, and drop them, or send them into the office of the examining magistrate, telling him what he would tell the Grand Jury? In case of the substitution of some kind of public examination, you make it the sworn duty of all justices of the peace to make diligent inquiry into all cases where misdemeanors have been charged, or even suspected, and, sir, I ask if justices of the peace are any less liable to perform their duty, strictly and faithfully, than Grand Juries? No one well acquainted with the general worth and fidelity of this most useful, though humble class of public officers, will doubt their effectiveness on this score. And how much better would it be to have these open, fair, public examinations of all parties accused of misdemeanors, with the accused having the right to confront his accusers, and to produce in this primary trial, his testimony and his defence. Give me the country to live and to act in, where the judicial department of its government, says boldly and openly to the citizen "Sir, it is thought by some, that you have violated the law, you shall be publicly examined before the proper tribunal, composed of your peers, you shall have the privilege of confronting your accusers, and if you be able to establish your innocence, you shall be clear. You are presumed to be innocent, but if the contrary is proven in the judgment of your peers, you shall be cut off from further intercourse with society. Under such a system criminals would be brought to certain punishment, and the aggregate of crimes against the peace of society, greatly diminished, for, with the Grand Jury abolished, and the substitution of public examinations, the evil doer would know that retribution would follow upon the heel of the criminal, with rapidity and unerring certainty.

A few words more, Mr. President, and I will relieve the attention of the Convention, for which I feel grateful.

I wish to refer to a motion or two which has been made with reference to the resolution now under discussion. There is a motion to refer this resolution to another committee than the one indicated by it. I say to the friends of the resolution, stand by the original proposition in its original shape and wording—vote down all propositions to amend the original resolution or to refer it to a different committee than the one to which, on its face, it is directed. And allow me further to say to the friends of this important proposition for the abolition of the "ceremony" of the Grand Jury, take all the votes upon motions to amend, to alter and to refer, by ayes and noes, that the people of Indiana may know who is in favor of, and who opposes this most salutary reform. The gentleman from Allen has proposed to send this resolution to the committee on the "bill of rights;" another gentleman advocates its reference to the committee on "criminal law." It is not that I distrust the ability or the integrity of the members of either of these committees, that I oppose a reference of this particular subject to them, for I know them all to be able and just men. The chairman of the criminal law committee, I know is with me toto coelo, as to the merits of the proposition, and I certainly could have no fear of its fate in his hands. The chairman of the other committee, whatever might be his personal preferences, would yield to the will of a majority. But, sir, I resist its taking a different direction from the one indicated on its face, upon principle. And here let me say to gentlemen, young or old in the profession, that they are mistaken in thinking that Grand Juries, as a matter of course, do not belong to the organization of courts of justice. A court consists, not of a judge alone, but of a judge, a recorder or clerk, who shall keep a perfect record of its acts, a sheriff to bring in the subjects upon which the judge shall act, and, in criminal courts as at present constituted, a Grand Jury and a traverse jury, and last, though by no means least, the members of the bar; and these, sir, constitute a court. To the court it properly and legitimately belongs to determine whether it will empanel a Grand Jury or not. For these reasons I say that this resolution ought to go to the committee to which it was originally directed, and that, too, without amendment or revision.

Well, Mr. President, I believe I have exhausted time enough, and perhaps have exerted myself too much. I believe that I have given the subject, which I deem one of the most important that will be brought up for earnest discussion in this Convention, a fair, a full, and a candid consideration. I trust that I have wounded the feelings of no gentleman. I came here to offend no one, but with a sincere desire that we might reason together as to the best measures for attaining the highest interests and prosperity of the people of Indiana. We came here to lay anew our political foundations, upon which a great and a free people may build a political temple of beauteous proportions, under the protection of which they can live in safety, and, unfettered, work out their brilliant destiny. That this may be our good fortune, is my most ardent desire.

MR. PETTIT wishes to add that he approves of the substitute of MR. NILES, offered after the delivery of the above speech, as being, in his opinion, better than the one proposed by himself.

MR. NEWMAN. Mr. President: like many of my colleagues upon this floor, I have never before held an office in this State or in the United States, and, therefore, cannot boast of the official experience that some gentlemen present may. But each member is sent up here to represent the views and feelings of his constituents upon the various propositions that will be submitted for the revision or amendment of the old Constitution, and I regard the system of Grand Juries, to abolish which there is now a proposition before the Convention, as one of the most important pillars in our political edifice.

The whole population of the State has a deep interest in this subject. We are here to protect their rights, and, sitting in that capacity, it is our duty to see that nothing shall be incorporated into the organic law we are about to frame, that shall be injurious to their interests. In my opinion, sir, for one gentleman to speak of another here, whose age and experience as a lawyer and a public servant from early life, that "he is a man of another age—of a past generation," is highly improper. It is practically eschewing that old and universally received maxim, "experience brings wisdom," and is in reality discarding the wisdom of ages. Of all men, it is not for us to speak lightly of the wisdom of the past, for it is the great, if not the only guide we have in our present deliberations.

The institution of the Grand Jury, although in England it may have been prostituted to subserve the interests of the crown, has, nevertheless, been of the greatest practical utility in this country. It has well answered all the ends for which it was designed, and it will be long before the people, who have so much confidence in it, can be persuaded that it is best to adopt something that is new and untried in its place. The Grand Jury, like many other measures which history informs us were concocted for iniquitous purposes by the minions of kings, has redounded to the liberty of the subject. When the monarchs of England enfranchised the nobility, for selfish purposes it is true, they set up a body—an order of men in the realm, that, in the progress of time and the slow but sure development of mind, finally curbed and limited the prerogatives of the crown itself. The great Magna Charta and the Habeas Corpus act resulted from this. The Habeas Corpus has proved to be one of the greatest privileges ever wrested by the subject from his monarch.

The institution of the Grand Jury proved to be another of those popular triumphs which, in the course of time, have resulted in the complete enfranchisement of the people. It was provided that, when any citizen was suspected or accused of a crime, the matter should be brought before sixteen or eighteen discreet men of the vicinity, who were to decide whether or not there was sufficient foundation for the charge to make it worthy of being brought before a jury of his peers in public. Hence, soon after their adoption in Great Britain, they were looked upon as the sheet-anchor of the citizens' rights.

To bring my hasty glance at this subject down to the present day, or rather down to the period of the American Revolution and our separation from the mother country, it was at that time thought to be so just, so important a matter that a person should be tried only upon an indictment having been first found against him by a Grand Jury of his peers, empanelled from the neighborhood in which the offence was adjudged to have been committed, that we find it is one of those solemn and eloquent charges, made by the first American Congress in their world-famed Declaration of Independence, against the King of Great Britain, that he had dragged free citizens of this country to foreign lands beyond the sea, there to be tried by strangers for supposed offences. Sir, in this memorable instance, we see how strong was the principle of the citizen's right to be tried only upon indictment by a jury of his neighbors.

By the operation of the Grand Jury system the supposed offender is first to be tried by men from the population by which he has been surrounded and in the midst of which the offence may have been committed; otherwise he cannot be put upon his trial before a traverse jury.

We are told by the advocates of the abolition of this system, that it is an institution which is liable to be perverted to subserve the purposes of malice, private enmity, and desire for revenge, on the one hand, and to the escape of criminals deserving of punishment on the other. In return, sir, I ask gentlemen what political, social, or religious system or institution is there which has not been and is not liable to be prostituted to bad ends when in the hands of evil men? It would be very agreeable to suppose a pure state of things, and it may do for the Utopian to dream of a state of perfect purity among men; but, sir, for the purposes of practical legislation, and for the basis of discussions upon organic law, we must take the world as it is, and society as we find it; and it is too true, that in every community there are bad men and evil disposed persons who are ever ready to pervert a good institution to evil purposes; in every community, men who may deceive the people, and be placed in offices of trust, who will abuse that trust. But where can we find a better or a safer repository of power than a selection from the freeholders of a county? Can there be greater security than the position, and character, and interests of these men offer to the community, for the careful and faithful discharge of their solemn duties?

The members of the Grand Jury serve but for one term; there is no prospect of continuing long in office, even if that office were a profitable one; there is no temptation to venality, no opportunity for corruption; for those persons most interested, and most likely to attempt the seduction of a jury by bribery or intimidation, know nothing of the matter until after an indictment is found against him, if he has been adjudged worthy of trial by a petit jury.

The Grand Jury, composed of such men and under such circumstances, assemble, and in a calm and unprejudiced manner review the conduct and character of their fellow citizens. There may be, and doubtless are, hundreds of examinations of this kind, which never do become public, and resulting from this follow the best effects. For there are many instances where if a man were openly accused of crime in public, many in the community would believe him innocent, although a jury should acquit him of the crime for which he stood accused; but do you not see that where all such examinations into the character of the citizen is kept secretly private, as they always are sworn to be kept by Grand Jurors, the innocent persons lives on unscathed even by the suspicion or charge of guilt?

What other tribunal for the same or similar purposes has ever been instituted since the organization of society that has not been liable to abuse? None, sir; nor will there ever be until the frail and erring mind of the lawmaker shall attain the prescience of divinity. There never yet was a court, though never so purely and intelligently constituted, against which slander did not raise the imputation of venality, or the charge of oppression. Corruption, sir! why it has been charged upon the greatest and the purest men that ever lived. And judges and juries, in open court, are much more obnoxious to these charges than those who sit in privacy, for the reason that it is obviously more easy to approach and corrupt the judge on the bench, and the jury in the box, than the tribunal whose sittings are for a good cause, shielded from the public gaze and public approach. The Grand Jury are subject to none of these temptations. They are to find bills or refuse to find, not at the dictation of the court, not by the advice of any officer of the law, but upon their own judgments, based upon the evidence before them.

Allow me, sir, to advert for a moment to the precedent of a tribunal which acted without the suggestion or intervention of a Grand Jury. I mean the Star Chamber in England, probably the most infamous court ever allowed to sit in a civilized or a half civilized country;—an institution which contributed more to the decline of the power, and finally to the execution of King Charles, than all other causes combined. Because he suffered a tribunal to sit and pass upon the lives, liberty, and property, of the citizen, without that citizen being first indicted by a jury of his peers, and of his vicinity, was that monarch deemed worthy of the most fearful retribution ever visited upon a sovereign by his people.

And how did our forefathers, who had drank too deeply of the spirit of liberty to submit to the domination of England, view this institution which we, in Indiana, of all the States in the American Union, propose to abolish? It was thought by men of large experience and sound judgment, who had seen the principles of liberty tried to their utmost tension during the Revolutionary struggle, that the Grand Jury system was so important for the protection of the rights and privileges of the citizen that a provision for their institution was incorporated into the Constitution of the United States.

And, sir, I ask if experience has shown that we, at this day, should discard it?

The advocates of the proposition to abolish the Grand Jury system tell us, that in its place there should be a tribunal, before whom public examinations of suspected or accused parties should take place, that the members of this tribunal should be sworn, and that the prosecuting attorney should attend all examinations. Now on the other hand the same gentlemen who recommend these public examinations tell us, in opposition to a proposition to amend the Grand Jury system by having its sittings in public, that such a Grand Jury would be merely a legalized mob. If so, I ask what gentlemen would call these public examinations that are to be substituted for the Grand Jury? By what term will they characterize such prolix and disorderly scenes as a public examination, with all the parties, their witnesses, counsel, and friends, present, must inevitably be?

But, sir, I wish to inquire of the supporters of the proposition now before the Convention, if we are to have what might be termed a full trial of the accused party at these public examinations, where is the necessity of the form of a second trial after all the time, expense, and publicity of the first? If this proposition to abolish the institution of the Grand Jury fails, and a system of trial by public examination before judges or magistrates prevail, it would be well to introduce another resolution to abolish the second trial, or the trial in the court by a petit jury; for why not let conviction or acquittal follow the decision of the judge at the "public examination," as it is called, but at the trial as it is. The friends of the proposition before the Convention, however, propose no abolition of the second trial, and all that they propose for the public examination after a formal citing of all parties, taking testimony, hearing counsel, and going through all the expense of time and money of a regular trial, is simply to bind the parties over to await their second trial at the next session of the court.

But we are told that the Grand Jury is a secret institution. Aye, sir, it is, and one before which the lawless and the disturbers of the public peace feel more terror than any other in the country! If you could go around and visit all the sinks of iniquity that infest society, you would find their inmates are more fearful of Grand Juries and their "true bills of indictment" than of anything else.

It is a maxim of wisdom, though it may be that the gentleman of Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) would characterise it as the obsolete opinion of another age, that "the guilty flee when no man pursueth." And so when in a county the time draws near for the session of the Grand Jury, you will find the gamblers, the licentious, and evil doers of every description fleeing all over the country, and then returning at the close of the session, stealing up to this one and that one and stealthily inquiring what bills have been found and who have been indicted by the Grand Jury.

Mr. PETTIT. — That might be urged as an argument against your system.

Mr. NEWMAN. But where offenders are known and it becomes necessary to detain their persons, they are always liable to be recognized and obliged to give bail for their appearance at the next term of the court. Nothing is more common than for witnesses to be attached and recognized—aye, sir, and brought before Court for refusing to testify before a Grand Jury; and I have seen refractory witnesses go to prison and lay there for days rather than testify against their guilty associates.

Would your "public examining" officer send witnesses to prison for refusing to testify?

But this new institution is to be in the nature of an "information."

In England they have a certain law officer of the crown called an attorney general. Where he suspects a crime he goes to a certain office and files an "information" against the suspected person. This is independent of a Grand Jury and the proceeding is a criminal one in its character. But this power is now looked upon as one of the most odious features of the British Constitution; and why? Simply, sir, because the citizen is liable to be put upon final trial for his liberty or life without a jury of his peers having first examined the case, and adjudged his case worthy of solemn trial.

But gentlemen tell us that the witnesses will fly. Why will they fly? To screen their guilty associates. Then why tell us that the very persons who know all about the offenses which have been committed are anxious to avoid being brought before an inquiring tribunal? Why tell us that there will always be persons ready and willing to prosecute on all proper occasions? I agree with the gentleman in regard to the importance of the punishment of certain offenses which are carried on in certain dens throughout the country. Sir, you will find no person to prosecute in such cases; and you will also find that a Grand Jury is the only tribunal which will inquire into it. How often do you hear of an individual being accused of an offense where it is well known that the offense has been committed, and where the evidence is pretty strong to mark its perpetrator, but where there is no Grand Jury in the neighborhood? Why sir, never. The man's neighbors say that they will not move in the matter from considerations of charity to the man himself as well as to his family; and that if the Grand Jury don't get hold of it they will suffer him to escape. There may be certain offenders who escape under the system we practice now, but with such a system as that which it is proposed to substitute you would find that escapes would be much more frequent than they are. An offender, often has powerful friends and associates; and many a right thinking man would say, "I am not willing to go before a public tribunal, and incur the malice and displeasure of these parties by volunteering to prosecute." On the other hand, a Grand Jury is selected from the various parts of the county; and if offenses have been committed they hear of them, they have knowledge of the fact, and whether a private individual is willing to take the responsibility of prosecuting or not, they have taken upon themselves the obligation of an oath that they will diligently inquire into all matters and things, and true presentments make, regardless of fear or favor. Let the individual be high or low, rich or poor, he cannot escape a presentment if the Grand Jury are faithful to the interests of the country and the rights of the citizens.

Well, sir, we are again told that there is nothing like this system in Greece or Rome, or even in republican France. Let me ask the gentleman to contrast the comparative liberty of the people of this country or Great Britain with that of any of the countries he has named, and then let me ask him which is entitled to the meed of praise? Is it the institutions of these countries, or those of our own and that from which we descended? We know how the people in these countries have been oppressed. We know how they have been committed to the flames on the mere dictum of an arbitrary monarch, and so they would be yet were it not for the powerful influence of public opinion in Great Britain—that country from which we derived our origin. I am a reformer; I believe in the principles of the Reformation; and I also believe that the principles of liberty, as recognised in that country, (Great Britain,) have exercised a salutary influence on the rest of the world. That we have vastly improved on them there can be no doubt; but I see no reason why we should pull down any of the pillars of the great temple of liberty, under whose canopy we all worship.

Again, we are told that this system is expensive. So it is. But what tribunal will you have which is not expensive? The gentleman who proposes to abolish the Grand Jury system, appears to contemplate the establishment of a permanent tribunal from year to year. Will such a tribunal be less expensive? Impossible. It will be four-fold more expensive, to say the least of it. Expense, however, ought never to be taken into consideration where great principles of liberty are concerned, or where there is well grounded reason to suppose that the liberty of the citizen might be protected by incurring that expense. In Great Britain they had another provision. The public prosecutor could cease his prosecution if he chose; and not unfrequently the defendant by making a certain composition was let off, perhaps by the payment of a trivial fine to the king. It is true that a Grand Jury have the same power there which they have here. They can, ex officio, file a presentment. Those presentments which are preferred by individuals are styled indictments. Now let me ask if the gentlemen who advocate the proscription of this sacred tribunal, desire to incorporate such a feature into our institutions as that I have named? Are they willing that money should thus be extorted from defendants? It is no doubt under that provision, that enormous sums have been extorted from keepers of gambling houses. But let me ask gentlemen who would do away with this system, whether there ought not to be some tribunal that would bring gambling house keepers, not merely to make a composition for their offences, but that would eradicate them from the social body? They ought undoubtedly to be put down; and what tribunal is so likely to effect this, as a tribunal composed of the independent, and virtuous, and upright citizens of a community, who look to no interests except to those embraced in the general advancement and welfare of the whole community? A Grand Jury is much more likely to have that feeling, than any other tribunal that can be created; especially when you take into consideration that there is a large number of them, they have to consult together, and that corruption cannot, therefore, be supposed to exist amongst them. As, too, they hold office but for one term of the court, there is no bribe that can be offered to them; and if such a thing could be, they are not the men in all the land who would be likely to accept it. On the other hand let every accusation be taken before an examining magistrate, are you sure that such magistrate could not be corrupted? Is it not in the experience of many members of the Convention, that, where parties are accused, they will change the venue, and have the case examined before some favorite magistrate, who will either inflict a trivial punishment for an infamous crime, or allow the offender to escape all punishment whatever?

Again: the gentleman urged that not one out of twenty indictments originating with Grand Juries were sustained. I will ask the gentleman whether, in the opinion of those who advocate the abolition of this system, there are not more than one in twenty who ought to be convicted? Is not the fact of their escape generally attributable to a want of or defect in the evidence, rather than the absence of guilt on the part of the accused? Is it not owing to the humanity of the law, which requires that a party should be proved guilty beyond all reasonable doubt? Is it not owing to the belief in that principle by doubting juries—by those men who have not seen so much as others have of the crimes of mankind—that will not allow them to put the full force of the laws into operation against the guilty? Nothing is more certain than that a large number of the guilty escape, while it very rarely happens that an innocent man is made to suffer. I have heard it said again and again, by members of the bar, that that maxim of the law which declares that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape, than that one innocent man should suffer, has been fully verified in their experience. Some of them go a little further, and say that ninety-nine guilty men escape where one is convicted. And I am afraid there is too much truth in the remark to make a joke of it. It is a reproach upon the law that there are too many of those who break through all its meshes, and escape all its penalties. It is well known that this is the fact, and that it is not owing to the oppression of the Grand Jury system.

Sir, although I have been in the practice of the law for twenty-two years, I never yet heard a well grounded complaint against the Grand Jury system. Whatever gentlemen may have to say against the evils of the system, this is my experience, and I believe is the very truth in relation to Grand Juries in the section of country in which I reside. No, sir; I never heard a Grand Jury censured even by those who might be supposed to have been injured by any acts they had done. Mr. President, I say as I said before, there is no institution that can do a great deal of good, that is not susceptible of being tortured into an engine of a great deal of harm. The most pure and excellent institutions may degenerate into corruption, if they are not properly guarded. But when you recur to the source of all power—to the great body of the people interested in the observation of the laws, and in the preservation of those liberties which those laws guarantee to themselves and their posterity, where their own rights as well as the rights of posterity depend upon their action—you cannot suppose that they will ever be so corrupt as to do what is absolutely injurious in relation to matters of this kind. If you can suppose that it is a bad state of the case in regard to public morals, it is a progress downwards in the cause of liberty, and may fit us for institutions having less of popular freedom—less of human rights in them than those which we now enjoy.

Mr. President, in the remarks which I have offered, I feel that I have consumed as much of the time of the Convention on this subject as any one member ought to consume. Let me, therefore, in conclusion, ask gentlemen to scan well the effects to be produced by the abolition of this institution, before they give their votes for the measure. Let me ask them to look at the consequences that may result, and the evils which may be produced by the adoption of other forms of procedure, concerning the effects of which we can know but little until we see their practical workings.

Mr. GIBSON having obtained the floor, said, that as the hour for adjournment had nearly arrived, and as he did not wish to occupy the time of the Convention both in the morning and afternoon with the remarks he had to offer, he would now move that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention accordingly adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

PROTEST AGAINST THE ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. MAY said, he held in his hand the protest of several members against the election of a Printer to this body. The paper, he believed, would be found sufficiently respectful in its language; and if it were necessary that the rules be suspended for the purpose, he would make that motion in order to enable him to make another motion, that the protest be entered upon the journal.

The PRESIDENT said, that the motion to enter a protest was a privileged motion, and could be entertained at any time.

The protest was then read by the Secretary; and it is as follows:

To the Honorable, the Constitutional Convention, now in session:

The undersigned, members of your honorable body, being of opinion that your honorable body transcended its powers in the election of a Printer, and in deciding that Jacob P. Chapman is not legally authorized to do its printing, as Printer for the State, do most respectfully protest against the above named decision and order of your honorable body, for the following reasons:

1. J. P. Chapinan was duly elected State Printer under the act of 1843, and is still State Printer;—that his election under that act, and giving bond in accordance with it, constitute a contract, under which he is entitled to the printing of this honorable body; and being now ready and willing to execute that printing, this honorable body has not, in the opinion of the undersigned, any power to deprive him of this right, or to cause its printing to be done by any other person.

2. In the opinion of the undersigned, this honorable body has no power to order the payment of its Printer, who has been elected, for his services, and that there is no fund out of which he can be legally paid;—that said printing can neither be superintended, measured, audited, nor paid by any officer or officers of this State; that the President of this honorable body cannot lawfully certify to said printing before the adjournment of this honorable body, and still less afterwards; and that this honorable body has no powers to appropriate money for printing other than those conferred upon it by the act of the General Assembly of this State, authorising the call of this Convention.

The undersigned do, therefore, humbly request that this, their protest, may be entered upon the Journal of this honorable body.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the special order.

Mr. PETTIT said, he believed it was according to Parliamentary usage that the mover of a proposition, at any time before a vote is taken upon it, or before the debate has closed, has a right to make or accept of any modification of the original proposition, as he may see proper to do. If he was correct in this, he would offer the following amendment to his resolution which was now before the Convention, stating, as he should, that it was suggested by his friend, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper):

"Provided, That the General Assembly may, after the expiration of five years, restore the Grand Jury system."

Mr. GIBSON, being entitled to the floor, said, he had not intended to trouble the Convention with any remarks on this subject, for, until yesterday, he had not believed it was seriously intended to press its adoption. In this he had now reason to believe himself mistaken, but could not yet bring himself to believe that a proposition fraught with so much mischief to the best interests of society, would receive the sanction of this Convention. But under the present aspect of the case, he felt that he would be wanting in duty to himself and his constituents if he did not take occasion to express the deep conviction of his mind against the expediency of adopting so hazardous and untried an experiment.

There was, perhaps, no question likely to engage the attention of this body which called for more careful deliberation than the one now under consideration. It was one that had been but little agitated among the people; one upon which he found that the minds of many members of the Convention were unsettled. In the county which he represented, it had not, to his knowledge, been alluded to by any of the candidates, or made in any way a subject of discussion among the people.

True, they had heard of it as one among the ten thousand changes that had filled the heads of politicians in every nook and corner of the State—changes numerous enough, if all collected, to fill a volume larger than the Revised Code, and many of them absurd enough to have emanated from the Lunatic Asylum of the State. But he found now that the proposition to abolish Grand Juries was to be seriously urged for adoption, and that, too, by gentlemen whose commanding intellect at least entitled them to the most respectful consideration.

What were our Grand Juries; what their powers and duties; and what was it proposed to substitute in their place? He would here take occasion to say, that whatever that substitute might be, once put it into effect and gentlemen would find many difficulties and obstacles springing from its operation, that the most far-reaching intellect would not be able now to foresee.

What was the Grand Jury as it now stood? He disclaimed the picture drawn of it by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). That picture was a caricature, with only that degree of resemblance which is essential to even a good caricature.

The system as it now stands on our Statute Book brings together semi-annually eighteen of the most respectable citizens of a county, drawn equally from all portions of the county; men who can possibly have no interest as a body to subserve, no malice to gratify, no motive but an honest desire to do their duty under the law. That law is explained to them by the court; the path of duty lies plain before them, and with the oath that they will present no man from malice, and leave no one unpresented through fear, favor, or affection, yet fresh upon their lips, they retire to their room to enter upon the discharge of their duties.

And what is that duty? Simply to inquire into all violations of the law that may come to their knowledge, and if they shall find them sufficiently proved, to return into court a bill of indictment against the offender—this comprises all their duties and all their powers.

He would here ask which one of the substitutes proposed (for no two gentlemen had, he believed, agreed upon any one) offered inducements sufficient to justify us in abandoning a system familiar to us from our infancy?

It was not the part of wisdom to dispense with any one of the accustomed and necessary engines by which government was carried on, without first devising a substitute which should be clearly and indisputably better.

He would now proceed to notice the most plausible substitutes which had been proposed in the debate, for he would here remark that the language of the resolution itself was too vague and indefinite on that branch of the subject to admit of either attack or defence. It simply proposed "public examinations," and that might readily comport with the contuance of Grand Juries.

Taking all the proposed substitutes together, we have a confused mass, in which justices of the peace, prosecuting attorneys, and public informers dance before our vision in glorious confusion.

Were justices of the peace only to take cognizance of a case when brought before them, as under our present practice, by affidavit; or were they each to be erected into a separate Grand Jury, as proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit)?

He would examine the two propositions in the order in which he had named them.

Under the system first alluded to, he would ask who would be likely to feel the vengeance of the law which he might have violated? Would it be the wealthy landholder, surrounded by his tenants, endeared to them perhaps by many an act of kindness, and holding the power at any time to eject them and their families from the home that sheltered them? Would such men be likely to go and, in the face of day, enter a complaint against their landlord for an infraction of the law which perhaps did not immediately affect either their feelings or their interests? Unquestionably not.

But there was another class of men but too common in the country: the bold and reckless desperado—the man to whom the law was a jest, and fear and honesty alike strangers. Who would complain of him?

The Convention had been told by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that it was the coward and the dastard alone who sought the secrecy of the Grand Jury room to prefer their complaints.

He would tell that gentleman, that it was no part of either wisdom or bravery for a man to risk his life, or the destruction of his property, in order to secure the enforcement of the law in a case in which, perhaps, he had neither personal feeling to gratify, or interest to subserve.

No man of sense would needlessly encounter peril in such a case.

But, if it were true that none but cowards sought the secrecy of the Grand Jury to prefer their complaints, he would ask if the protection of the law was to be withheld from the man whose nerves shrunk from the encounter of physical danger. Men were as God had made them; some are so constituted as to be unmannered by the presence, or even the prospect of danger. Are they for that reason, to be left at the mercy of every desperado, who, to the courage of the bull-dog, unites his ferocity?

Timidity is no crime, and of all men in the world, the constitutional coward is to be pitied, not denounced. And yet, gentlemen would place out of the pale of the laws' protection the very class of men who most need it.

But there was another class whose very helplessness demanded imperiously the laws' protection; to whom was awarded by all the right to be cowardly, without being denounced; in whose timidity was found their greatest charm. Under the proposed system, where was woman to find protection from the brutality of, perhaps, a drunken husband?

Would she dare openly to lay her wrongs at the feet of the law, and ask redress? One who could so far unsex herself as to do it, would be but little likely to need its protection.

But timidity aside, there is that in the very nature of woman which forever precludes the idea of her becoming a voluntary complainant against him whom she has garnered up in her heart of hearts; no matter how brutal may be his conduct towards her. She chooses rather to suffer in silence, and if, when smarting under recent outrage, she might, for a moment, entertain the desire of vengeance, it would be but a passing thought, to be swept away by a thousand recurring memories of the past—a thousand tender recollections would blot out the outrage from her mind, and the offender go unwhipt of justice. Blot out Grand Juries from our code, and you almost place woman out of the pale of the laws' protection.

His objection, then, to the substitute first named, was, that it withdrew protection from the weak and feeble, who most needed it; that, as to all minor offences, it rendered the law a dead letter, unless when used maliciously, and that it offered immunity to the powerful and the wealthy.

It was true that, for crimes which outraged the feeling of community, there would be no lack of prosecutors; but the great mass of minor offences would pass unnoticed, except when the law was made the engine of private malice, as it now is in the case of the statute against profane swearing. Who would complain of his friend or neighbor for betting on an election, or for any kindred offence? No man would do it unless he had some private pique to gratify. All laws of that class would remain a dead letter on the statute books, except as they were made the convenient tool by which some man should seek to annoy his enemy.

He affirmed that, under such a system, no just, no equitable, or fair administration of the criminal law could be had. That all prosecutions for misdemeanors would result from malice, whereas, under the present system, the same facilities were not offered; men had time for their passions to subside while waiting for a Grand Jury to sit. Malicious men were now accustomed to wait for the sitting of the Grand Jury to prefer their complaints, in preference to instituting a prosecution before a justice, not because they feared the offender, but because an indictment would entail a heavier bill of costs upon conviction. While so waiting, their passions have time to cool, and their purpose is frequently abandoned. Under the proposed system such would not be the case—nothing would be gained by delay, and a tribunal would be found at every man's door, ready, under the pale of the law, to pander to the worst passions of his nature.

He would now proceed to examine the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). That, as he understood it, was to confer upon justices of the peace precisely the same powers now vested in Grand Juries, except that the examination was to be in public, and both sides were to be heard. Now he undertook to say that such a law would be found to be utterly impracticable. If you give the prisoner notice, if he is guilty he will escape; if you do not give him notice what benefit does he derive from a public examination. You must, to carry out the principle for which the advocates of the resolution contend, notify the offender, and you are reduced to the necessity of either giving a notice, which will be but a warning to him to escape, or of adopting the monstrous rule that he shall be arrested without complaint on oath first made. This is a dilemma from which the friends of the proposed substitute cannot escape.

But his objections to such a system, were not confined to the practical difficulties pointed out.

It was erecting at every man's door a Grand Jury, liable to all the objections so eloquently urged here against the present order of things, and to a thousand others which time and practical experience could alone fully develop.

It would be erecting in every county, in place of one Grand Jury, meeting semi-annually, some thirty or forty in perpetual session.

He affirmed that it was inconsistent with the nature of man to have this kind of power thrust upon him, and yet bear his honors meekly. Just say to the justices of the peace scattered throughout your land, "you are the guardians of the public morals; upon you is devolved the task of prying into every man's affairs in your neighborhood, and if the slightest breath of suspicion reaches your ears that one of your neighbors has violated the law, send forth your subpoenas; bring before you every man who is likely to know aught about it, and if you can by any means get hold of the proof, bring him to trial, and you shall have your reward in the fees arising from the prosecution."

He would take it upon him to say that whenever such duties were imposed upon the highly respectable body of men who now officiated as justices, that they would resign in disgust, and that such of them as did undertake the duties, would become the most insupportable nuisances that had ever cursed a neighborhood. The natural effect of such power would be to make them the petty tyrants of the village or the neighborhood.

He cared not what might be their natural disposition, or intelligence, time and the gradual operation of such a system, would convert them into what he predicted. Man's nature has been and can be changed by circumstances.

The tyrant who deluged Rome with blood wept when he signed the first death warrant, and wished that he had never learned to write.

Place power, irresponsible power, in the hands of any man, and, as certainly as water runs downwards, he will become a despot in its exercise.

What, he would ask, constituted the difference between the sternest despotism and the freest republic of the earth.

Simply this; that in the one case the power was vested in a single individual, bearing it along with him throughout all his life, and always from the cradle to the tomb accustomed to sway the sceptre; in the other it is vested with a large body of men, constantly changed, and always fresh from the people. Apply the parallel to the case before us, and say which most resembles the despot, which most the free legislature.

The great poet of human nature had never drawn a picture truer to life than that in which he depicts the effects of power when conferred on man:

"Man, proud man, dressed in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high Heaven,
As makes e'en angels weep."

But this would not be the only evil we should encounter under the system proposed. It would enable the cunning rogue in many instances to defeat the ends of justice, by voluntarily surrendering himself to some magistrate whom he knew would deal leniently with him, or perhaps acquit him altogether; or should the laws guard against such a trick, he could procure some friend to enter a complaint against him in the right quarter, and the same result would surely follow.

But we have been told by the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) that all indictments for felony that have ever been found in this State have originated before justices of the peace. In this the gentleman was certainly mistaken, for he could point him to indictments now pending for the highest crime known to the law, which had originated before the Grand Jury, from facts there developed, months after the commission of the offence.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) had said that nineteen twentieths of all indictments for felony originating with the Grand Jury resulted in an acquittal of the prisoner. He thought that the gentleman was mistaken in the proportion assumed; but if correct, did an acquittal necessarily preclude the idea of guilt? He felt no hesitancy in saying after an experience of twelve years in the practice of the law, that he had never known a dozen indictments found in that time, that would not in his opinion have been sustained if the truth could have been reached on the final trial. A greater portion then of the sympathy which had been expended here then for those persons who had been indicted and acquitted, was wasted.

But if the mere charge of crime fixes such a stigma upon a man's character, he would ask how was the evil to be remedied by the proposed change? Now many charges are made before Grand Juries, which are not sustained; the secret is buried in the bosoms of the jurors, and the man charged is not injured; but under the proposed system, every charge made becomes public property; it is written down on the records of the country, and though no shadow of proof may sustain it, there it must remain for his children, and his children's children to read when he is in his grave.

What difference, he would ask, could it make, so far as the influence upon character was concerned, whether a man was charged with perjury before a Justice of the Peace, or indicted by a Grand Jury.

The Convention had been told that no crime deserving punishment would escape under the system proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. But for himself he confessed his inability to draw the distinction between crimes deserving punishment, and crimes not deserving punishment. If the law were violated the offender should be punished. If the law was wrong, or oppressive, let it be repealed; but so long as it remained on the statute book let it be enforced to the very letter. The man who bets ten cents on a foot race, or the toss of a copper, is as much a violator of the law, as he who stakes his thousands on a hand at poker.

He had been told by one gentleman here as a reason why the Grand Jury should be abolished, that that gentleman had himself once been indicted for betting fifty cents on a petty township election.

Now to his mind such a case was the strongest argument in favor of Grand Juries that could possibly be offered. Without the aid of Grand Juries all such offences would go unpunished. Was it desirable that such laws should not be enforced? If so, repeal the law; but while it is a law enforce it, if you would not bring all law into contempt; and so enforce it that it shall reach all offences whether great or small, and all offenders whether high or low, rich or poor.

But again: in what cases would gentlemen give justices final jurisdiction, and in what constitute them merely an examining court. Shall felony or not felony be the distinguishing line? This is one important feature of their proposed plan that they have not developed.

The probability that rogues might and would escape, either through the favor or incompetency of the Justice's court, could not have escaped the eye of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and to avoid its force he is driven to make the monstrous proposition that the State may be allowed an appeal;—in other words, that you may twice try a man for the same offense.

He would apply this to a single instance: a traveler, a thousand miles from home, is arrested upon some unfounded charge; the justice discharges him for want of proof, and the State, through an irresponsible prosecutor, appeals; the man is forced to give security for his appearance at court, and either forfeit his bond or come back a thousand miles, months after, to answer a charge which has no foundation. Surely this proposition had been thrown out by the gentleman without having duly weighed its consequences.

It seemed to him, that before this Convention would consent to the adoption of a substitute so odious in all its features, so evidently fraught with mischief to the best interests of society, that they must be convinced that the system sought to be abrogated was monstrous indeed; and this led him naturally to notice some of the objections which had been urged against it.

The first objection which we hear from every advocate of this resolution, when he rises, is, that the Grand Jury is a secret tribunal; and history has been ransacked to find odious parallels. It has been compared to the Inquisition and the Star Chamber, and denounced as unworthy the age or country in which we live. To all this there was one plain and simple answer : that secrecy formed not an essential feature of the institution ; that it was one which the Legislature had had the power to change at any time in the last thirty years, and yet no man in the legislative halls of the State had ever raised his voice for such a change—no petition of the people had ever asked it. This was, to his mind, strong evidence that it was not the people of the State who are stirring in this matter. But to his mind, secrecy, though not an essential, was yet one of the most valuable features of the system, for reasons which he had before given, and would not then recapitulate.

There was one modification of the rule enjoining secrecy which he believed might be safely and profitably made. That would be, to require the Grand Jury, by a competent clerk, to reduce the testimony to writing, read it over to the witnesses, and require their signature to it ; let this testimony be kept a secret until the prisoner was arrested, and then placed on file with the indictment. It would operate as a check on perjury ; would notify the prisoner what he had to meet ; would be a valuable guide to the prosecuting attorney ; and would no more indicate to the offender the name of the man who informed on him, than does the names of the witnesses endorsed on the indictment under the present practice. Such a change he would be glad to see made in the practice. It seemed to him that every reasonable objection to secrecy would be removed by this change, and without producing any confusion in practice.

But we had been told by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that he wanted some system of administration, by which punishment would as surely and speedily follow crime, as the bolt follows the lightning's flash.

He would ask that gentleman, in all candor, was it possible for human ingenuity to devise such a system ? Above all, he would ask, did the system proposed promise any such results ? Surely no member here was wild enough to propose that Justices should have final jurisdiction of felonies ; and the practical operation would be as now, that the prisoner could not be tried before the term of the court succeeding the commission of the offence. This was all the delay entailed by Grand Juries, and that delay would as surely result from one system as the other.

But should not gentlemen beware lest, in their haste to bring the guilty to punishment, they involved the innocent in the same toils ?

How often was it, that on the commission of great crime, circumstances would at first seem to darken around some individual, and point with damning certainty to him as the criminal ; a day, a week, or perhaps a month later, the cloud would be dispersed, new facts developed, and the true criminal discovered. Under the railroad system of criminal jurisprudence which some gentlemen seem desirous of establishing, it seemed to him that the innocent would often have as much to fear as the guilty.

The administration of criminal law should be such, that the citizen should have nothing to fear but from his guilt, nothing to hope but from his innocence. Surely such a state of things was not likely to be attained by an indecent haste in the execution of the law.

We had been told that Grand Juries had, in all ages, and all nations, where they had existed, been engines of tyranny in the hands of power, and as an instance, cited to the prosecution of Thomas Paine, in England, for the publication of the Rights of Man. Now it so happened that Paine was prosecuted on an information filed by the Attorney General, and not on a presentment made by the Grand Jury. But if true, what would it prove ? Nothing, but that the Grand Jury did just what its friends now contend it always will do : enforced the laws as they existed. The fault was in the law, not in the instrument which executed that law. As well might history charge the blood of Algernon Sydney upon the executioner at whose feet rolled his gory head. Such objections might do well enough for declamation, but he denied to them the force of argument.

They had been told, with an air of triumph, that Grand Juries were a relic of barbarous ages ; that they originated centuries ago, and were instituted to maintain the power of the crown ; and that they had been used as a pliant tool in the hands of power ever since, to restrain and limit human freedom. Their origin concerned not this Convention. Who, in estimating the value of the giant oak, that for centuries had braved, unscathed, the tempest, would think of delving at the root for the acorn that rotted a thousand years ago in giving it birth ? Who would refuse the shelter of its branches, because in times gone by the wild savage had bound his victim to the stake beneath their shadow ?

He would repeat, that it concerned not this Convention to know what was the origin of the system, or to what base uses it might have been perverted, in past ages and other countries. It was for them a plain, practical question, for the solution of which they had the light of more than half a century's experience, and that experience was worth more to them than all the history of all the world beside.

These were the principal objections which had been urged against the present system, and he would here take occasion to say, that without devoting to the subject a tithe of the time which some gentlemen had expended in hunting up objections to the Grand Jury, he felt no hesitancy in saying, that he could array more and better founded reasons, why the petit jury and the habeas corpus should be abolished, than any that had been yet advanced for the adoption of the pending resolution. Imperfection was a necessary attendant of all human laws ; and it was much easier to point out defects in existing institutions, than to suggest a more perfect substitute. The first, gentlemen had perhaps done; in the last, in his opinion, they had signally failed.

He was not wedded to the past—not one of those whom his youthful friend from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) accused of belonging to a past age—nor was he young enough to seek the destruction of everything old, merely because it came down to us with the hoar of antiquity stamped upon its features.

If there was any one thing which it behooved this Convention sedulously to guard against, it was that restless love of change, merely for the sake of change, which was characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race, and especially that portion of it who were located on this side of the Atlantic. It had been frequently remarked by writers, both of our own and other nations, that our fathers in the Revolution in nothing displayed more wisdom, than in the few changes which they made in the internal government of the country. It was the sovereign alone that was changed; and the citizen of the republic died under the laws of the monarchy under which he was born. It has also been remarked as in striking contrast, that the leaders of the French Revolution sought to change everything, from the most trivial rule of law up even to the worship of the Deity—even the reckoning of time, weights, measures—everything old had to be done away, that modern wisdom might supply its place. The results which followed the two revolutions are the best commentaries upon the respective policy which governed them. The one was the foundation of the freest government the world has ever seen: the other led through anarchy to anarchy's sure successor, despotism.

He would repeat, that, for one, he had not lived long enough to dispense with the wisdom of the past. Especially did he look back with reverence upon the acts and opinions of our Revolutionary fathers; those men who first dared the untried experiment of republicanism.

He was not much in the habit of quoting the opinions of others to sustain him in any position he sought to defend; but there was among the proud names of American history one to whose opinions we had always been accustomed to listen with deference. That man was Thomas Jefferson; and he had told us that no nation could be enslaved, between whose liberties and the sovereign stood Grand and Pettit Juries, and that that nation which had them not, held its liberties by but a frail tenure; that if the people were to be excluded from a participation in either the legislative or judiciary department of government, he would prefer them excluded from the former in preference to the latter.

He repeated, that he was always prepared to listen with deference to the opinions of such men; and when gentlemen here would go back for their quotations to the source of the mighty stream of republicanism which is now sweeping onward like the tide of destiny, promising ere long to cover the whole earth, he, for one, was prepared to listen with pleasure, and to give everything from such a source the weight to which it was entitled.

But when gentlemen busy themselves in raking together the froth and scum cast upon the shores to-day by that same mighty but troubled stream, he, for one, was disposed to grant to what they might thus rake up, neither the force of precedent nor the dignity of argument.

He would repeat that he had not lived long enough to learn to disregard the teachings of the past; and whenever he found himself differing in opinion with the sages who framed our government, he was always disposed to hesitate, and con over again the arguments by which he had reached his conclusions.

He had said before that it matters but little when or where Grand Juries originated; but there was one fact to which he would not shut his eyes, that wherever the standard of human freedom had been raised, and the battle fought and won, Grand Juries would be found a constituent part of the government. It is in company with human freedom that we find it in all the past. The one has never existed without the other. Should we try the doubtful experiment of separating what ages had cemented together?

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe next addressed the Convention. He said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have but a few remarks to make, and I confess that it is with diffidence that I arise to say one word upon the subject; for the Convention must be already wearied with the length of this day's session, and the gentleman who preceded me has exhausted almost all the arguments upon the side of the question which I take. It is my misfortune, sir, to differ upon this subject with my colleague (Mr. Pettit). This is one of the questions upon which we divided in the canvass before our constituents—he taking honestly and earnestly the side which he has here advocated, and I the opposite side. I am opposed to the resolution, first, because I believe it to be contrary to the genius of our institutions. And, sir, nothing could prove to me more clearly the fickleness of human reason, than the arguments which have been offered here upon this question.

I understand this provision of the Constitution (for the establishment of Grand Juries) to be placed in our bill of rights for the security and protection of the citizen. I regard this provision as an essential feature of free government. It was thought by our fathers to be of so much importance that when it was omitted in the Federal Constitution, they considered it necessary to provide for it a place in that instrument by way of amendment. Now if the wise men who laid the foundations of our government—if the wise men both of our own country and of the government of Great Britain, have so long regarded this matter as essential to protect the rights of the individual, it would seem to me that we might very well doubt the correctness of the judgment and reasoning of those who have assailed it as an engine of tyranny, and an anti-American institution designed for the purposes of oppression and injury.

I take it that the most of the objections which have been made to this system are objections to its abuse and not to its use; objections springing from the bad administration of our criminal law. Under the administration of our system, we have provided that the prosecutor shall be best paid for the prosecution of the smallest offenses; and it has been customary in all the counties of the State, for this reason, to elect to the office of prosecuting attorney some individual of little or no experience in the practice of law. The persons selected for that office were generally the worst lawyers in the State, to whose hands were entrusted this branch of the execution of the laws—it being provided that they should be remunerated for their services, only by fees, to be paid by the individual prosecuted; and it happens generally, that the persons who are able to pay those fees are only such as would be guilty of trifling offenses; consequently this provision affords a temptation to prosecute vigorously those who are guilty of the smallest crimes. This was one of the reasons why the Grand Jury system had been brought into disrepute. But now, the office of prosecuting attorney ought to be made equal, in point of respectability, with that of the circuit judge. It should be filled by a man of equal talents, and he should be paid an equal salary. If this were the case the people would no longer have to complain that some individuals were hunted up and punished more industriously than others.

Now, Mr. President, I regard this as a simple and plain remedy for so much objection as that made to the Grand Jury system. The gentlemen who object to this system have not shown us how the liberty of the American citizen can be made more secure if it be abolished. They have not shown us that his liberty or his character will be more secure in the hands of a single justice, or a single prosecutor than they would be in the hands of a jury. If, in preferring a charge against a man, the concurrence of twelve men is necessary—men acting under a solemn oath—is it not obvious to all that they would not be so likely to conspire in charging a man with a crime as a single individual would be to abuse his authority? Why, sir, do we not all know that before a man can be falsely charged in our country, under our system, the prosecutor himself must act in collusion with the Grand Jury. They too must violate their oaths and maliciously present an individual for trial against whom they have not sufficient evidence to create a presumption of guilt.

And, Mr. President, let me inquire what would be the effect of the abolition of this system in case we should ever happen to fall upon troublesome times, such as characterized the revolution in our parent country? If we should happen to be placed in such a position, when men's passions might be excited, the laws violated, and revenge and usurpation take the place of fraternity and equality, what protection would an individual have against the usurpations of the dominant party? Suppose you place the power of lodging an information in the hands of the prosecuting attorney, see you not that he is elected by the dominant party—the party seeking to enforce its power over the opposing one. Now, sir, supposing there were political troubles, would not the citizen be far more in danger from the political authority of the State if there were no power intervening between him and trial, except the prosecutor, than he would be when the power of presenting him for trial was committed to a jury of his fellow-citizens, twelve of whom must concur on their oath in saying that there was just ground to charge him with guilt? Sir, the answer to the question is obvious.

Mr. President, my colleague caused to be read extracts from an English paper, in which this system was assailed as being inefficient, and suggesting that it should be abolished. Let it be remembered, however, sir, that this is only proposed so far as regards the city of London, where there are police courts constantly open. The proposition was by no means for its entire abolition throughout the country. It is asserted in that paper that the examinations which take place in the police courts are much more certain in their operation, and much more satisfactory than they would be if taken before a Grand Jury. Now, even admitting that this may be the case in regard to the city of London, and even in regard to all large cities if you please, it by no means follows that the same result would be achieved among the scattered population of Indiana. We have no police courts, with regular police magistrates, having jurisdiction over offences. All we have of this kind are our ordinary justices of the peace who may hear a charge and hold a party to bail to answer before another tribunal, and the inefficiency of this system has been abundantly shown by the gentleman who preceded me. I do not mean to say that I object to it as far as it goes, but it certainly would be inefficient as an independent system.

Mr. President, the great object of government in the first place, is the protection of human rights. It was for this purpose that governments were first instituted; and any arguments of economy by which it can be shown that it would be cheaper to do away with any safeguard of this kind, would apply with equal force against the necessity of maintaining governments at all. Such being the primary object of all governments it is clear that there can be no security for human rights unless crimes are punished. But courts of justice, Mr. President, are sources of great expense, and, on the same ground of economy, ought to be abolished. Sir, we all know that there must be tribunals for the punishment of crimes. We all know that there must be authorities who will present criminals to be punished; and, though it might be possible to substitute a cheaper system than courts of justice, yet who can doubt that it would be bad economy in the matter of government? Why, sir, when once you establish that principle, you throw mankind back into an entire state of nature and isolation. No man will then care to exercise his industrial powers, because no man will feel secure in his house, in his liberty, or in his person, unless there be not only laws to punish those who violate rights, but efficient means to carry those laws into execution. This argument of economy, therefore, may be applied against the necessity of all government whatsoever, and cannot, and ought not to have any weight as against one of the great safeguards of our liberty.

Now, Mr. President, it is important in cases of crime, that men be satisfied that the criminal is not only fairly and properly brought before a tribunal, but also that he is fairly and honestly punished, when he is convicted. It is argued that nineteen-twentieths of all the persons indicted for felony, where the indictment originates with the Grand Jury, escape conviction. This is not the fault of the system of presentments. But it is because our law, very properly, does not regard an indictment by a Grand Jury as a trial. It regards it only as a charge that there is a probability of guilt, while at the same time, the law holds that a man is fully and entirely innocent, until he is proved guilty beyond a doubt. On the final trial, the law will not admit that there is any suspicion of guilt, but demands that there shall be proof of it beyond all question. Now, I say that it is important in all governments that the people themselves, who are the subjects of government, should be satisfied that the powers exercised over them are justly and fairly exercised. They must be satisfied that the presentation of persons accused of crimes, is properly and honestly made—made with a view to the promotion of public justice. They must be satisfied that laws prohibiting certain acts are necessary for the public good, and necessary for the protection of individual rights, otherwise they will not be willing to aid in the execution of such laws. Now, I contend that every individual in the community, is far better satisfied with the presentation of an individual by a Grand Jury, under the direction of a court, with the aid of the prosecutor, than he would be that the prosecution should proceed upon the oath of a single individual, or the information of a single officer.

Some gentlemen had objected to the Grand Jury system on the ground that it is a hoary headed system, and have proceeded to argue as if, because it is ancient it must necessarily be wrong. Why, do gentlemen suppose that truth is a novelty, and that they invent it? On the contrary, truth is eternal; truth always existed. Men may not always have perceived it, and it may be a novelty to a man when he does first perceive it; but because a truth has been known and acted upon for four thousand years, it does not, therefore, cease to be a truth. It is no argument, then, against an institution, or against truth that it has stood the test and examination of men of various ages and countries. On the contrary, it is evidence that men's reason everywhere have conceded it to be a truth. There are many truths embodied in the common law, which existed far anterior to the common law itself. There are many truths which have always been recognised as truths, and that have been acted upon wherever there was a government among men; and it is not our business to overthrow these truths, and reject them because the experience of ages has sanctioned and admitted them.

Mr. President, it has been urged as an objection to the Grand Jury system, that it was used in support of the British crown. The gentleman from Wayne used the argument very properly. He said he traced it to its origin. I do not know whether he did or not; but in England the "crown" is to the British government, what "the people" are to this Government. It represented the power of the State; and if I have read aright the history of the feudal system, there was a period in the history of Great Britain, and indeed of all the nations of Europe, when the crown did truly represent the people, when the crown was the protector of the people, in short when the crown was the State. In the feudal ages of Europe, all the great lords had jurisdiction in their principalities. The only power which represented the state was the king. He was the representative and the protector of the people. It was the crown which granted to the burgesses the privilege of towns and cities and corporations; which secured to these individuals the rights of freedom against the feudal lords; and by the intervention of the crown operating in favor of the people against the feudal system, the germ of civil liberty was established. In that manner the House of Commons, representing the people, arose. I say, therefore, that gentlemen have traced this system properly to the crown; for the crown was to the State then, what the people are to the State now. The crown then undertook to protect the citizens in the enjoyment of those rights, which had been guarantied to them; and so now do the people, in whom our sovereignty resides, undertake to protect the rights of the citizens of this State, as they are guaranteed to them in our Constitution and laws; and among other things, they have undertaken to punish all offences committed against the rights of individuals, whether as regards their persons or their property. The people in their sovereign capacity, have undertaken to punish all crimes, and this (the Grand Jury system) is one of the steps by which they proceed to that punishment.

Now, the gentleman who preceded me very properly said that the weak had no protection except in the law; that the law was devised to protect the weak against the strong, because the strong were able to protect themselves. This is unquestionably the very purpose of the law. Now, I understand my colleague to say that a Grand Jury was the engine of the great man in his county or neighborhood. I think the very reverse, and regard it as the protection of the weak man against the strong one in the county.

For what purpose is a Grand Jury summoned? Why, sir, it is to inquire, among other things, whether the great man has committed a crime, whether the strong man has trespassed upon the rights of the weak, whether the rich man has trampled upon the rights of the poor, and to present all such without fear, or favor, or affection. It is, therefore, emphatically an institution which is the refuge and protection of the weak against the strong. One of the greatest glories of our institutions is that there is no man so high as to be above the law; no man so low as to be beneath its protection; that the law is supreme, above all, and that it provides protection for all. As I have already intimated, if we were to fall upon troublesome times, if crimes were perpetrated partaking of the nature of treason, if offences against the State were to be committed, we all know that under our system, the majority would elect all the officers, both those required to prosecute such offences, and those required to carry the decisions of a court into execution; and who is there that knows not that, when the public mind is inflamed, the officers of justice themselves will partake of the prejudice, if there be any; and in a case like that, what protection would a man have who might be accused of offending against the State. What prosecutor would resist the public opinion? Would not a jury of the county—those citizen sovereigns, who are not responsible to any tribunal, but responsible only to their country and their God—be far less likely to act unjustly, arbitrarily, or tyrannically, than a mere prosecutor, who was the instrument of the majority, and who was elected by the dominant party? Yes, sir, and though it seems very improbable that any such state of things will rise in this country—and I hope in Heaven, that such a calamity is very far from us, yet it is not wholly impossible. Such a state of things has heretofore existed in our own Revolution, and in the revolutionary times of our Anglo Saxon ancestors, in England. If I read history aright, it was by means of "information" that the bloody-minded Jeffries enacted his bloody executions for political offences. It was not through the intervention of Grand Juries that the patriots of that period were murdered under the sanction of law. The English spirit would have rebelled against it, as it frequently did rebel when juries refused to be brow-beaten into the finding of verdicts to suit the pleasure of the court.

Mr. PETTIT. If my friend will allow me, I will correct him in regard to a matter of history. The "bloody assizes," as they are called, were conducted by eighteen grand jurors. Jeffries put no man to death against whom an indictment had not been found by a Grand Jury.

Mr. CLARK. I am not so thoroughly versed either in the history of those times, or in legal lore, as to speak very positively on this subject, but my impression is, that the history is as I have stated it. At any rate, in the celebrated trial of the five bishops who refused to read the King's proclamation, I think the proceeding was by information, and not by indictment. They were not indicted at all, but were proceeded against by the King's officer, and by the King's command. Those who are familiar with the history of that trial, will unquestionably remember how the feelings of a British Jury were aroused, and that a glorious triumph was achieved for freedom over arbitrary power. It may be that I was mistaken in regard to the victims of the "bloody assizes." If so, it should be remembered that a Grand Jury was the only power which stood between the subject and the power of the monarch, and that under the influence of those institutions of which the Grand Jury system lies at the foundation, the spirit of that people was roused to the assertion of their rights, and the world knows how gloriously they triumphed, and overthrew that despotism.

Now Mr. President, a few words upon the subject of the secrecy of the Grand Jury system. Gentlemen say that a Grand Jury is in the nature of a secret inquisition; that it holds its sessions in secret, for the purpose of aiding the malice, and the enmity of those who wish to injure their fellow-citizens, and they would, therefore, have all the accusatory proceedings in public; and it is proposed to make a kind of history of these proceedings, and to file them in the clerk's office. Now, however secrecy may occasionally be used as an engine of malice, it is designed for no such purpose here. On the contrary, its very object is benevolence, for it is designed to conceal from the eye of the public those investigations which do not result in a charge against the individual. It is designed to screen the individual who might be suspected of crime, but against whom there was not sufficient evidence to create a probability of guilt. Now, sir, on the other hand it is proposed that all the testimony that can be had against an individual shall be taken down; and when it is taken down, a record is to be made of it, and it is to be kept in the office of the Clerk of the county, there to stand forever as a record of suspicion against the individual. The whole causes of suspicion will thus be placed before the world, and individual character will be infinitely more injured by that system than it can be by the present. Well, sir, before a Grand Jury you have also the very same prosecutor to make a charge which you would have, if all the preliminary investigations were made before justices of the peace. If you can entrust a prosecutor with this high authority, without the concurrence of a Grand Jury, why does he not correct the improper action of the Grand Jury itself, when holding its secret sessions? Why, gentlemen here distrust the very man in whom they are willing to invest this great authority. They say, that although he has sworn to do his duty, he had not done his duty; that he has colluded with the Grand Jury; that he and they have sat as a secret inquisition, seeking maliciously to traduce the characters of their fellow-citizens.

Mr. President, I contend that experience shows, that unless you have a Grand Jury, or something equivalent to it—some tribunal whose duty it is to enquire into the commission of crimes, and present the suspected offender, then all manner of offences will go unpunished. My colleague stated what was true in regard to what we experienced in our own town, in relation to the prosecution of minor offences—that many offences which were committed, and which were not brought before a Grand Jury, were never brought before any tribunal at all; and that the offenders were consequently allowed to escape unpunished. There must, therefore, be some power, some tribunal, whose duty it is to present offenders; and when it is made their duty by law, the citizens do not resent it. They do not oppose their action, but, on the contrary, they regard them as performing their solemn duty, and they require of them that they should perform it. On the other hand, if an individual undertakes to do that which belongs to the public authorities to do, it is regarded as a malicious prosecution. The man who is prosecuted regards it with resentment, and it engenders enmity and ill-feeling between the friends both of the prosecutor and the prosecuted. Widely different is the case where duties devolve upon parties under a well ordered system of law. No man complains of the jury who tries him for his life, knowing that they are compelled to sit and decide upon his case. Every man knows that such a duty is an unpleasant one, and that it is imposed upon jurors by law; but if that same jury and court, as in the case of a mob, should take upon themselves voluntarily to decide upon his guilt or innocence, then he would feel a spirit of revenge, and a spirit of enmity would unavoidably spring up between the accused and the accusers. I say, therefore, that there must be some power in whose hands this duty may be intrusted; and I also say that it cannot, with safety to the public interest, be entrusted to the hands of any individual.

Mr. President, there are many gentlemen much more able to discuss this question than I am, and I will not, therefore, exhaust the time of the Convention by extending these remarks any further.

Mr. BASCOM said he did not rise to prolong the discussion on this question, and with the permission of the Convention he would withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN offered the following as an amendment to the resolution:

“Strike out all after the word, resolved, and insert the following:—

“1. That the public will shall not be restricted by unnecessary limitation of the legislative power.

“2. That the manner of preferring and the mode of prosecuting a criminal accusation are matters purely legislative, and should be left to the legislative department of the government.

“3. That the committee on criminal law be instructed to omit the words ‘indictment, presentment, or impeachment,’ where the same occur in sections twelve and thirteen of article first of the old constitution.”

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the amendment by inserting the words, “to inquire into the expediency of,” so as to make it a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PETTIT. I was about to submit a motion, if no other gentleman wishes to address the Convention on the subject, this evening, and that is, that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed for four, five, or ten days.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No, no, no. Vote, vote.

Mr. PETTIT. If any gentleman wishes to address the Convention I will not make the motion.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Adjourn; adjourn.

Mr. BIDDLE. I think the question ought to be decided upon the merits of the resolution. I have something to say on the subject, but I am not quite prepared to address the Convention this evening. As so much debate has been had upon the subject, I think it might be as well to proceed with the consideration of the resolution now as to postpone it for five or ten days. But I am well satisfied that I could not obtain the ear of the Convention to-night for my remarks, and as I do not wish the resolution to go to a vote upon its merits without having an opportunity of saying a few words, I will move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the affirmative, and The Convention accordingly adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Oct. 23, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. AMES.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. CRAWFORD announced the arrival of his colleague, ALEXANDER B. CONDUIT, the delegate from the county of Morgan, and, the county of Morgan being called by the Secretary, Mr. CONDUIT appeared, presented his credentials, received the oath at the hand of Judge BIDDLE, and took his seat.

THE SCHOOL FUND.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington moved a suspension of the order of business, to enable him to introduce a resolution of inquiry, directed to the committee on education, and requiring prompt action.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley proposed to amend the motion so as to suspend the rules for the reception of resolutions of reference merely, for half an hour.

The amendment was agreed to, and the motion, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a provision in the amended Constitution, requiring that the proceeds from the sales of all lands which have been or may hereafter be granted by the United States, to this State, for common school purposes; and the proceeds of all lands or other property, given by individuals, or appropriated by the State, for like purpose; and the proceeds from the sales of all lands that have been or may be hereafter granted to this State, and which shall not be granted for any other specific object, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest and increase of which, together with the rents of all such lands as may remain unsold, shall be inviolably appropriated, and annually applied, to the maintenance of common schools, and to no other purpose whatever.

Mr. WALPOLE proposed the following amendment, to be added to the resolution, which was read by the Secretary, to-wit:

That the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abrogating so much of section number two of article number nine of the present Constitution of the State, as contemplates "a general system of education, ascending in a regular gradation, from township schools to a State university," under the patronage of the State.

Mr. WALPOLE explained briefly the object he had in view in proposing this amendment. In the 2d section of the 9th article of the present Constitution of the State, he said, it was prescribed that the Legislature should provide for a general system of education, ascending in a regular gradation, from township schools to a State university. His object was to transfer all the seminary fund, consisting of fines and forfeitures, and all the funds by law appropriated on account of seminaries of learning, including the State university, to the support of district schools. The resolution merely directed the committee to inquire into the propriety of so transferring these funds. But, at the request of the gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Morrison,) he withdrew the amendment, not wishing to embarrass the original proposition, giving notice that he would offer a series of resolutions upon the subject of the amendment, at some future day.

Mr. MORRISON'S resolution was then adopted by unanimous consent.

PUBLICATION OF THE DEBATES IN THE NEWS-PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the principal Secretary, enclosing his correspondence with the publishers of the Indiana State Journal and the Indiana State Sentinel, with reference to the publication of the Convention Debates, which was read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Oct. 22, 1850.

HON. GEO. W. CABR,

President of the Convention,

SIR: In accordance with the resolution, adopted on the 19th inst., in relation to publishing the proceedings of the Convention in the Journal and Sentinel of this city, I have the honor to state that I have this day received the following communication from the editors of said papers, in reply to a letter addressed them on the 19th inst., enclosing a copy of the resolution in question.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. ENGLISH, Sec. C. C.

INDIANAPOLIS, Oct. 22, 1850.

WM. H. ENGLISH, ESQR.,

Secretary of Convention,

DEAR SIR: In reply to your note of the 19th, in relation to the publication of the debates in our respective papers, we have to say that we agree to the proposition made by the Convention.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN D. DEFREES,
AUSTIN H. BROWN.

On motion, by Mr. WOLFE, the communication was laid upon the table.

UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

Mr. HAWKINS offered for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by a clause in the new Constitution, "that a majority of the legal votes of this State at a general election, by a direct vote upon the subject, may extend the right of universal suffrage."

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. KELSO. According to our general understanding of the right of universal suffrage, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but if it be the intention of the mover of the resolution to extend the right of suffrage to females and negroes, I am against it. "All free white male citizens over the age of twenty-one years;"—I understand this language to be the measure of universal suffrage: that there shall be no property qualifications, no religious tests, and so I understand the mover of the resolution. I do not wish to detain the Convention. If I do not understand the gentleman aright, he can easily say so.

Mr. HAWKINS. I do not see any necessity for gentlemen being so sensitive. From time to time there have been resolutions, though not exactly of this character, introduced and adopted by this body without objection; resolutions (of inquiry, to be sure) prohibiting not only the right of universal suffrage, but even the right of immigration. This, also, is simply a resolution of inquiry, and if the subject shall be reported against by the committee, I shall be content; but if I can get a report in its favor, it will be another testimony in favor of that democracy which is fast diffusing itself throughout the world. No man can deny that it is a democratic rule or maxim, that a majority of the legal voters of the State have a right to decide who shall be admitted into partnership with them in the direction and administration of public affairs. I admit that the present Constitution is a contract or agreement between the white male population of the State over the age of twenty-one years, and that the Constitution which we may send out (if accepted) will be a compact between such white male citizens; but if the people, who are the contracting parties to that compact, should choose so to do, ought they not to have the right to admit others into that compact? The gentleman by this time, I suppose, understands me to mean that a majority of the legal voters of the State have the right at any time, by their own will, to call upon the colored population to assist them in the administration of public affairs. I say amen to this doctrine. It is an inherent right belonging to all free governments.

Mr. HOVEY proposed to amend the resolution by inserting, in the proper place, the words "except negroes, mulattoes and indians."

Mr. COLFAX said, that he was desirous of a vote on the original proposition, and would therefore, move to lay the amendment of Mr. Hovey on the table;

And upon this motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMONSTON enquired of the Chair if it would be in order to move to amend the motion to lay the amendment on the table so as to include the original resolution?

Mr. BORDEN. What would be gained by an amendment to the motion? The questions would have to be taken separately if a division were demanded.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to amend is not in order.

Mr. COLFAX. I would ask how a motion to lay on the table can be amended? For after the motion to lay on the table has been entertained, no person can obtain the floor until that question is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already decided that the motion to amend is not in order. The question is upon the motion to lay the amendment to the resolution upon the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

The yeas and nays being taken, the Secretary reported—yeas thirty-six, nays one hundred and five, as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Vermillion, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Kendall of Warren, Kindley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, Morgan, Mowrer, Niles, Ritchey, Watts, and Wheeler—36.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warlick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogen, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Ariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

So the Convention refused to lay the amendment upon the table.

The PRESIDENT announced the expiration of the half hour suspension of the consideration of the special order.

PETITION FOR A NEW COUNTY.

Mr. ROBINSON asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Convention to present the petition of sundry citizens of Decatur, Jennings, Ripley, and Bartholomew counties, asking the Convention to authorize the formation of a new county out of certain territory of said counties, described upon a diagram accompanying the petition; and moved that it be referred to a select committee, to consist of the delegation from these counties.

The petition having been read by the Secretary,

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought it due to these petitioners, the citizens of those counties, that their paper should be referred to a select committee consisting of their own delegates. I am not, continued Mr. R., prepared to say that I would vote in favor of the principle contained in the petition. I do not suppose that any member whom I have designated for that committee would be willing, nor do I conceive that this Convention would be willing to take up and consider the subject of the organization of counties. All that that committee could do, or rather all that I would do, as a member of that committee, would be, simply to report a proposition authorizing any future Legislature, if they should see proper, to provide by law for the organization of a new county out of the territory named in the petition, and described in the diagram. Permit me to say further, that I understand that my colleague (Mr. Foley) is in possession of a remonstrance against this petition, and my object is to get the petition in the hands of the parties interested, together with the remonstrance, so that when they shall make their report, it shall settle the question. I only wish to see that the people whom I represent, and who are interested in this matter, shall have an opportunity of being heard. What course I may pursue upon the subject, I am not yet prepared to say. Generally, I am against propositions to change county seats. But any gentleman who will look at the diagram, will readily perceive the hardships which these petitioners suffer on account of the peculiar locations of which they speak.

Mr. SPANN. I have some doubt about the propriety of sending this petition, by itself, to a select committee; but as I know that there are other petitions here which will be presented, I presume that it will be proper enough to raise the committee.

Mr. PRATHER. I have no objections to the select committee proposed; but I am aware that there are various petitions and remonstrances upon this subject in my county and in the county adjoining; therefore, I move to lay the petition on the table for the present. After all the petitions and remonstrances shall have come in, then they can be taken up, all at once, and referred to a select committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion. I assure him that I will not press the consideration of the subject until we shall have the most ample opportunity for deliberation.

Mr. PRATHER withdrew the motion.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I think we should not provide, in the Constitution itself, for any special legislation. My opinion is decided, that this matter should be referred to the general committee on county organization. I hope that this petition, and all the others which may be presented on the same subject, will take that direction.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. READ. Yes sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to make an inquiry. If I understand the rules, the mover of the proposition is constituted, for the time, a member of the general committee to which it may be directed?

The PRESIDENT. He is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I am content, and withdraw my motion.

The petition was then referred to the committee on county and township organization.

Mr. FOLEY asked and obtained leave to present a remonstrance on the same subject; which, by unanimous consent of the Convention, was referred to the same committee.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now resume the consideration of the special order, viz.: the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) directing the committee on the organization of the courts of justice to report a proposition for the abolition of the Grand Jury system. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) proposing to make it a resolution of inquiry. Upon this question, the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BIDDLE then rose and said, that last evening the Convention had conceded to him the floor for this morning, and he did not intend to abuse the privilege they had so generously granted to him. He would be brief in the remarks which he was about to offer. He should not have addressed the body at the present time, but he feared the question was in danger; therefore he preferred to do his duty in the case, as far as it might be in his power. He did not expect, by any considerations which he might offer, to change the well-settled opinions of a body of men so experienced as this; but in the language of his venerable friend from Wabash, (Mr. Steele,) if he fell, he preferred to fall in the discharge of his duty.

He supposed the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) had found out by this time that the mover of this resolution was quite in earnest. He could tell that gentleman that the mover of this resolution was always in earnest. He was a man who held his opinions free as air, and was never at a loss fearlessly to express them; from his knowledge of the man, he was convinced at first that he was really in earnest. He felt some embarrassed in this debate, from the fact that he was compelled to differ with that gentleman, who was chairman of the committee upon which he had the honor to be placed. But as one independent thinker was apt to respect the opinions of another, he doubted not that the independence of this gentleman had taught him the same lesson. The gentleman had presented the question fairly in debate, and he (Mr. B.) intended to meet it fairly; therefore, he invited the special attention of the reasoning ear of the body. He addressed himself especially to that large class of silent thinkers who were not so much in the habit of engaging in debate. He made this appeal, and particularly to this large class of members, because he knew that all those who debate more were apt to have their minds tinged with a desire that the question should carry, and could not approach it with a feeling of entire impartiality. He appealed to that class who were not warmed with debate, to hold fast to their common sense and understanding, so that they might decide dispassionately, for the reason that they compose the largest portion of the Convention, to whom every appeal here of right ought to be made. He would also respectfully ask the attention of his professional brethren. He conjured them that they should not be prejudiced in their minds. He knew that amongst lawyers, there was a feeling of disallowance toward persons interfering in such matters, who are not learned in the profession, and experienced in the administration of justice. With reference to one branch of the administration of justice, he was of the same feeling with them. He did not wish or expect to see any person authorized to expound the law, who was not professionally a learned man. But those who were called upon to decide upon mere facts need not be professionally learned. They were now upon the consideration of a question involving the decision of facts. Then he appealed to his professional brethren, that they should be sure in making up their minds, to do so without this professional bias. He made these appeals because he trusted that what he might be able to say might not be altogether unprofitable; but as he before said, he did not expect materially to effect the settled opinions of experienced men; they were all (if he understood the object of debate) to bring in their contribution of knowledge to one common stock, and allow everything of value to have its due weight.

He labored under another disadvantage: this question had been debated by many gentlemen, and with much force; and whatever he might say, would come as the pattering of the last drops of rain after the storm had past, or as the murmuring zephyr succeeding the hurricane. But truth might come in whispers, and error might take even the voice of thunder. He felt that a cause, vital to the interests of the people, was in jeopardy, and therefore he wished to be heard, not for himself, but for his cause.

He would now proceed briefly to note some of the arguments in favor of the resolution. The first was that of the gentleman from Porter, (Mr. Anthony,) who advanced it as an argument against Grand Juries, that they were expensive—that they cost nearly as much as the courts. He should not dwell upon this argument. Every free government was expensive. They could not be maintained without expense—expense of time, and money, and often the blood of their supporters. He was not here upon a question of dollars and cents, but upon a question of principle, which, if impaired by this body, would strike a blow at the liberty of the citizen—that liberty which was inherent in this government. Barbarous nations could be governed without Grand Juries. They required not the care, and attention, and learning, which was necessary for the government of a civilized community. People in the higher walks of civilization could not be governed without expense. A Red Jacket, or a Black Hawk, or an Osceola, could govern without much expenditure in money. Only a few bowie-knives and tomahawks were necessary for their purposes of government.

The gentleman from Porter had stated that Grand Juries were first established to protect the citizen, or rather the subject. Here he agreed with him, and here he took grounds different from those who opposed the resolution as he did. Was it to be considered that Grand Juries were originally the creatures of the crown? It had been justly said that more than a thousand years ago, Grand Juries were found embedded in the Constitution of Great Britain. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) was right in this statement; but when that gentleman affirmed that the Grand Jury system was the creature of the crown, he took issue with him. He affirmed, on the contrary, that it never was the creature of the crown, and never was in favor with the crown. He would not say this unless he thought he was right. He would not purposely throw out any crude opinions in such a place as this. His timidity would not allow him to do so. It was one question to affirm that the system was the creature of the crown, but to say whether or not it was able always to withstand the corruptions of the crown was quite a different question. The criminal jurisprudence of Great Britain was under the care of the attorney general and the master of the crown-office. They were creatures of the crown, but the crown was not the founder of Grand Juries. It was at a time when these officers of the court were anxious about the crown, and cared nothing about what the subjects might do to one another; but were especially careful about what the subject might do to the crown—then it was, that the sturdy yeomanry first made their presentments in a manner the Grand Juries now do; and this they continued to do, until the system shot its roots so deep into the British Constitution, that the crown could not eradicate it. The history of the system showed clearly that it never was the creature of the crown, and that the crown never was supported by it. He made this statement with deliberation and care. He was not materially differing from others who opposed the resolution; but he objected to their silence in the face of such charges upon the Grand Jury system. He objected to their silence, because it might be construed into an admission of what was not correct; for, so far from the Grand Juries having been made the creature and the prop of the crown, they grew up in spite of the crown, and fastened themselves into the constitution so firmly that the crown could not eradicate them; and in almost every instance in which the crown wished to oppress the subject, it found itself obliged to step over the Grand Jury. He would not think of charging corruption upon the Grand Jury, any sooner than upon the British subjects in general. And how could it be supposed, in the face of history, that they were ever made the willing instruments of tyranny, in the language of the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave). He must be permitted to deny the charge, with great respect, however, to the opinions of that gentleman. What was the complaint of the barons of England when they wrung the Magna Charta from the unwilling hands of King John? It was, that the crown had violated every principle of right toward the subject—affecting the subject in his life, liberty, and property, without the consent of his peers. That charter might be translated in almost the very words of the twelfth section of the first article of our State Constitution, namely: "That no person shall be put to answer any criminal charge—but by presentment, indictment, or impeachment," almost the same thing as to say, that no person shall be affected either in his life, liberty, or property without the consent of his peers. This principle embraced the Grand Jury system. Any man was affected either in his life, liberty, property, or reputation, when he was charged with crime.

Then, let gentlemen take their stand upon the true history of Grand Juries; let them not forget their usefulness because, perhaps, it sometimes might appear that the system had been perverted. Let its integrity be maintained, and let it not be blamed because it could not always withstand the powers of a corrupt crown; but give the system credit for what good it had done. He took the Charter of King John as analagous to the subject under consideration. The Constitution before this charter was obtained gave the right to the crown, or rather the right was taken by the crown, to interfere with the subject in his life, liberty, and property, without the consent of his peers; and the attempt to wrest this right from the crown was the occasion of the quarrel between it and the sturdy Barons, who at last drew their swords at Runnymede to maintain it; and they did maintain it. They obtained the charter—the same in substance which has been incorporated into our government, and which could never change in its essential features of right, until man's nature should change.

He confessed that when the gentleman from Hendricks asserted that the Grand Jury had been the willing instrument of tyranny and bloodshed, he felt a thrill pass over him—not of indignation—but of surprise, that the gentleman should have been so unaccountably mistaken. He did not say that the Grand Juries were never wrong; but he affirmed, confidently, that there could not be found a single instance in their history, in which they had been made the willing instrument of power, to do wrong. The same gentleman had affirmed, that Grand Juries were only the shadow of a shade. He did not know that he understood exactly the import of this phrase; but if he understood the position of that gentleman, it was, to take from sixteen men (the ordinary number of a Grand Jury) their power to accuse under criminal law, and to give it to one man. What amount of power then, could he claim for his substitute? If the Grand Jury was but the shadow of a shade, ought not the gentleman's substitute to be estimated as but the sixteenth part of the shadow of the sixteenth part of a shade? And this was all the power which the gentleman proposed, to resist the encroachments of the crown, or of the State, against the private rights and the liberty of the citizen.

But, to be brief. The gentleman from Hendricks made a point in his remarks in reference to the antiquated age of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden); though he (Mr. B.) trusted that many green and vigorous years were yet to pass over his head. The same gentleman affirmed that not one case out of ten of the indictments by a Grand Jury was ever prosecuted to conviction; but how he intended to apply that against Grand Juries, he was not able see. The gentleman from Tippecanoe, also, took the same ground. Well, if these gentlemen could find out any means of ascertaining whether a man were guilty or innocent, without a trial, he would give up the question, but they all knew there were none. The Omnia-cient eye might see and decide. But when we were upon the trial of an individual, before beings like ourselves, who was to be affected in his life, liberty, or property, we must always go by the slow process of induction, and allow his peers to stamp their decision upon his case with the seal of truth; and the moment any other method of trial should be attempted, that moment the rights of man would be impaired. He was not in favor of any system by which a man could thus be put in jeopardy, and convicted at once; because this would not be done by means of human testimony; and it was only when the impossibility could be achieved that there could be no indictment without conviction following.

Sir, in the court of Star Chamber, when the Crown officer, not the Grand Jury, filed the information, a conviction always followed the charge; not because the conviction was right, but because the charge was wrong.

The same gentleman had said that punishment was uncertain under the Grand Jury system, but he did not therefore, see that punishment should become more certain than at present. He supposed the difficulty must be that the Grand Jury did not present cases when they ought, or that they presented them when they ought not; all that might be the case. He did not stand here to say that Grand Juries were perfect; but to show them to be so essential to civil liberty, that they should not be abolished or impaired without returning again to the troubles out of which they originally grew up.

But, the gentleman from Hendricks had affirmed that Grand Juries were the instruments of bloodshed and tyranny; and that may have been true at sometime in their history, but they were never used in this way; as the willing instruments of power. And the gentleman from Tippecanoe made allusion to what was called the bloody assizes, under Jeffreys. They blamed them because they could not resist the power of a corrupt crown; and the history of the times shows clearly, that the Grand and Petit Juries were over-ridden by the crown. Then to say that they were willing instruments of power, for the purposes of bloodshed and tyranny was doing injustice to that ancient institution. If the gentleman had carefully traced the history of the bloody assizes, they would have found out the moral of the law. That same judge lost his head, and that same king lost his crown, when the people called a convention, resolved their government into its primary principles, and placed the crown upon the head of another. From these troubles, and out of this error of the crown, came the revolution of 1688, to which the English people still proudly point, as the main foundation of their civil liberty; and the people of England and this country were still rejoicing in the results of the efforts of the sturdy yeomanry who composed the Grand Juries of those times.

He would now pass on to the consideration of ultimate results. He doubted not that Grand Juries might be taken away from the government of the State of Indiana, and that the people might do very well for a time; but that they could be taken away without affecting the rights of the people, in some degree, he could not believe. Then, when gentlemen refer to the bloody assizes, let them not forget the results which those troubles produced.

In the opening of his remarks, the gentleman from Tippecanoe said, very truly, that long established wrongs were commonly approached by men with a feeling of timidity. Every man had experience of this feeling. He felt it himself, although he was not very much disposed to hold on to the garments of the past. But it was manifest that every change of the Constitution brought with it more or less of evil, temporarily, at least; therefore, he would never make a change in that instrument without some preponderance in favor of the change. He considered this principle, upon the whole, to be a very safe one.

He was not here to defend Grand Juries on account of their antiquity. He respected them not for their age only. It was not because this institution was ancient, but because it was valuable, that he appeared in its support, and would continue to resist every attempt to break it down or to sever it from its old and honorable associations.

It had been said that Grand Juries were created and used as a prop to the crown; he denied that also. Grand Juries had no connection with the crown at any period of their history, except as they might have been brought unwillingly into its service. They were brought into this service before the revolution of 1688, when the power of the crown triumphed over the liberties of the subject; and also under the reign of Charles II., when he undertook to govern without a Parliament. He undertook to govern without Parliament; to step over the rights of the subject; he undertook to violate, and he did violate, the great charter which resulted from the conflict with King John. That succeeded in a re-assertion and a re-settlement upon a firm basis, of the bill of rights. When English liberty was trodden down by the crown, it was when Grand Juries were over-ridden, and when the subject was trampled upon in his private rights, without the consent of his peers.

The gentleman says, (continued Mr. B.,) that this Grand Jury system is an institution which never existed in any country in the world except in Great Britain and the United States. Sir, it would be impossible for him to bestow upon the institution a higher eulogy than is conveyed in that very assertion. How he should be able to draw an argument in favor of the resolution from such an assertion surprises me to know. I repeat, that that very fact is enough for us to know, in order to form a very strong inducement for us to retain this institution. Where, on the face of the earth, will the gentleman find liberty enjoyed with such amplitude as it is here? and where, next to our own country, except under that government where this system has been represented as existing in connection with our own? Where is there anything like an approach to free government except in England and in the United States? And they, and they only, are the nations in which the Grand Jury system is maintained. The gentleman who quoted the remark of Thomas Jefferson on this subject, quoted a high authority. He said well and truly when he said that no nation could ever be enslaved where the Grand and petit Jury system existed. Sir, if you look among the nations of Europe, you will find that it is the constant struggle of the people there to have this or a similar system adopted. If I remember rightly, Louis Phillipe promised to the people of France the adoption of what was called the "jury of accusation," and the promise was hailed with acclamations of joy by every Frenchman. I will not, however, dwell upon that, but will merely remark further, that some two or three years ago the King of Prussia promised to give free government to his people, and, among other institutions, the jury system. He did not keep his promise, it is true; but we may learn enough from these examples to discover that, while other nations are struggling to the utmost to obtain free institutions, we are endeavoring to impair those that we possess, and which are the only substantial safeguards of human liberty. I am not, however, very anxious to cite foreign efforts for liberty, or to contrast the institutions of other countries with those of our own. Neither would I uphold the Grand Jury system because it is of venerable age. If it is not a good system at this time and in this place, I do not want it.

Another objection which was urged against Grand Juries by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, was, that in nineteen out of twenty cases of indictment for felony, where the indictment originated with the Grand Jury, there was no conviction. Now grant that that is true, what does it prove? I am aware that many indictments fail to result in conviction, though I am far from admitting the accuracy of the gentleman's computation. But what if felons do escape? Would it not be so under any other system? Must it not always be so, if we have any regard for human rights, so long as the mind of man is finite, and can only arrive at truth by the slow process of induction?

The gentleman (Mr. Pettit) spoke of the matter of expense, and observed that on that head the question was scarcely worth debate. There we are perfectly agreed; and I would only observe, that if the functions of our Government were carried into execution with bowie knives and tomahawks, our expenses might perhaps be curtailed; but that so long as we have a civilized Government, we must expect that it cannot be maintained without expense.

Again: the gentleman read from English newspapers to show the estimation in which this system was held by a certain portion of the press of that country; and he took occasion to say that the London Times had done more for the propagation of human liberty than all the press throughout the world besides. I am not going to stand here as the advocate of the press on this occasion, because I think the question involved in that argument has nothing to do with the question under consideration; but I must say that the press of America ought to be highly obliged to the gentleman for the compliment which is implied in his assertion in regard to the London Times, a paper which has changed its politics [with every change of administration, and has steered its course towards every point of the political compass. Certainly the American press ought to feel under the deepest obligation to the gentleman for this very flattering compliment.

Well, sir, something was also said about judges packing juries. With what design such a remark was made I really am totally at a loss to conceive, or how it could affect the value of the Grand Jury system. Does not every man know that of all functionaries connected with the administration of justice, the judges are the most powerless? The judge makes not the law, that is the business of the Legislature. He merely interprets it. He stands between the legislative and the executive departments, and his decisions in themselves are as harmless as the zephyr. He cannot execute his own decisions, but they must go to the executive before they can be executed. Why, sir, a judge has no more power to pack a jury than has any other man, and, aside from the case of the notorious Jeffreys, there is, perhaps, not another can be found in the whole history of jurisprudence of a judge attempting to exercise an undue influence over the minds of a jury. The functions of the judicial department are entirely harmless. When the decision of the judge is pronounced he can do no more; and even that decision is in many instances not his own, but already fixed by an established rule of law.

Well now what is proposed as a substitute for this system which it is proposed to abolish? The gentleman from Tippecanoe, as well as I can understand his plan, proposes that there shall be an examination before a justice of the peace; that the evidence is to be written down, and that the prosecuting attorney is to say upon an examination of the evidence whether he thinks it is likely that a conviction will follow. I do not wish to speak with the slightest disrespect of our justices of the peace. They are usually intelligent men—men of about the same grade, as it regards information and moral worth, as your grand jurors. But I hold that they are not competent to preside in a matter of this importance, not capable of withstanding the pressure from without, and of holding the law steady to the protection of the rights of the citizen. I do not blame them. The fault is not theirs, but that of the organization of their courts. They have not sufficient power. Besides they are not judges of evidence. Many of them are not acquainted with a single rule in regard to it, and could not determine what would be evidence for and what against a defendant. Let me illustrate this for one moment. Suppose that a heinous offence has been committed—say a murder—and some party, who happens to be suspected, is taken before a justice of the peace in the neighborhood. Blood is perhaps found upon his garments, or some other circumstance, which at the moment is not satisfactorily explained, tends to create an impression of his guilt. He is taken before a magistrate who is surrounded by an outraged populace demanding their victim. How is it possible that the justice should not in some measure share their feelings, and knowing nothing of the rules of evidence he lets in everything against the poor defendant, guilty or not guilty, and he is handed over to a petit jury, who are to determine the question of life and death, without any other preliminary examination than that had before a justice unacquainted with the rules of evidence, and influenced by the feeling which pervades his neighborhood. And thus it would always be; and it is not to be wondered at. The fault is not in the man, for none of us are perfect, but it is in the system. But again it is said, he is to write down the evidence. How, I would like to know, is he to do that when he does not know what evidence is? But suppose he happens to get down the evidence correctly, a case which would not happen once in a thousand times, he is to have the opinion of the prosecuting attorney to say whether that evidence will warrant a conviction. Why, sir, the gentleman in this proposition strikes at one of the fundamental principles on which the rights of the citizen are based. He wants a professional man who is versed in the rules of law to exercise a power which alone belongs to a jury; that is, to determine what are the facts in the case. Sir, it is a violation of all fundamental right; it is confounding the trial of a fact with the exposition of the law.

Why, sir, any man, if you give him assumed facts in an indictment, will tell you whether the party is guilty or not. But when a little evidence comes from A, and a little hearsay from B, and a little suspicion from C, and perhaps a little malice from D, and some vague reports that were heard by E and F, why sir, with such an amalgamation of evidence and suspicions, I defy any professional man on earth to safely say whether a man is guilty or not. His learning in such case will stand him in no hand. He is no more capable of determining in such case than the man who has never studied the profession. But, sir, were he ever so capable, it matters nothing. He is not the judge of the facts; the law has wisely provided that a man shall be tried by his peers, who, alone, are to determine as to the facts alleged; and, when you delegate this power to a prosecuting attorney, you not only put the liberty of the individual in jeopardy, but you usurp those rights which alone belong to that body of men for whose benefit alike they have been secured. Sir, give me unprofessional men to decide facts, and learned men to explain and apply rules, and then you will have a beautiful system—a system which will work admirably, and attain the ends of justice. These are the objections which I have to that part of the proposition.

The gentleman has said that Rome punished her criminals without the intervention of a Grand Jury. Sir, to my understanding the allusion to that country is a very unfortunate allusion. It is that same Rome which stabbed her Cæsar, which crushed her Cato, which pierced the tongue of her Cicero, which enslaved millions of her people, and trod with an iron heel upon the neck of woman! That is the Rome whose institutions he cites as fit for the Anglo-Saxon race to copy, in order to preserve their liberties. There can be no question that the history of Rome is highly instructive—but instructive in what? Why, sir, in her errors, for she has not a single institution which we can safely copy. She may boast of her civil law, but what is it when contrasted with our system of common law? Admitting it to be a wise code, it is yet extremely defective, and, for that reason, the country over which that civil law is spread has been continually struggling to establish the common law system of juries. Sir, in my humble judgment, the allusion to Rome was exceedingly unfortunate, and can add nothing by way of recommending the abolition of Grand Juries.

Again: the gentleman said that the Saviour was crucified without an investigation before a Grand Jury. So he was, sir; that is abundantly true; but I am at a loss to know what he would prove by the fact, and still more how he would apply the fact in sustaining the proposition he has introduced into this body. Sir, this mixing up of temporal and spiritual things is not, in my judgment, a very proper course; but if it be allowed to combine them together, or to illustrate the one by the other, I have no hesitation whatever in saying, that had the Saviour lived in any country in which the Grand Jury system prevailed, he never would have been crucified at all, because he had committed no crime. I speak, of course, of the order of human events. This, however, is a question which ought to be approached with reverence, and it would not have been referred to at all by me, had it not been for the allusion of the gentleman. Without meaning anything personal, I must say, that he appears to stop at nothing. He is a bold reasoner. His allusion to the crucifixion of our Saviour was certainly a daring method of sustaining his proposition—too daring, I think, to serve his purpose; for where is the man who will contend that had the Grand Jury system prevailed in Judea, that the crucifixion would ever have taken place; I mean by the authority of man! Sir, if the gentleman delights in crucifixions, let him use every effort he can exercise to abolish Grand Juries. The abolition of Grand Juries is the first step in the march towards the establishment of such a system of government as that under which the crucifixion took place, and I trust that this body will never take that step.

Mr. President, I have thus very hastily, and without much preparation, endeavored to answer some of the objections which have been urged against the Grand Jury system, and without detaining the Convention longer in replying to other objections which really do not appear to me to have any force, I will now say a few words explanatory of my notions of a Grand Jury. Let us inquire, first, how a Grand Jury is constituted. And here let me say to those gentlemen who have alleged that they have been the willing instruments of blood shed, that I should like them to cite an instance of the kind since the year 1688. I undertake to say that the errors of grand and petit juries never was a cause of complaint since that time. But even supposing that, in past times, Grand Juries have been what they ought not to have been, they are to-day precisely what I think they ought to be. But, as I incidentally remarked, I do not pretend that they are perfect bodies. Your judges, your governors, your legislatures, are by no means perfect. The highest functionary in this great Republic is not perfect. The American people observe the doings of their President with most watchful eyes—and why? Because, even these high functionaries have sometimes done acts which many have supposed to be worthy of reprobation. But shall we, for that reason, abolish the office of President of the United States? No man will so contend. Our presidents have been blamed infinitely more for their conduct, than ever was a grand jury in the world, and yet, who contends that therefore we should have no president? Nobody; nobody.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that Grand Juries have never erred; that is more than could be expected of any human being; but I do say that they are the most perfect functionaries known under either the British or American Constitutions, because they have less temptation to go astray, and fewer necessities of error than any other bodies.

Well, sir, what is a Grand Jury? It is a body of eighteen or twenty-three men summoned from the body of the citizens of a county. They are not summoned from one portion of a county, but come from remote quarters of it so that there can be no collusion in regard to anything that may have transpired in any given part of a county. They receive the charge of the court, which is treasured up in their minds. It was well said by one of the gentlemen who has addressed us on this question, that this is one of the modes, and an excellent one too, by which a knowledge of the laws is disseminated. They come in contact with your courts and hear the law expounded from day to day, so that, in a little time, you hardly have a man in your county who has not served as a juror, and learned something of the law. You do not call and recall the same men to serve, but you take your citizens according to a system of rotation, by which means you instruct them generally as to your laws, and the method of carrying them into execution; and thus you teach them, not only to value their government, and duly to appreciate their own rights, but also how to examine questions of truth and falsehood. Now compare these men with your justices of the peace, and see whether they are not, in their collective capacity, infinitely more able to understand and appreciate evidence, and to hold steady the rules of law. It is unquestionably so. They sit away from the excitements of passion or prejudice, and have an opportunity of calmly and dispassionately considering the question of guilt or innocence.

Mr. President, I have heard of poisonous reptiles, when goaded to madness, turning round and biting their own bodies, but I never yet have heard of a people enjoying civil liberty seeking to turn round and destroy that liberty. An enlightened people will never do so, and placing, as I believe our people do, this Grand Jury system on the same platform as they place the great charter of their rights, I am inclined to think that they will never willingly consent to give it up.

Now let me consider, for a moment, the objection which is urged on the score of secrecy. This is supposed to be a great objection. Mr. President, how strangely men's minds will differ in viewing the same subject. To my mind this secrecy is the very beauty of the system, and I undertake further to say, that, from this very secrecy are derived some of the principal benefits of the system. When gentlemen declaim against this institution on the score of its secrecy, they evidently confound the question of the trial of guilt or innocence, with a mere inquiry as to whether there are good grounds to sustain an accusation. Sir, nothing could be more shocking to all our notions of freedom, than the idea of a body of men sitting in secret session and hearing testimony with a view to conviction. But gentlemen are clearly confounding things which are totally different, and putting upon precisely the same ground the question of conviction and the mere question of accusation. Now, in regard to this matter of secrecy, let me ask, is the charge more a secret when it is laid before a Grand Jury, than it is when locked up in the bosom of the complainant, to be unfolded only to a justice of the peace? And is the judgment of twelve or eighteen men not more to be relied upon than the mere statement or affidavit of the injured party? Unquestionably it is. From motives of prudence, then, this secrecy is necessary. In the language of the gentleman from Wayne, let me ask, "who is it that fears a Grand Jury—the innocent or the guilty?" Certainly it is the guilty. The innocent go before a Grand Jury as they would go to a place of security. Instead of being a terror to the innocent, as some gentlemen would seem to argue from their holding their sessions in secret, they constitute to him a rock of safety. The honest man on his farm, or in his work-shop, reposes there with perfect security, notwithstanding all you can say to him about this "secret inquisition," because he knows that that inquisition is composed of his fellow-citizens, who are honest men, like himself, and who can have no object in perjuring themselves for the sake of working mischief to their neighbors.

No, sir, it is not the honest man who fears a Grand Jury because it holds its sessions in secrecy, but it is the criminal—the vicious. Sir, I undertake to say that no lawyer will allege that in his experience has he ever found an indictment or presentation without evidence that a crime has been committed. It may not always happen that the offense is brought home to the party; but it is the universal experience of all, that an indictment is never found without evidence of the commission of an offense. This secrecy, then, is observed as a matter of prudence, just in the same way as we would keep any other secret as a matter of prudence. It is not because there is anything wicked going on. Every bosom is more or less the repository of secrets. Every lawyer, every minister, every physician, every tradesman—every man has secrets which it would be imprudent to expose; not because there is anything wicked or dishonorable in these secrets. And it will always be found that those things which we cherish the most, are the things which we talk about the least. It is in the nature of man to do so, and this feature distinguishes the best of men as well as the worst. There cannot, therefore, be any real force in the argument which is based on the ground of secrecy.

This brings me to notice the objection which was urged on the ground that indictments do not at all result in convictions. Let me ask, how many charges under the proposed system would result in indictments? We know that not more than one-half of those cases, where parties are held under recognizances, to appear before a court, ever result in an indictment. Now, so far from the small number of convictions, in proportion to the number of indictments, being any objection to the system, is in its favor. And this would be the case still more, if these examinations were all to be made by justices of the peace, a greater proportion would thus result in acquittal. I cannot forbear to mention an instance or two; and, although, one or two instances would not go to establish a general rule, I am well satisfied that instances are sufficiently numerous to show what would be the general working of the system. Within my own experience, and that not a very long time since, I knew a medical gentleman, distinguished in his profession, who was arrested on a charge of disinterring a dead body. The circumstances of the case, were briefly these. He had two students who were studying medicine with him, and by some means or other, they procured a body from which they were anxious to obtain the skeleton. They had deposited the body, or a portion of it in the canal, for the purpose of maceration. It was discovered; and when found, was claimed by these students as their own property. He was, however, charged with the offence, before a justice of the peace, and, although, he was a distinguished man in his profession, had many warm friends, the abhorrence in which the affair was held, was such, that scarcely a friend would stand by him at the time. Here were part of the remains of a human body, it was claimed by his students, and from that the conclusion was immediately drawn, that a grave in the neighborhood had been violated. Every grave-yard was searched, but no trace of violation was discovered, as connected with the defendant. He was arrested, and brought before a justice of the peace, and held to bail in the sum of $5000—an amount which would hardly have been required in a case of manslaughter. Well, what was the evidence? simply that the remains were found in the canal, and were claimed by these two young students, which they wished to prepare to aid them in the study of their profession. Now, I did not blame the intention of the justice of the peace in such case, because participating in the popular feeling his sympathies overruled his judgment. In five or six weeks the Grand Jury met, and the charge being preferred, it was found that there was not the remotest shadow of evidence to sustain it. The charge itself, with the mode in which it was prosecuted was, to say the least of it, an outrage upon the man's sensibilities, and must leave an impression of insecurity in the breast of every one. But, gentlemen will ask what remedies have you before a Grand Jury? Why, sir, here is a remedy in this very case—the best of remedies; for where a justice of the peace hearing both sides of the case, had committed a man to take his trial, the Grand Jury hearing only one side, and that side too by no means likely to favor the accused, decided that there was no ground of accusation at all. This was his remedy. His peers, after a careful examination of all the evidence that could be brought against him, and without knowing any of the facts that could be urged in his favor, declared the charge to be unfounded.

Thus, while one man could not withstand the influence of public opinion immediately around him, and was carried away in his judgment by the torrent of human sympathy, a jury taking a calm and dispassionate view of all the culpatory evidence, decided that there was not the shadow of a ground of accusation. What, then, would a man think—how would he feel towards a Government whose institutions would secure his liberties in no better mode than that? And yet, if you abolish the Grand Jury system, such instances of error would be of every day occurrence.

Let me mention another case, which is now pending in the distant part of my circuit. It was a case in which a husband and his wife's brother were accused of murder. After the arrest of the husband and brother, the wife was also arrested, although, so far as the evidence went, she was as little concerned in the crime as any person upon this floor. What was the consequence? Notwithstanding she was in a state of pregnancy, she was committed to prison, in a very inclement season of the year. Here, now, came in the benefit of the writ of Habeas Corpus, another great principle of human liberty. What was the evidence on which this woman was committed to prison? Simply some words which the deceased had uttered the night before his death, which every man who knows anything of the rules of evidence would say at once was no evidence whatever.

It had not the faintest semblance of legal evidence. Still it was a hard struggle to obtain the woman's release before the associate judges. Gentlemen will probably ask, what has the Grand Jury system to do with such a case as this? Just this much, that they would have determined at once, that there was not sufficient evidence to put the defendant on trial, and when they had decided that, then the imprisoned party could go forth and say, "the charge has been examined by my peers, and by them I never was accused." That is the answer to every sneer that may be cast upon the wronged and unfortunate. Now strike away that security, and adopt the system which has been proposed, and I undertake to say that our liberties will become at once insecure, and our enjoyment of them in the highest degree uncertain. These are examples of the benefit of the workings of the present system, and there are enough of them, of daily occurrence, to show the danger of abolishing any of those institutions by which our rights are secured. It has been my duty to discharge many persons on writs of habeas corpus, who had been committed to answer charges, grounded on no better evidence than the prejudice of a neighborhood. And if you take away this first pillar of human liberty, you are only at the commencement of a system of aggression, which will eventually sap the entire foundation of the liberty of the citizen.

But, Mr. President, I feel that I have occupied the attention of the Convention longer than I intended, and I will conclude these desultory remarks, by appealing again to the reasoning ear of this body. I do not wish that they should hastily strike down an institution from which has flowed so many benefits. If it had nothing but age to recommend it, although from that alone it would be entitled to our respect, yet I would not contend so earnestly for it. Nay, I would even say let it go. But when gentlemen propose to remove Grand Juries from our system of criminal jurisprudence, I think it behooves them to let us see very clearly what they purpose to substitute in their place. I ask it from them; it is due to the Convention, due to the State, due to the liberty of man.

Mr. President, when I commenced these remarks I observed that I did not anticipate that anything I might say would materially alter the opinion of this Convention on this subject, yet I could not be content to let the question pass without giving my views and adding my little stock of knowledge on the subject to the common fund. I hope the Convention will consider what I have said, and that they will save me from errors if I am in error. All I ask is that this body will ponder deeply the proposition before they give their votes, and then I am sure they will be slow to remove an institution whose advantages have exhibited themselves so long and beneficially, and whose worth has stood the test of so many ages. When you convince me that kings can rule without Parliaments—that Presidents can govern without Congresses—and that Governors ought to dictate laws without the sanction of Legislatures, then I am willing to take courts without juries. I place all these examples upon the same footing. Take away juries and you take from the people that which, of all others, is most especially their privilege—the right to try facts. In the explanation of the laws, or the application of rules, I want professional men; but when I come to try facts, I want the varied and broad experience of the people. The right to accuse, as well as the right to try, depends upon facts, which it is clearly the province of a jury to determine, in both cases. Gentlemen argue that they do not purpose to do away with the petit jury system, and that a man will still be tried by his peers; but, for my part, such is my veneration for all the institutions of our country which appertain to the liberty of the citizen, that I would as soon think of abandoning the petit jury system as the Grand Jury system.

I would as soon part with the one as part with the other. What does this resolution propose? It proposes to abolish Grand Juries altogether—not to modify or alter the system, if necessity for alteration can be shown, but to do away with them utterly and forever. Were the proposition a proposition to modify, I might consent to it, but to abolishing them entirely I am utterly opposed, and shall remain of that opinion until my nature is entirely changed. I repeat, in conclusion, that this institution stands upon the same footing with others, by which our liberties are guarded, and that this will be found to be the first step towards dispensing with petit juries and the writ of "Habeas Corpus." As I have said before, so say I now. When you can convince me that Kings can rule without Parliaments, and that the twenty millions of people in the United States can be governed by one man, then I may believe that courts may dispense with juries. But until that is done, I cannot but believe that the law will be imperfectly administered by any court which has not its co-ordinate branches, and that it cannot meet the end and design of its Constitution. I assert again, that if this proposition is carried into effect, it will be a violation of the great charter of our liberties—the bill of rights, of the Habeas Corpus act, and, in short, of that divine right bestowed upon man by his Maker—the right to govern himself.

Mr. NILES rose and said: I feel sir, the weight of the responsibility that I incur in my present condition of health, in attempting to address this Convention, after two hours sitting in this Hall, on a subject of such grave importance as the one now under debate.

Mr. PETTIT suggested, that if the gentleman desired it, he had no doubt the Convention would readily postpone the subject until to-morrow morning.

Mr. NILES. I shall doubtless be able to proceed with the few remarks I have to make. I have been highly gratified, sir, at the disposition which has been manifested by members of this Convention to open the door to debate, and to permit a fair and thorough discussion of this subject.

Gentlemen who have preceded me have appropriately referred to the origin and history of the Grand Jury system. It is true, sir, that it has come down to us honored with the countenance of a thousand years, and I am sure there is not a member of this body who would inconsiderately strike at its foundations. We venerate the aged man. It is a sentiment common to every well regulated human heart. We should grow in wisdom as we grow in years. I would not undervalue the experience and lessons of antiquity. But when gentleman compare the early portions of the historic period, with the mature years and ripened mind of my friend from Wayne; it occurs to me that the truth is inverted in the comparison. We, sir, may not have arrived at the maturity of our race, but we have undoubtedly made some farther progress towards its advancing manhood, than had the people of mediæval antiquity, among whom the Grand Jury system was first established, and from whom it has descended, unchanged to us. And while I would not discard the history of the past or the experience of youth, I still hold that that history and experience are mainly useful, as they expose the errors and evils of the past, and as warnings for the future. This is no less true of states and nations than of individual men. We may well cherish the memory of our early years. But when, in the progress of our lives, we look back, as we may imagine that states are permitted to do, when Conventions of the people are called together, as we are now convened, to remodel their organic law, what should be the purpose of the retrospect? Not sir, that we may follow blindly in the same path, but that, by the memory of past follies and misfortunes we may regulate and improve our future course. And, sir, instead of matter of exultation and self complacency, who does not find in the retrospect occasion rather for repentance and reformation. He who reviews his life with other purposes, I apprehend, reads its history to small profit.

Earnestly desiring the benefit of whatever light may be derived from the history of the past. I come to the discussion of this subject oppressed with a sense of its importance, and of the responsibility that will rest upon me, for my individual vote, if given as I anticipate that it will be. I am not one of those, if there be any such, who would recklessly destroy our civil fabric or mar its fair proportions. I would not, to build a more comfortable edifice, tear down the humble dwelling in which I find shelter, and which is still my home, until a better had been provided. And I shall endeavor to act upon the same principle here.

I am fully convinced that the present Grand Jury system is defective, and that it must, at some time and in some way, be superceded. The question with me, therefore, is not mainly whether it is unsuited to this country and this age, for in that particular I concur fully with the spirit of the resolution under debate. But it is chiefly a question as to when and how it shall be dispensed with,—as to whether any better system can here, and now, or probably at no distant day, be matured and engrafted upon the institutions of the country. Before concluding my remarks, I may take the liberty of making a few suggestions as to a substitute for Grand Juries, but which may be little worthy the consideration of the Convention.

A word now as to the practical workings of the Grand Jury system, its benefits and its defects. Gentlemen contend that it has been an extremely useful part of our political institutions. I am not disposed to join issue with them on that point. It has doubtless answered a valuable purpose both in this country and in Great Britain, in former ages and to the present day. It has doubtless aided in the administration of justice, and, in the language of the gentleman from Wayne, been a terror to evil doers. It may have afforded some protection to the liberty and private rights of the citizen or subject against the power of the crown or the fury of popular excitement. But, sir, I do not agree with gentlemen that it has been the great bulwark of liberty, and the great safeguard of private rights. On the contrary, all history proves that it has often been the pliant tool of tyranny and oppression. And not, sir, because the men who have constituted Grand Juries have been less honest and worthy than their neighbors, but, as I contend, because of the inherent defects of the system under which they are organized.

Throughout its entire history in England as in its very constitution, it has been the instrument of the crown. The pannel is selected by the officers of the crown, without the knowledge or consent of parties to be accused, and without any essential right of challenge. They are sworn to keep the secrets of the crown, and to inquire into such matters as shall come before them on behalf of the crown, and none but the counsel for the crown are admitted to their conclave.

It is true that whenever hatred of tyranny should become intense, even such a body would be likely to show resistance. But when gentlemen argue that a jury drawn indiscriminately from an excited populace, would show the same resistance to the excitement under which they themselves were laboring, I cannot understand their logic. The way to the scaffold has lain through the verdicts of twelve men twice rendered. But still I submit to all thinking men who are acquainted with the bloody history of British rule, how weak a barrier have not both of those verdicts often proved. Let me not here be misunderstood. Let me not be understood as striking at or undervaluing the trial by jury—a right which I hold as sacred and to which I cling as tenaciously as does my friend from Cass. But the palladium of public liberty and private rights lies not so much in mere law—in statute books and the action of legislatures. It lies further back—it has a deeper foundation. And when the great safeguard which rests in the intelligence and integrity of government and people is lost, little protection can come from any other quarter. It is more the spirit of an age than any system of the administration of justice, which has led to crime and bloodshed in the name and with the sanction of law. My friend from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) in his eloquent eulogium upon the Grand Jury system, has remarked, of the condemnation and crucifixion of our Lord, that that condemnation could never have been pronounced in a country where grand and traverse juries were known. But in the language of another, "when goodness and truth descended from heaven to earth, what was the cry of the populace? Crucify him! crucify him!" And had a jury been necessary to his condemnation, a jury from that populace would have ratified the cry.

Mr. BIDDLE. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? I spoke of its application to man and men's affairs. The gentleman must not understand me as saying what the object of divine justice was. If it was necessary in the mind of Almighty God, that the Savior should be crucified to reconcile justice and mercy, it must have been.

Mr. NILES. I should be sorry to misconstrue the gentleman's remarks. I, of course, in speaking of this sacred subject, speak after the manner of men and would speak with all reverence and so understand the gentleman. I do not understand that men's hearts were perverted to that end. But, in that great event, I see a wonderful instance of the blended action of God's providence and human freedom. Men were permitted to act out the evil that was in them. There, was illustrated an universal principle—the same which reigned at the bloody assizes and which caused the streets of Paris to flow down with blood, during the first French revolution, not with the consent of tyrants only, but by the voice of the people themselves.

I may here remark that any argument in favor of the Grand Jury system, drawn solely from its antiquity, if it proves anything, proves too much. It is an argument which would sustain a body of hereditary legislators in Great Britain, with its bench of bishops. It is an argument which has proved a main support of old abuses. The question is not how long has it existed, but is it best adapted to the condition of society among us, here and now? To decide that it is not, I admit, involves no little responsibility.

A word now, sir, as to some of the evils of the present system. It is expensive and burdensome to the county treasuries. It is onerous upon the people who are compelled to serve upon Grand Juries. For eighteen or twenty men in each county, to be called together twice a year and kept in session, as often happens, a week or ten days, is no small tax upon the industry of the country. Still, sir, I agree with gentlemen that a free government requires more checks and balances than a pure despotism; that in the advancing stages of civilization the machinery of the body politic becomes more complex; that the simple laws and usages of savage life will not meet the wants of civilized man, and that we should cheerfully bear whatever burthens are necessary to the support of good government. But if another system can be devised equally safe and useful to all the interests of society, but far less burthensome and expensive, the saving of expense will be something in its favor.

Another to meserious objection is the secrecy which constitutes a leading feature of the present Grand Jury system. In that particular, to my mind, it smacks too much of the Inquisition and the Star Chamber. It reminds one inevitably of another and a darker age. This objection to me is so insurmountable, that by no vote of mine can I be instrumental in fastening it permanently upon the country. I was gratified to hear the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) speak with his accustomed boldness of the secret sessions of the Senate of the United States. With due deference to that illustrious body, I must say that when, in this middle of the nineteenth century, and in this country of all others on earth, they go into secret session, upon any subject, important or unimportant, I can feel for such an act, little more respect than I should feel for sixty hooded monks of the middle ages, sitting among us as the Holy Inquisition. I hold that a great and free people should do nothing which they are ashamed or afraid to do openly and in the face of all the world. Sir, such things are all in conflict with the spirit of this age. I desire that whatever affects the rights of the citizen or the welfare of the body politic should be open as the light of day.

But it has been said that secrecy is necessary to prevent the escape of parties accused. It is an undoubted fact that in nine cases out of ten of the graver offenses in which indictments are found and convictions result, the accused party is already in jail or on recognizance, when the Grand Jury meet. But if there is danger of escape, he is subject to be arrested at any moment, on the affidavit of any prosecuting witness before any magistrate. And it speaks much in favor of the law-abiding character of the American people, that cases of crime are rare, when there is no one ready to aid in bringing the offender to justice.

It has been argued elsewhere, if not here, that if the seal of secrecy is removed from proceedings before Grand Juries, causes will be prejudged in the public mind, so that an impartial traverse jury cannot be had. It is a sufficient answer to such an argument, that in a very large majority of cases, at present, public examinations do take place, before committing magistrates, without any essential effect upon the final trial. We cannot if we would, keep from the public ear, the circumstances attending the commission of crimes. But, some gentlemen say, reform the system in this respect. Sir, do away with its secrecy, and you strike a fatal blow at its most distinctive feature, at the principle which underlies it all, and which is involved in its very name.

But, there is to my mind, another objection almost equally insurmountable. It is the strictly ex parte character of the proceeding before Grand Juries. They are all on behalf of the crown, or State, and none but the counsel for the crown or law-officer of the State, are admitted to the conclave, while the jurors themselves are bound to keep them secret to the end of their lives. The party accused, is not only denied the privilege of being present, in person, or by counsel, but is kept profoundly ignorant of that which may seriously involve his liberty, or life. I hold, sir, that this is all wrong and inconsistent with the highest rights of the citizen, or the most judicious administration of the laws. I hold, sir, that there is no being who wears the human form, or possesses the attributes of our common humanity, who should be treated in such a way. However steeped in infamy, and stained with crime, I would permit him in all stages of a prosecution, to be confronted with his accusers, and to meet the witnesses against him face to face, with the privilege of cross-examination. Then he may elicit facts in his exculpation, and if witnesses, upon his final trial, make statements in conflict with their evidence upon the first examination, he has the power to prove it. Such a privilege should never be withheld. The State can afford to be manly and generous, and to give to the poor culprit, every opportunity to show that he ought not to be condemned.

The gentlemen from Cass, has well argued that no man should be accused without the consent of his peers. I meet the gentleman, on his own ground, and, even go much further. I contend, not only, that he should not be put upon trial, in a criminal proceeding, without the consent of his peers, but that the accusation should not be preferred upon a mere one-sided ex parte examination, in secret session, and where he and his counsel are forbidden to intrude. How such a plan can be less merciful or just, than the common system, I am wholly unable to imagine.

As has been forcibly remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, Grand Juries, as at present organized, are often the vehicle for personal animosities. Petty malice would shrink from the face of day, while the honest purpose to bring an offender to justice, would ask no concealment.

The gentleman from Cass, has referred with propriety and effect, to a case coming under his own observation, in which a man was recognized by a justice of the peace, through the influence of popular prejudice, the complaint being dismissed by the Grand Jury. I am far from denying to the Grand Jury all merit. It is true, that individual cases do not settle principles, or establish rules, but, they may help to illustrate their truth and propriety. In contrast with the instance spoken of by the gentleman from Cass, I may be permitted to mention two cases within my own knowledge. of a strikingly opposite character, from that related by him.

At the last Spring term, of the Marshall Circuit Court, I was employed by an aged man, just as the cause was called for trial, to defend him against an indictment for a common assault and battery. On reading the indictment, I noticed that the surnames of the defendant, and prosecuting witness were the same. I asked my client if they were relatives. He replied that the prosecuting witness was his son. I inquired with astonishment, why it was not reconciled, and why they permitted such a case to come into court. He said, that his son did not wish to prosecute it, but that he was compelled to do so. On inquiry of his son—a man some forty years of age—these statements were confirmed. I also, learned that a previous bill of indictment, had been found for the same offence, but was quashed for some informality in the empannelling of the Grand Jury. I stated the facts to the Court, and called upon them to order a nolle prosequi to be entered in the case, which, as I thought, was very properly done.

I can refer the gentleman to a still more notable case. It is preserved among the records of one of the northern counties of this State, that one of the best citizens of that region—a man some fifty years of age, whose character for integrity, and moral worth among his neighbors, is, and always has been, as far above reproach, as that of any man who walks this footstool, was indicted for perjury. In order that the case might be disposed of without delay, he consented to come into court, and sit quietly by, without uttering a word in his defence, either, in person, or by counsel. A jury was impanelled, they heard the evidence only for the prosecution, and they acquitted the accused, as they could not fail to do, without a dissenting voice, and without a moment's hesitation. The defendant had been long known in an older portion of this State, and I assure you, sir, that there are not two men living who entertain a shadow of doubt as to his innocence. I will add, that I believe the prosecuting witness was an honest man, but acting under the influence of temporary excitement and prejudice, from which, even good men are not always free,

In saying this, sir, I would not disparage the Grand Jurors themselves. I claim that there is no more enlightend portion of the West than that part of Indiana, in which it is my fortune to reside. I respect the Grand Juries of that region of country. They have been intelligent, high-minded men, intending honestly to discharge their duties, though I have often thought that they must feel humiliated at the nature of those duties, or rather at the manner in which they are compelled to perform them. I hold the fault to be in the system more than in the men. But how, it may be asked, could this man have been indicted? I cannot answer. They acted in the dark. Suppose, sir, that those proceedings had been open and public—that the defendant had been permitted to be present with his counsel, and to cross examine and explain—think you that that indictment would have been found?

I admit again, that such single instances establish no rule; they are of but little comparative weight or importance. But if gentlemen can array individual cases showing the virtues of the Grand Jury system, we can array quite as many illustrating its defects. What practicing lawyer in this body, or what other gentleman accustomed to be about court-houses, but has seen evidence that the secret sittings of Grand Juries are often made the medium through which malicious or prejudiced individuals seek to wreak personal spite and spleen upon their neighbors? And who, if the present system is retained in its distinctive features, shall not witness it again?

Then, sir, if the system be defective, the question arises, what better can be devised? If no better system can be suggested—no one which we may safely adopt—then I would not be ready at this time absolutely to abolish the present one. I would rather leave it to the wisdom of the Legislature. But I would, by all means, so modify the Constitution as to give them power to act upon the subject. A slight verbal alteration would accomplish that object.

Here I may notice, sir, that it has been said that the cause of complaint against Grand Juries among the people is, that the laws are above the standard of public morals. There may be something of truth in the remark; but do not gentlemen give undue importance to the mere administration of the laws, in estimating its effects upon society? Men are not reformed by being incarcerated in jails, or sent to penitentiaries, or hanged by the neck. The reformation and regeneration of society must commence further back—far back as upon the mother's knee and around the domestic hearth. I would rather, sir, aye, a thousand times rather trust to the influence of protected homes, to sound, thorough, well-sustained free schools—to the teachings of the ministers of the gospel—the peaceful observance of the Sabbath—and to the quiet but all pervading influence of the christian religion, than even to the code of Draco, executed to its minutest letter. The one remedy is at best but palliative, superficial and repressive, while the other is curative and radical. The one is like plasters patched upon the surface, while the other reaches to the constitution of the patient and works a final cure.

Let me not be misunderstood. I do not undervalue these repressive remedies. I am no radical in any odious sense of that term. I would not discard the administration of criminal justice. While it must be admitted to be an evil, it is a necessary evil, of the benefits of which I would by no means deprive the State; though I hold that it is useful mainly in proportion as it is open, and mild, and merciful.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe has suggested that the power of preferring indictments might be left with individual justices of the peace. Now, sir, it occurs to me that that is a power not to be entrusted entirely to any one man. Besides, there are some twenty or more justices of the peace in a county; and were any and every one of them to have the power to order a man to trial in the circuit court for any offense, I should fear that the number of groundless prosecutions would be increased: I thank the gentleman for his able effort in exposing the evils of the present system; but I cannot favor his substitute. I have not held any consultation with the gentleman on the subject. I am not disposed to find fault with any one's scheme. I only say, that before I would consent to abolish the present system by Constitutional provision, so that it could not be restored by the Legislature, I must see something clearly better to be substituted for it. That is with me a sine qua non.

The gentleman has said, that if the present system is a bad one, we must lop it off—amputate it. Now, sir, I agree with the gentleman that the present system, in its leading characteristics, is a bad one; but instead of lopping it off at once, I would be inclined to wait for the right time, and till the public mind is ripe for a change. Festina lente—"make haste slowly"—is a maxim no less valuable in politics than in the economy of life. How would a skillful surgeon treat a patient suffering from a malignant tumor? He would be careful not to amputate prematurely. He would feel his patient's pulse, examine all the symptoms, and wait for the favorable time. By the one course, the patient might be thrown into a fever; by the other, the wound might be healed by the first intention.

I cannot say that I am prepared to engraft any plan permanently upon the Constitution. My present idea is, that it would be best to leave the whole matter of a substitute to succeeding Legislatures, who may embody the wisdom and experience of coming years. By providing, as now, that "no person shall be put to answer any criminal charge but by impeachment, or by presentment or indictment," with the addition of these words, to be preferred by a Grand Jury, or in such other manner as the Legislature may prescribe, we would do all that seems to me necessarily to devolve upon this body. Give them the power, and it is my present opinion that the people will require the Legislature to provide a substitute for the present system. I consider that in its ultimate practical effect, it would be nearly equivalent to adopting the gentleman's resolution in terms.

A natural inquiry, in determining the main question, is, what substitute do you propose. Now, sir, without claiming any merit or originality, and with great diffidence on my part, and profound respect for the opinions of all other gentlemen, I will ask the indulgence of the Convention while I submit a few suggestions on this point.

The office of justice of the peace is at present considered an unimportant one, and the most judicious selections of persons to fill it are not always made. But I take it for granted, that somewhat in proportion as you dignify and give importance to the office, better men will be elected. Now, sir, it seems to me that a kind of court of inquiry, as perhaps it might be called, could be formed from among the justices of the peace in the different counties, somewhat after this manner. Let four or five of these magistrates be selected, in such a way as the Legislature shall prescribe, to constitute the court. They might be selected by lot, or what would perhaps be better, the four or five oldest justices of the peace—that is, those longest in commission—in the county, might ex-officio be the men to compose it: provided, however, that no two should be from the same township. This court might meet semi-annually or quarterly, or at such intervals as should be deemed best, at the court-house in the county. It should be their principal duty, on behalf of the State, to inquire into all such violations of the penal laws as should, in the language of the oath now administered to Grand Jurors, be brought before them or otherwise come to their knowledge, and upon sufficient evidence, to order bills of indictment to be preferred by the prosecuting attorney, against the parties accused and for the offenses charged. The parties accused would then be committed or held to bail as justice should require. And the causes would stand for trial at the next term of the circuit court. These proceedings would, of course, be all open and public. The party accused should have the right to be present in person, and by counsel, to hear all that was proven against him, and to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution. The accused could generally be present, if he desired it, and if not present, he could learn before he was brought to trial who were the witnesses, and the nature of the evidence against him. He could then prepare understandingly for his defense. This court might hear only the evidence for the prosecution, with the right of cross-examination on the part of the defendant, or they might be authorized to hear both sides fully, as should be found most expedient. In the one case the evidence should be such as to create a strong probability, and in the other, as to exclude reasonable doubt of guilt. Our criminal code is very simple, and such a body of men would certainly be as competent as the majority of Grand Jurors, to determine what constitutes a violation of any of its provisions. It is saying little for the intelligence of our people, to suppose that five such men would be dependent on the brief charge of a judge for their knowledge of what amounts to a crime. But if that were thought very important, they could meet on the first day of the circuit court, and receive a charge and be under the supervision of the court. It would be difficult now to go fully into detail. As the proceedings before this court would not be in the nature of a trial, a complaint though once dismissed, might, as before a Grand Jury, be considered again, unless barred by the statute of limitations. Proceedings of this character are nothing final.

Now, sir, who are these justices of the peace, that we should be afraid of them? They are our fellow-citizens, elected by the people, and none the less plain, sensible, honest men than if they held no commissions. They are all, at present, conservators of the peace, and would be none the less so under the plan proposed.

Now I do not undertake to say that the system I have briefly sketched is what we need. But it does seem to me that something could be formed from it that would be better, at all events, than the present secret, inquisitorial and expensive system of Grand Juries.

Again, sir, this court might have the power to try and summarily dispose of, without the intervention of a jury, all petty offenses, such as retailing without license, smaller cases of assault and battery, gambling, and the like, in which the fine actually imposed by the judgment of the court, should not exceed some moderate amount to be designated. This tribunal would approach nearer to the character of a jury than to that of a mere court, and in this way much time and expense in the higher courts could be saved.

But gentlemen seem to fear that justices of the peace would act oppressively. Now I apprehend that there would be no great danger of the hard cases of which they speak. At all events, should they occur, the public would know it and they would know whom to hold responsible.

Mr. FOSTER proposed, that as it was after the usual hour of adjournment, if the gentleman from Laporte would give way, and consent to continue his remarks in the afternoon, he would move an adjournment.

Mr. NILES said, he preferred to finish what he had to say then, and if the Convention would indulge him a few moments longer he would conclude. He might be in danger of inflicting a long speech after dinner.

Several MEMBERS. We shall be glad to hear you.

Mr. NILES. No, sir. I prefer to go on now. Now, sir, the question is not what has been, what has come down to us from a remote antiquity, but what is best for us here and now. That is the question. I will ask every gentleman on this floor, suppose that now, for the first time, two methods of putting men accused of crime upon trial, were suggested; the one being the present Grand Jury system, and the other similar to the one I have proposed, who, I ask, would hesitate in his choice? Suppose it were a new question, would any man, instead of the open accusation, preferred upon the direct responsibility of officers of the law, accept the burthensome, Star Chamber system of Grand Juries as now organized? And indeed if its feature of secrecy alone were removed, who would think of retaining so unwieldy a system as the present? I am by no means prepared to say that it is best to ingraft such a plan upon the Constitution, but I am far from believing, should the people have the power, and should it be their pleasure to adopt it, that it would not meet the wants in the case.

But, sir, gentlemen seem to fear that we are striking at the trial by jury. Sir, I do not call that ex parte and secret proceeding before a Grand Jury, a trial. I call that the trial by jury, when the party accused has the right to a change of venue from one county to another, and if need be, from one circuit to another—when he has the right of challenge indefinitely, till twelve men are found, who are impartial and unprejudiced—when the whole case is fully heard and the jury is called upon, by the defendants counsel, to allow something to the infirmities of our nature, and to deal gently with the erring, as they hope for forgiveness themselves; when the Judge charges in the spirit of Christianity and of the common law, that it is better that ninety and nine guilty men should escape, than that one innocent man should suffer, and that if there is one reasonable doubt as to the defendants guilt they are bound to acquit him—when if injustice is done he is entitled to a new trial, and when after all, if there be error, he has the right of appeal. That, sir, is what I mean by the trial by jury, a privilege finally wrested from king John at Runnymede, and one of our noblest birthrights. And, sir, with such a guard as that thrown around the personal rights of the citizen, I ask you if he is injured by being openly put upon his trial, by a tribunal such as I have indicated, when it is found that public justice requires that he should be tried? But, sir, let the public mind and public morals fester and grow corrupt and what is even the trial by jury worth—the trial by jury so identified with our civilization. But, I stand by the trial by jury; no man shall go further than I will in just encomiums upon it. My right arm should sooner fall palsied by my side, than I would assail or sap its foundations. When I assail a system far more in accordance with the spirit of a former and a darker age, let it not be understood that I make war upon the sacred right of trial by jury.

Then, sir, in conclusion, I have only to say that I feel the responsibility of the position I have assumed in reference to this subject—it is a responsibility which any man would gladly avoid. It may be, as remarked by the gentleman from Wayne, too heavy to be carried and too light to carry me. That matters not. It is my desire simply to do my duty. If the present system is evil in its essential features, as it seems to me that it is, I desire to see some better system substituted in its stead. But I repeat again that I would not be willing to see any system engrafted upon the Constitution, unless it should appear after the most thorough discussion, fully to meet the exigencies of the case. On motion by Mr. PETTIT, the Convention adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The consideration of the special order was resumed.

Mr. RARIDEN remarked that he would not insist upon the right to the floor if any other gentleman wished to address the Convention at this time.

SEVERAL VOICES. Go on—go on.

Mr. RARIDEN. As it seems to be the wish of the Convention, I will proceed now, while the subject is fresh in my mind.

Mr. RARIDEN, I will not take up the time of the Convention by referring to anything irrelevant to the subject matter under discussion. I shall not even turn aside to defend myself, or to sustain my personal position, or to reply to gentlemen who have seen fit to remark upon my age, and from it to infer that my associations and predilections are so entirely with the past that I am unfit to advise in councils with reference to the future. I shall not stop to define my position, or declare the principles upon which my action is based. My action and my principles are known, and they must go for what they are worth.

But there is one misapprehension into which gentlemen have fallen, as to my remarks made day before yesterday upon the philosophy of Government, and which it is important should be corrected. I did not say that "the American people turned this bauble which we call a crown upside down." I did say that our forefathers inverted the whole theory of civil government, when they proclaimed the sublime truth that all power resides originally and exclusively with the people, and that government possesses no powers except such as are specifically delegated to it by the people through their delegates, whereas the old and monarchical theory was that kings rule by the grace of God, not by the grace of the people; that all power resides with the king, and the people have none except such as is granted from the crown. Therefore I said that Grand Juries, or the institution that may have stood as the prototype of our Grand Juries, although they may at first have been used as the auxiliaries of monarchs, and at times subverted their interests as opposed to the liberties of the subject—I say although Grand Juries may have been thus perverted under a monarchical form of government, that in the inverted order of the political edifice reared in this country, they were eminently conservative of the rights and reputation of the citizen.

Well, sir, I wish to notice some of the objections that have been made to Grand Juries. The gentleman from Lafayette says that they are relics of kingly power—unfit to be retained by a free people. Another objects that its practices are inquisitorial, inasmuch as its sessions are held in secret, and ex parte testimony only taken. Another gentleman sums up his reasons for supporting this proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) by saying that Grand Juries are too weak to punish the guilty, and too impotent to save the innocent. And still another denounces the institution on the ground that it is the hand-maid of malice, and encourages malicious prosecutions, and inasmuch as England has taken the initiative step in their abolition, we should not be behind her.

I like the spirit thus far—I admire the temper manifested in this debate—I admire the open boldness with which opinions are avowed, but I take the position that instead of the institution being obnoxious to all the sweeping charges I have briefly recapitulated, that it is the hand-maid of virtue and order—that its foundations are laid deep in wisdom and in love to mankind, and that it is admirably calculated to preserve those rights which inherently belong to the people, as well as those they have delegated to the government for their own good.

It is not a relic of kingly power. I admitted in the beginning that in its earlier history the Grand Jury might have been made an instrument in the hands of the king's minions for the upholding of the prerogative of the crown, but this is an accident of the system, not an inherent principle of it. For in its establishment the system was certainly looked upon by the people as an amelioration of the power of the king; and that amelioration arose from an inexorable law of human nature. The king himself, acting from his own feelings, might never have trammelled his power with such inquisition, but the caste of English society ranking second from the king could not forget the caste next to them; their associations and sympathies were more with this third class, and thus the nobility of England wrung from the crown the concession of the right to all citizens to be first adjudged worthy of trial by a Grand Jury before they could be publicly tried by a petit jury. Therefore, I say, that the Grand Jury is no more a relic of kingly power than any other institution of society originating at so remote a period.

Now, sir, for a moment let us look at the philosophy of this thing, and, although I am not accustomed to refer to books in debate, I will refer to one or two upon this occasion. In the writings of the great philosopher, Montesquieu, it is asserted, and Thomas Jefferson fully commends and endorses the sentiment, that the right of society to punish criminals is founded in the original compact by which men resolved themselves into a society. Men, when they formed society, agreed to give up so much of their natural rights as were inconsistent with the good of society at large. Among other things, each individual agrees to give up the right of redressing his own wrongs, and to refer his grievances to the judgment of the mass of society, or to that tribunal established by that majority, for the redress of wrongs. The tacit acknowledgement of every person when he enters society, is, that he will obey the code of morals agreed upon by the majority, right or wrong. Now, then, who is to determine whether a member of society has broken this code of morals or not? Who is to accuse him? While the Star Chamber was in existence, the king accused the subject, who was forthwith brought to trial. But in this country, the king, which we call the state, has neither the power nor the right to accuse a person of crime, and bring him to trial. So jealous were our fathers of the power of the state, and of the rights of the citizen, that the Grand Jury system is so arranged that the citizen must be adjudged worthy of trial by his neighbors and peers, selected from the population of the vicinity for that purpose, before he can be brought to public trial. For one, I confess I am astonished when I contemplate the wisdom and humanity shown by our forefathers in all their political acts. We are accustomed to look upon the unlimited power of the king with fear, for we have seen, in the earlier history of our own country, evidences of that power perverted for the oppression of the subject. We see that our fathers were taken beyond the seas to be tried by and among strangers, for imaginary and ideal offenses committed against the crown of England. Our fathers saw and felt all these evils, and hence the great care and caution we everywhere see displayed in their acts for us. They did not provide, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) would have had them do, that a man should be charged with a crime, publicly examined, indicted, and the sentence of the law executed, all within the space of half an hour. They did not provide that your Governor or judge, could charge a citizen with crime and put him upon his trial therefor. No, sir, they did nothing of the kind. They even held the personal liberty of the citizen sacred, unless twelve of his fellow citizens and peers, upon their oaths, adjudged him worthy of arrest and imprisonment. Nor did they stop there; they were afraid to put too much trust in the judge—he might be powerful, and disposed to create a public sentiment against the accused; they would not even trust the man who had made an affidavit against his neighbor, to sit on the jury. The great safe-guard, then, of the rights of the citizen, is the Grand Jury. Its members are not appointed by the crown or the state, but through the elective franchise, and are component members of society, with whose interests and happiness their own is inseparably interwoven. They are supposed to be men of respectability, to whom the characters and the lives of their fellow citizens may be safely entrusted; men, in whose breasts sentiments of truth and humanity are uppermost; men of firmness and discretion, who cannot be carried away by the hope of popular favor for the fear of popular fury.

But, the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) says that the delay in justice, growing out of the system of Grand Juries, is great, and that but one in twenty of the guilty are ever punished. This may be true, and it grows out of the great caution which the spirit of the institution impresses with regard to the life, liberty, and property of citizens. The gentleman also says that the institution is inquisitorial in its nature and process, and another declaims against it because all the evidence is of an ex parte character. Now, so far from depreciating the secret and ex parte features of the system, I sincerely think they are the most humane and pacific that could have been devised. If you make the examination public, it must be conducted with all the attendant expense, forms, and delay of a regular trial. You array man against man, create partizan combinations, publish the whole matter to the world to begin a trial upon, and subject the whole public to very great inconvenience, and probably great excitement, and all for the purpose of deciding whether or not there shall be a trial. Therefore, I maintain that public convenience no less than the public good, is fully consulted by the examinations before the Grand Jury, composed of such as our laws contemplate, being conducted in secret. It is not until after the complaint is made, a Grand Jury empaneled, a full investigation of the case had, and a bill of indictment found, that the State can touch the person or property of the citizen. Then the prisoner throws himself upon the justice and mercy of the country, has his witnesses called and examined, and himself heard either personally or by counsel, before a petit jury. But if a public examination is to be had, with counsel and witnesses in the first place, why go any farther at all?—why not, as I before asked, let acquittal or conviction follow the decision of that public examination?

The gentleman from Laporte has well observed that the origin and necessity for Grand Juries lies far back in the cradle of society; and I might admit all the frailties and imperfections to exist in the Grand Jury system, charged upon it by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and still be able to demonstrate its superiority to any other proposed by that gentleman. There never has been and there never will be an institution devised by the wit of man, that will not be imperfect as its maker. Human institutions must, of necessity, partake of human weakness and frailty. Not until humanity shall have reached the omnipotence and the omniscience of the Creator of men, will its political or its moral institutions be free from imperfection and attendant inconveniences. It is not that I consider the institution of the Grand Jury as a faultless one that I support it, Mr. President, but because it is the best and the most perfect that the wisdom of centuries has given us, and I beg leave to say that the wisdom of the past is not yet eclipsed, in this regard at least, by the wisdom of the members of the Indiana Constitutional Convention.

Well, sir, another objection to this "inquisitorial" and "ex parte" system is that "it is the handmaid of malice." I frankly admit the possibility of the system sometimes being made subservient to the will of cunning and malicious men—to some extent—never after full trial—but then where is the substitute that is not obnoxious to the charge of like defect? Certainly it has yet to see the light of this Hall. Does a public examination repel every suspicion of this kind? Who is your examining magistrate? He may be at the head of a powerful party and every gentleman within the sound of my voice knows the temptation to err, which would be presented in the fact that the accused belonged either to his own or the opposite party. He may desire to serve the one or injure the other. As I have before said, so I now repeat, that the Grand Jury system has its defects and inconveniences. But, although the evil is first recognized in connection with the Grand Jury, the cause often lies far back of it.

Mr. President, let me call your attention to one fruitful cause of some of those evils which a superficial observer is apt to charge upon this system. Legislation has gone ahead of popular opinion. The criminal code embraces many prohibitions which the people do not condemn. And though this may not be true of the whole State, it is true of certain portions of the State. For instance, the Legislature passes a stringent law against the sale and traffic in ardent spirits and provides punishment for the offence of selling. Now the moral sense of a portion of community is not up to this standard. Consequently, the liquor seller, knowing that he has the sympathies of a large portion of the community with him, will traffic in an article which the community wants. The laws of trade, when quickened by popular taste and passion, are no more to be restricted by an enactment of the Legislature than is the law of gravitation to be suspended by a Governor's proclamation.

If, in any community, there is an appetite for liquor, and the grocer keeps that stimulant, he will have customers. If the Legislature forbids the sale some means will be found to evade the language of the statute. It may be that the vender will give away the liquor and charge a dime for a sight of the glass containing it. Or it will so happen that every customer will have some ailment, real or imaginary, making it necessary that he should take a little brandy for medicinal purposes and petit juries of the same tastes are predisposed to admit such necessity. Now I am not advocating or commending these evasions of the law, but what I wish to call attention of the Convention to is the fact that it is almost impossible to convict a liquor seller even after he is indicted by the Grand Jury. This is known to all. But, gentlemen say that the law is plainly violated and, therefore, the Grand Jury is impotent to punish the violation. I answer, go back to the Legislature and see that no laws are passed in advance of the moral sentiment of the people. Or go to the petit juries and correct their appetites and moral perceptions. The Legislature, not the system of Grand Juries, is at fault in many instances, if fault exists.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take up more of the time of the Convention on this subject; but I must express an earnest desire that the fullest consideration will be given to the subject, that we may not rashly abolish what the wisdom of centuries has approved. I believe that if public examinations are substituted for this system, there will be more licentiousness, more impudence, and less fear of public opinion in society than there now is. By licentiousness I mean that spirit of bullying, through the combination of kindred spirits, in the absence of this wholesome restraint. Many reputations would, in spite of the refusal of the examining magistrate to commit for trial, be ruined by the mere fact of a public examination. All the influence that wealth and social position could muster would be brought to bear upon such examinations, for or against, and the ends of justice be too often defeated. Let us preserve the Grand Jury system until the people are convinced that a better has been discovered. The very dread of an investigation before that tribunal, in the absence of the before-named influences, makes the guilty tremble and often flee. It is in itself a powerful moral and popular restraint upon crime.

I would ask gentlemen if there is not something in the idea of such a tribunal, selected and charged as it is, calling upon the most respectable citizens in the State to appear before them to aid in the great work of maintaining public morals and private rights through the inquiries they may see fit to make in regard to the subject and interests which have been confined to their guardianship. If there is such a state of insensibility in your neighborhood as to feel no repugnance to exposures of crimes through such a tribunal, your clergymen and your Sunday school teachers, missionaries and bible societies, have not done their duty, or have been met with fatal counteracting influences; above all, your mothers and female friends, to whose efforts a Grand Jury is auxiliary, have been derelict in their duty if your people applaud or censure. The gentleman himself may not be a worker in the great cause of virtue and of holding up vice and crime in their true aspect—if he is not he ought to be—and all of us ought to be engaged in it more than we are. This would give a virtuous public sentiment the form of penal enactment and be a protection to property and reputation. Think for a moment of the care with which a man's life and liberty is guarded in society. You cannot arrest him on your own opinion or feelings and have him taken into custody. You must yourself be responsible for the correctness of the accusation, and the charge must be of a character that involves criminal punishment and be made upon oath. Even this is not all. The liberty of the citizen is still too sacred to be lightly endangered, and if the accused can give security for his appearance to answer at the required time he can have his liberty in all cases below capital crimes. Let me say in regard to this matter, that I maintain this philosophy in regard to crimes, so that I do not believe much in hunting down or bolstering up men, because I am satisfied that the guilty can easily be brought to justice through the ordeal of public opinion. There is a divinity in truth and virtue that speaks for itself, and there is the mark of Cain upon crime that all the world can read—the man who is innocent of crime will show that innocence outwardly. Truth and virtue, infixed in the mind, shines forth in the countenance—in the whole exterior of the man. Guilt, crime, and falsehood wear like iron into the very soul, causing ruin and desolation of feeling to set enthroned. Cain of old was not the only man who bore about him the mark of evil—there are Cains of modern times, whose thoughts of mischief, either done or contemplated, so long occupying the mind, look out and warn the sagacious of virtuous mould of the presence of a devotee at the shrine of falsehood and vice. Crime, falsehood, and brutality, ever shun the paths of wisdom, truth, and benevolence—may effect to adore and practice, but the armour will not fit the statue, the garb looks not as if made for the wearer, and the brand becomes visible.

But, says the gentleman from Tippecanoe, the prosecuting attorney can influence the Grand Jury as he pleases; he can cause them to bring in or drop an indictment. The gentleman further said, that he had never had but one Grand Jury who refused to do his bidding. His charge is therefore general. Now, sir, I know nothing of the character of the men composing the Grand Juries with which he has had to deal, but such is not the course pursued by the Grand Juries of old Wayne. The men who form them there have too much respect for themselves as American citizens, as men, to bow to the will of any one of their fellow men, and give themselves to the furtherance of the designs of malice or the attacks of private hatred. And, sir, allowing that an individual might be made a mark for persecution by the prosecuting attorney, let the State of Indiana, through its representatives, attempt to seek out such a victim, and to put its sacrilegious hands upon an innocent man, and let the people suspect the fact, and you will soon see the American spirit in a restive Grand Jury, and the machinations of the wicked rebuked. Inform the people of the fact that a man is about to be victimized to the prejudices or malice of some one engaged in the prosecution, and they will bear him off triumphantly in spite of all that may be brought against him by false witnesses. The Grand Juries are responsible only to public sentiment, and by that sentiment they will be arraigned for misdemeanor. If they permit the guilty to go free, or to arraign the innocent upon insufficient evidence; if they indict the innocent through bad motives or influence, they will render themselves odious to the community. And there is at present great liability to their subjecting themselves to the indignation of the people, while subjects of indictment are so multifarious as they are in our code. I do not pretend to say that the Grand Jury system is perfect; I do not mean to say that all the subjects that are now subjects of inquiry before the Grand Jury ought to be indictable; but where a man's life or liberty is at stake, I would intrust it in their charge more freely than in any other body I can think of. I stand upon this as the life-guard, and never will I consent that any of those I hold dear, and with whom my destiny is interwoven, shall be subjected to criminal prosecution through any other tribunal. For your horse-racing, gambling, drinking, and other common evils, the justices will answer; they can try and punish such offenses.

My private opinion is, sir, that, should you abolish this system and cease to make crime and its causes a subject of inquiry before the Grand Jury, that crime will multiply and be perpetrated with perfect impunity. Our penal laws will be a dead letter; crime and its partizans will be too strong for punishment before such tribunals. The ways of the sinner are loved best. The mass of the people do not come up to the morality of the penal code, or, at least, if there is a small portion who are in favor of order and virtue there, that portion do not like to subject themselves to the denunciations of able and dangerous men, who know how to raise up the public voice against them. They do not like to be made the victims of the wrath of cock-pit and grocery bullies, and their voices are hushed. It requires, therefore, the aid of a Grand Jury, composed of the most respectable men of the community, and sustained by the confidence of the order-loving portion of community, to overawe the more degraded and reckless portion of the community. A man under the imposing circumstances that are connected with the convening of sixteen of the most intelligent men of the community, to sit in judgment upon crime, is less likely to commit perjury than before a smaller and less august body. Vice confronted with virtue will show itself. Old Nick cannot sustain his men to the last. If an innocent man is arraigned no power on earth can make him quail; the stronger the persecution the more determined is he in the maintenance of his innocence; but the guilty quail when brought before it. The elevated character of the Grand Jury—their manner of organization and manner of inquiry is a great preventative to crime, and a part of their power, a consciousness of their uprightness and intention to administer strict justice, has a weighty influence on the minds of the people. These Grand Juries are a part of the machinery of government, that cannot be dispensed with. The welfare of society and the protection of the citizen depends on their perpetuation and public esteem. Their virtue and intelligence give weight to their administration of justice.

A reverence for the moral and upright man is to be found in the mind of the most vicious—it is taught from the pulpit, in the Sunday school, and in the daily associations of life. Why, sir, let me put forth a sentiment here, which, whatever may be thought of the power and influence of these things by those who favor a loose code of morality, is, nevertheless, a practical truth, and that is, that one prayer meeting in a small town or village, well attended, is a greater protection to the rights and persons of the inhabitants of that town or village, than a regiment of soldiers. The moral and virtuous feelings of the heart from which spring the principles of justice and honesty, are kept alive and fostered by such meetings; and though at first of but little power, soon spread from heart to heart and operate on the whole community. Vice conceals its hideous face from the pure and searching gaze of such, and seeks its dens and hovels, to riot in. It is stealthy and cowardly, and requires the powers and vigilance of a Grand Jury to unkennel and unmask it.

Sir, there is nothing tyrannical in the inquisitorial functions exercised by this ex-parte tribunal. It is necessary to the unmasking and punishment of the guilty and the triumph of the innocent. It is far better to appear before such a body than before some justice of the peace or other functionary, who may take upon himself the rectification of public morals, and who may have the code of his party or partisans to sustain. If a man has a good character he is more likely before a jury of sixteen upright men to receive all the benefit and protection that character can afford him. And there is nothing disreputable in the inquest; it is a matter for the convenience of society alone, and as such should be conducted on the highest principles of equity and justice. These inquests are objected to because of their secrecy. Now, sir, I deny that they are secret. The Grand Jury is a tribunal known to the courts of law and to every one; all are acquainted with its functions and the subjects of its inquiry, and for what it meets. The inquiry in regard to individual misdemeanors is alone secret, and that precaution is for the public convenience as well as for the security of individuals. For if the innocence of the accused is made clear, he goes forth to the world with a name more honorable than before—he has passed through the fire and came forth purified. Sir, I love and venerate this old institution. I do not love it for its antiquity, but for its wisdom and humanity—for the good it has done and is still capable of doing—because it protects and sustains the nobler rights of every member of society, at the same time ever maintaining those rights that society has voluntarily bestowed on the government for the good of society. Let these rights be violated—let the arm of law that protects be displaced or enervated, and society will fall into a state of anarchy, and the wicked will reign. Sir, this, as I have said before, is an old institution, and whatever has been handed down by our ancestors that has shown its capacity to administer to the maintenance of a just and wise equipoise in the progress of society, and the support of law and order, I am not disposed to lightly cast aside. I cannot consent to the proposed substitute for this system—I am getting too old. Twenty years ago I could have met even my friend from Tippecanoe in argument with tongue and fists before a justice of the peace. But the strength of my arm is now waning, and I keep no brace of bullies to do the work I hiss them on to. No longer can I with ready brain and easy conscience stand up as an advocate of the accused when I know he is guilty. My time has passed for that, and it remains for others to come forth and take part who have not such hindrances. I have not, sir, in these remarks attempted to defend this old institution against the accusations brought against it. It may have been perverted in the hands of monarchs, and in the hands of Lord Jeffries of England it did cause innocent blood to run—but in the hands of American republicans it stands a tower of strength to shield the oppressed and guard the rights of our citizens. There is no power to awe it, and gold or patronage cannot corrupt it. It must ever remain a true type of the virtue, intelligence, law-loving sentiment of the mass of the people from which it is extracted.

Mr. STEELE remarked, that his friend from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) and himself in 1833-4 used to work in the same harness. They were old associates. He thought the whole point of the debate here lay in the fact whether they should have a double or single span of jurors; the double span as it was well known putting the State to double expense.

He desired to refer the Convention at the outset to the sixth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the U. S., proposed by Congress and approved by a majority of three fourths of the Representatives of all the States in the Union, as upon that article he intended to predicate his remarks. It was as follows: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

This, he said, was the climax of the right of a trial by jury, and fully supplied all the jury necessary to insure complete justice to the State and to the party accused. Grand Juries were selected by the county board, and their course dictated by the prosecutor, and yet gentlemen spoke of the Grand Jury with all its secrets, and one man power as truly republican. The prosecutor in many instances, had only to point out the object of his vengeance and direct the course for the jury to pursue. He had it in his power to delay or defeat justice, and increase the expenditure of our courts.

Mr. S. said, that he would in this connection, suggest another reform which he would commend to the attention of gentleman. By the laws of the State there were sessions of courts of record but twice a year in each county. This produced a great inconvenience, and oftentimes a great expense to the people, because there could be a general jail delivery but once in six months. This was an evil considered with reference to several results. Sometimes the innocent lay too long in prison awaiting a trial. The evil effects of this would be readily recognised by all. If the prisoner had a family they must suffer in his absence, and whether he had or not it was against the spirit of our laws to deprive any citizen of his liberty one hour longer than the good of society at large absolutely demanded. On the other hand, criminals were kept at the expense of the county, and kept in idleness for months when they should be working for the State at Jeffersonville. For these reasons he wished to see a general jail delivery in each county once in three months. He knew this was a degression from the subject in debate, but as the Convention was discussing and proposing reforms he thought he would, while on his feet, bring forward this.

Although he was not in the habit of speaking often himself he desired that the fullest latitude might be given to debate, and that the Convention would not adjourn from day to day until all who desired to do so, had taken a part in the debate.

Mr. KELSO. I assure the Convention that I have no disposition to make a speech, but I think it would be well enough—at least it would not be very much out of place—to ask, at this stage of the debate, what it is that gentlemen are talking about? [A laugh.]

The subject has, I confess, been calmly conducted, and argued with a commendable zeal; but, sir, it does seem to me that gentlemen have first made a man of straw and then pelted him most unnecessarily. I call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that there is not a word in the Constitution of Indiana about Grand Juries. Why, then, talk about abolishing the system? I maintain, and I believe that many will agree with me, that the proposition now before us, is a proper and legitimate subject for legislative consideration, and for legislative consideration alone. And if so, why not leave it there, and let them dispose of the matter as the people may demand at their hands? There is not the slightest danger that the Grand Jury system will live in Indiana one year after the people of Indiana have expressed their preference for some substitute, whether a system of public examinations or otherwise.

The twelfth section of the first article of our State Constitution says, that no person arrested, or confined in jail, shall be treated with unnecessary rigor, or be put to answer any criminal charge, but by presentment, indictment or impeachment.

Now, does it follow that an indictment, presentment or charge, can only be found by a Grand Jury? Were Grand Juries abolished to-day, would society be impotent to secure the indictment of a known horse-thief to-morrow? Not at all, Mr. President. Five or six justices of the peace, sitting together and taking testimony for that purpose, would be entirely competent to present a charge in due legal form. You can call it an indictment, a presentment, or an impeachment, just as you please, but the indicted person will certainly be tried, as promptly and solemnly as though upon an indictment found by a Grand Jury. And the question I desire to ask of members is, why should we, in this Convention, take it upon ourselves to debar the Legislature from attending to this matter? The House of Representatives comes up here fresh from the people every year, or every two years, if this Convention decides on biennial sessions. The members of the Legislature are, at each session, intimately acquainted with the opinions and desires of the people from the midst of whom they have just been sent up to the Capitol, because the people believed that they would represent those opinions and desires, and will not a Legislature, thus constituted, be a safer and a fitter place for the discussion and disposition of a proposition like the one now before the Convention, than this Convention?

By examining the constitutions of some seven or eight States whose constitutions are of the latest date, you will find that but three of them say anything at all on the subject of Grand Juries. Some of the constitutions simply prescribe that a citizen under arrest shall not be put to answer any criminal charge until the charge is presented in a plain, fair, and legal manner; that would certainly amount to an indictment. And I ask what difference does it make from what source or tribunal it comes, so that it be a good and a sufficient indictment? Then, sir, it seems to me that we are taking upon ourselves too much; more, indeed, than the people of Indiana require of us to take upon our shoulders when they elected us to come up here and form the organic law of the State. We should not tie up the hands of the Legislature, but leave it to retain or abolish the institution of the Grand Jury just as the indications and necessities of the times may require. Nothing but the statute laws of Indiana require that before a person can be put to answer any criminal charge he must first be indicted by a Grand Jury; and it is notorious that these statutes are continually changing, and mostly for the worse.

We have gone on for thirty-four years under the old system, and this is the first time I ever heard of a constitutional provision for the abolition of Grand Juries, except just previous to the election. While my colleague was canvassing the county, the question was for the first time presented to him, and he was asked whether or not he would, if elected to the Convention, vote for a proposition to abolish the Grand Jury system? The question being a new one, he replied that the subject had been sprung upon him, and that it was done too suddenly to allow him to give an opinion upon it. In many places in the State the subject has not been heard of—in others perhaps it has been slightly discussed.

I understand the question now pending before the Convention, to be upon the amendment to make the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) a matter of inquiry as to the expediency of the change proposed. It seems to me that no change is necessary, but I think that the amendment is a proper one, and that it should be referred to the committee as a subject of inquiry.

In my opinion, it is better that the whole subject should be left for the action of future Legislatures.

Mr. HOWE. It is not my intention to debate this question. I have neither the power to interest the Convention on this subject, nor would my inclination lead me to do so if I had. If this were a young men's debating society, and not a legislative Convention, I might perhaps, choose to enter into the discussion. I think however, that all we want to get at is the general heads or topics growing out of this question. I must say, in brief, if the main question is, whether the Grand Jury system shall be abolished or not, I am opposed to its abolition, and in favor of retaining it. At the same time, I frankly admit with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that there can be no sort of doubt as to the evils of the system as he presented them. But I have one rudder by which I shall guide myself in relation to all questions of constitutional reform, and that is, that I am opposed to all reforms, unless the grounds for them are manifest and apparent. So long as the existing system of things can be retained, I am in favor of them. If they have evils, let them be remedied, if they are susceptible of amendment.

Now, what are the evils complained of? There is but one on which much stress is laid, and that is the secret and ex parte character of this tribunal. That is the only ground—the only argument that can be brought forward. I feel and frankly admit that it exists. Now, if there is to be any change at all in the Grand Jury system, my proposition is that a Grand Jury shall not investigate any matter, except the punishment be of a capital character, or at least imprisonment in the penitentiary. The lesser offenses, I think, may with great propriety be submitted to a police court, or a police magistrate; I care little which. As to the proposition to abolish Grand Juries, I am opposed to it in the abstract, for two reasons: In the first place, I think that every part of our old Constitution—and especially those parts which relate to the punishment of criminals—should be retained if possible. If there are evils existing in it, amend them; and in the next place, if there were no other reasons for retaining all the provisions of that Constitution than those which have been urged for abolishing some of them, those reasons would be sufficient to induce me to retain them. In the present day, when we hear of nothing but proposed changes, I think it is the proper time for the truly conservative party to stand still. This is the proper time for every man who is anxious to retain the liberties of the country to take a conservative part. That consideration would be sufficient to induce me to go against abolishing the Grand Jury system. Now, the grounds in relation to this main proposition have been eloquently set forth by many gentlemen, and particularly by the gentleman from Cass. I could not, were I ever so willing to do so, give so eloquent and forcible a statement of the evils which would arise from abolishing this system as he has given. The same reasons that existed for retaining the system in England a hundred and sixty years ago, would be equally good reasons for retaining it now. If it was a good system as between the subject and the crown, it is now equally important as between the American citizen and the mob. There is, I am sorry to say, a growing disposition to take from the arbitrament of the law those questions which properly belong to it. If there is to be any change in the Grand Jury system, I would propose a change something like the following:

"Public examinations should be substituted for indictments or presentments by a Grand Jury in all offenses, the punishment whereof shall not be death or imprisonment in the penitentiary; and in all cases a Grand Jury may send for and examine the witnesses for the accused, as well as for the State."

There may be gentlemen who agree with me, although I do not know that there are. However, these two reasons which I have stated would weigh sufficiently with me as to the main question, whether the Grand Jury system should be abolished. If it should be decided in the negative, then I am in favor of this amendment for the reasons I have given.

Mr. MATHER. Mr. President, occupying the position which I do on this floor, as one of the youngest and least experienced members of this Convention, it is with a great deal of diffidence on my part, that I rise to address you, and through you the members of this Convention, on a subject of so great importance. I feel this diffidence more acutely from the fact that so many able men have preceded me in the discussion which has already taken place. But, sir, I think I see a spirit manifested here by both parties and on both sides of this question, to give a patient and candid hearing to all that may be said pro and con. This I am glad to see; and I am exceedingly glad to see it upon this subject, believing as I do that the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe should be adopted by the Convention, because I believe the more the proposition is considered the more it will be likely to strike favorably upon the minds of this body. A great deal has been said upon the subject of the origin of this institution. History has been quoted to show that it is of ancient date, and that it has been used as a supporter of the crown of Great Britain on one hand, and of the rights of the subject on the other—those who opposed the resolution taking one position, and those who are in favor of it taking the other; some insisting that the retention of it in our system of jurisprudence is necessary for the purpose of enabling the State more thoroughly to prosecute persons who may commit offenses against the law; others contending that it will operate as a security to the rights of the accused himself. Such is the variety of views which have been taken by gentlemen in regard to this question. Allow that either of these principles is correct, as it applies to the Grand Jury system, as it has existed and does now exist within the kingdom of Great Britain—can the same reasoning be applied to its existence here? Can it be said that if the Grand Jury system ever was necessary to the support of the crown of Great Britain, that the State of Indiana, with a government whose foundations exist in the very hearts of her people, need any such support? And, on the other hand, can it with truth be said that a system which calls upon any set of men to set in secret conclave upon the rights of others, affords any protection to the citizen? It seems to me that it cannot. I hold it right enough that we should look to the experience of the past to guide us upon this as all other subjects; but it seems to me that if we approach a little nearer to this subject, and come down to the institution of Grand Juries as we find it here to-day existing among us, and examine its practical operation, as applying to our own people, we shall find that many of the reasons advanced in favor of the institution as applicable to Great Britain, do not apply to it as it exists here. Gentlemen who have preceded me upon this subject, have quoted the opinions of Mr. Jefferson and other eminent men, showing the sacredness of the right which every man has of being tried by a jury of his countrymen. I admit, Mr. President, that this is one of our dearest and most sacred rights; but it occurs to me that a marked distinction ought to be drawn between a Grand and petit jury; and some who have spoken upon this subject seem to think that the intention of the supporters of the resolution, is to do away with all right of trial by jury, and not only so, but also the right to the writ of habeas corpus. This, I apprehend, is a great mistake. What is the proposition? It is simply to do away with Grand Juries, and to adopt public examinations in their stead. We have been told that the Grand Jury system is necessary in order to enable the State to bring to punishment a person for breaches of the criminal code. If this be so, then it seems to me that it applies with more force to that class of cases which we usually style misdemeanors, than to that class of cases which are called felonies. Now I have no doubt, Mr. President, that a majority of the members of this Convention will be in favor of some change or modification of the present system of prosecuting criminal causes. But the difficulty seems to be as to what shall be the substitute. Some say "give to justices of the peace, or some other court, the right to enquire into and punish misdemeanors and minor offences." If Grand Juries are at all needed, if they are useful for any purpose, in my judgment, it is in the examination of charges of misdemeanor that their greatest utility consists. We all know that in cases of felonies there are usually plenty of men to be found ready to prosecute.

Again, gentlemen who oppose this resolution do not seem to consider that the majority of cases brought before Grand Juries have their commencement in proceedings before justices of the peace. The gentleman from Wayne remarked that it would be a great public evil to have courts of this kind always open, where examinations might be had—that it would become a public evil from the fact that the courts were always open. Why is not that now the case? Is not that the exact situation in which we now find ourselves? Have not justices of the peace authority, on complaint of a party, to apprehend any man who has committed an offence against the laws of our State? Is it not known that that is the practice everywhere? And yet we are told that if courts were substituted in the place of Grand Juries, they would become a public evil, from the fact that they were always open to hear examinations of this kind. Can this be true? If there be argument and reason in this, I must confess that that argument and that reason have failed to convince my mind of the fact. I have had some little experience in this matter of Grand Juries. It has been my fortune, whether good or ill I will not say, to have been prosecuting attorney for two years, in the 9th judicial circuit of this State. During that time there were some eighteen convicted and sent to the penitentiary from that circuit, and, out of the whole of that number, there was not one case that had its commencement with a Grand Jury. Why, sir, before the Grand Jury met, the defendant was either in jail or under recognizance to appear and take his trial. What had the Grand Jury to do with the matter? Simply to call the witnesses for the State before them and examine them again, touching a matter which had already been examined elsewhere—a mere matter of form more than practical utility—and to present an indictment to the court. After which the same witnesses are again examined when the defendant is put upon his final trial. The question has frequently occurred to my mind, “in all these cases, what was gained to the public or the defendant by the interposition of the Grand Jury?” It seems to me that there was absolutely nothing. On the other hand, I do believe, with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that nineteen out of every twenty cases of felony which originate with a Grand Jury, will fail on trial before a traverse jury. It is true that now and then there may be a case which will result in conviction, which has had its commencement in this way; but such cases are only those where the defendant has fled from his state and gone beyond the jurisdiction of the court; because, I do believe as firmly as I do in my own existence, that there is an inherent feeling of right and justice, and a disposition to see the laws executed inherent in the organization of every good citizen of our State, that will bring the man who has been guilty of any flagrant violation of the laws to immediate punishment. In other words, there will be found persons in every community who will readily go before a justice of the peace and file an affidavit and cause a man, who has been guilty of a flagrant crime, to be brought to punishment. This has always been the case, and, unless we greatly fall from our present position as a people, it will be the case in time to come. I say, therefore, that in felonies there is no necessity that the inquisitorial character of a Grand Jury should interpose in order that crime should be punished; and if anything can be shown of its usefulness, it must be in those small offenses regarding which there would be less disposition on the part of the neighbor, to make complaint.

The whole question, it appears to me, narrows itself down to this: Is it necessary for the support and proper enforcement of the laws of our State that an inquisitorial body should be established amongst us? that a body of men should be called together whose oath and duty should impose upon them the necessity of bringing witnesses before them for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is possible that some offenses might not have been committed within the county since the last sitting of the court? If there be any gentlemen upon this floor who believe that this is necessary, I say to them “you do right in opposing this proposition.” But on the other hand, to those who believe with me, that there is that sense of justice, that disposition to see the laws properly executed, existing in the breasts of the citizens of our State which will insure the punishment of crime—to such I say that we have no need of Grand Juries, because to my mind the only argument that can be adduced in favor of retaining the system is the fact that by the secrecy of a Grand Jury you may be enabled to inquire into smaller offenses which perhaps might escape conviction and punishment from a want of that moral courage on the part of the person complaining which always arises from a disposition to do equal and exact justice to all.

I will not, Mr. President, detain the Convention longer upon this subject. I did not intend to have spoken upon this question this afternoon. Indeed it was my intention to have passed it over in silence. What few remarks I have made have been somewhat confused. I have spoken without arrangement and without notes. I have not attempted to follow at length the arguments of any gentleman who has preceded me. I offer these remarks from a feeling of duty, and such as they are I am willing that they should go before the Convention and the public for what they are worth. And in conclusion allow me to express the hope that every member upon this floor will take the matter into his careful consideration. I do not wish that the subject should be acted upon hastily. I am satisfied that it is a proposition of that character that the more it is considered the more friends will be found for it; and as one of the advocates of the measure I would wish a free and open discussion, and that time may be given for reflection in order that the will of the Convention may be fully matured.

Mr. HENDRICKS said—

Mr. PRESIDENT:—I had not designed saying anything upon the question now under discussion, and will not now occupy the time of the Convention, further than to call the attention of gentlemen to the proposition, upon which we will be first called to vote. I allude, sir, to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman.) Up to this time the discussion has been confined to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit.) That resolution proposes the abolition of the Grand Jury system. The amendment, offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, upon which I desire to speak, proposes the removal of the constitutional restrictions from the Legislature, in reference to Grand Juries—to place them within legislative control, to be abolished if that be found practicable and expedient, or to be remodeled, reduced in numbers, and limited in jurisdiction, as experience may require. If I entertained the views of the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) I would not support the amendment, or advocate any change of the Constitution upon this question. That gentlemen assumes the position that there is, in our present Constitution, no provision, restraining the Legislature from changing the Grand Jury system, or providing for the finding of indictments or presentments, by another organ of society, than a Grand Jury. The language used in the twelfth section of the first article of the Constitution, "presentment" and "indictment," is, sir, of a technical meaning; and to ascertain this technical meaning, our courts would go to the common law, and would hold, without doubt, sir, that these terms as used in this section of the Constitution, mean a charge, of a criminal nature, preferred by a Grand Jury—such a Grand Jury as was provided for by the Common Law. So long, therefore, as the words, "presentment, and indictment" are retained, in their present connection in the Constitution, we must have Grand Juries, if we would have men put "to answer any criminal charge."

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment instead of the original resolution will be adopted. The facts and arguments which have been urged against the Grand Jury system are entitled to great weight and consideration. I acknowledge their force, sir, and am, therefore, anxious for the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn.

But, sir, it is no difficult task to find faults and defects in the most perfect workmanship of man. All of our institutions are, perhaps, imperfect. The Grand Jury system has many defects; defects, sir, that are the necessary consequence of its present organization and mode of proceeding, its ex parte and inquisitorial action. These are defects from which it should be freed, or it should cease to be an institution of our country.

Gentlemen who advocate the Grand Jury system as it now is, and those who are in favor of its unconditional abolition, found their arguments upon its origin—its connection with, and position in, the judicial system of England—arguments drawn from this source, on either side, cannot be conclusive. Very different and weighty reasons require the continuance of the system in England, which can have no force under our political institutions. With us the judiciary is almost entirely beyond the influence of the Executive—the judges, the court officers and Attorney for the State, receiving and holding their offices almost independently of the Executive. With us, the citizen cannot be reached, or his rights impaired by the Executive, through the judiciary.

But, sir, in England it is very different. The judges hold their position at the pleasure of the crown, and the attorney general is but the mouth-piece of the executive, and dependent upon court favor for his position. In such a system, the Grand Jury, composed of the gentlemen of the county, who are beyond the power or the corruption of the court, upon whose charge alone the citizen is compelled to answer the King, is a safeguard to the liberties of the people—a bulwark of liberty standing between the throne and the citizen. Were I a subject of the British crown, sir, I would fight for the Grand Jury—I would fight for it as it is—with its secret sessions—its door closed against executive influence.

Reference has been made to the assizes held by Jeffreys, and the corruptions perpetrated by that judge are used as an argument against Grand Juries. But, sir, I would ask gentlemen what would have been the condition of the people of the western part of England, had there then been no Grand Juries—no constitutional bulwark between them and the throne? Petit juries were brow-beaten and insulted, and forced by that minion of the crown, to find verdicts against their own convictions. The law and right were trampled under foot. The vengeance of the court was to be visited upon the rebels who had followed Monmouth, cost what of law and right it might. But, sir, I ask how much worse would have been the condition of the people if the king's attorney could have put them upon trial upon his information filed? With such a king as James, such a judge as Jeffreys, and such an attorney for the crown as James would select; with such power, where, I ask, would have been the liberties of the people?

But, Mr. President, these reasons in favor of continuing the system with its present powers and modes of proceeding, in England, do not have weight with us, and should not influence us to retain the system, if we can find a suitable substitute.

Complaints are made and fault is found with the Grand Jury system, because it produces so many indictments, and so few convictions. I should think that complaints of this character should be made against the law; for the matter complained of results from the nature of our institutions, and the principle, that it were better that guilty men should escape than that innocent men should be punished. There was one court referred to yesterday, by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) in which conviction was sure to follow the information. That court was the Star Chamber. I never heard or read of a single instance in that court, where information was not followed by conviction. There the executive power had control, not only over the officers, but over the court that tried the criminal—an illustration, sir, of the importance of Grand Juries, in a government with great executive powers.

The question before us is, how shall we have charges, in the name of the State, brought against a citizen? There must be some power in the State to do this. If, as is proposed, we abolish Grand Juries, then how are charges of crime to be preferred? Can we decide upon any other mode than Grand Juries? Who will make the attempt to point it out? Is there any gentleman here who will say he has learning, judgment, and experience enough to designate a plan which will answer for time to come, which shall require neither amendment nor alteration?

I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) because, if you place this matter in the hands of our legislators, and if they see proper to abolish the system, they can do so, and establish in its stead some proper tribunal, before which charges may be preferred by the State against the citizen, in a manner more satisfactory, perhaps, than could be devised here. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) proposes that justices of the peace shall have power to use the name of the State in criminal prosecutions against the citizen. The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) proposes that the prosecuting attorney shall have power to file such information in behalf of the State, proceeding as in the Star Chamber. The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) proposes, instead of Grand Juries, that four or five justices of the county shall have power to present charges, to which the citizen shall answer. These three gentlemen are learned and experienced in the law, and they all oppose Grand Juries; but they can agree among themselves upon no substitute. I refer to this matter merely to illustrate the fact, that we cannot in this Convention agree upon any substitute. I was pleased, sir, with the suggestions of the gentleman from Laporte. I think some such plan can be adopted which will secure the liberty of the citizen, and respect the rights of the State. But what substitute can be adopted that will secure the certain punishment of the guilty, and render the innocent safe in the enjoyment of their rights, can only be ascertained by experience.

This is about all I desire to say upon the question. I wished merely to call the attention of the Convention to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn. If that amendment had been discussed, as I think it deserves to be, I should not have said a word upon the question. I know there is great dissatisfaction amongst the people with reference to the Grand Jury system; and I am satisfied that there should be some change effected—a change as to the number which shall constitute a Grand Jury—a change in their mode of doing business—a change limiting their jurisdiction, and with respect to the secrecy and ex parte character of their proceedings; and this should all be settled by the best judicial experience in the State. But if this question should be settled here, for example, upon the suggestion that our attorneys for the State should present all the State charges, and the citizen be called upon to answer such presentment, it is my opinion, that when this practice should come into the courts, the people would be more dissatisfied than with the present system; and where would be the power to change again? It is my opinion, that, should we settle this question here, upon any plan, it would prove so defective, that, in less than ten years, there would be another Convention called to amend the Constitution, upon this account alone. I believe the people desire some change or modification in this matter, as I have before said; and I desire to give it wholly into the hands of their Legislature. I desire to take this course particularly, in order that when the amended Constitution shall be submitted, there may be no objections to it in the minds of the people on account of any modification in the Grand Jury system, so that when this instrument shall go from our hands, it may be, in fact, what it will be in theory, the expressed will of the people.

Mr. LOCKHART now obtained the floor, and upon his motion,

The Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning, 9'clock.

THURSDAY, Oct. 24, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal was read and approved.

On motion, the consideration of the special order was postponed one hour.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio rose and said, that he held in his hand a petition, signed by two hundred citizens of the county of Ohio, praying for the abolition of the Grand Jury system. Among the names he observed those of two associate judges and many members of the last Grand Jury that sat in that county, and also the names of the most respectable inhabitants in every portion of the county, all belonging to the different political parties. His colleague had stated truly, on yesterday, that the subject of abolishing the Grand Jury system had not been dis-ceased until the very last day of the canvass in their county. On that day he (Mr. P.) was called upon to express his opinions in regard to it, but he remarked to the audience that he should refrain from giving any opinion in regard to it then, at the same time suggesting that it would be very proper to present a petition to the Convention when it met, embodying their views in reference to the subject. He was glad to see that his suggestion had been carried out.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

DAILY SESSIONS.

Mr. BORDEN, on leave, offered a resolution providing that after Monday next this Convention will not hold an afternoon session until otherwise ordered. He said he hoped that the resolution would be adopted, in order that the various committees might have an opportunity afforded them to meet and make out their reports.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that he should prefer afternoon sessions. He thought that the committees would be more fully represented, and perform a larger amount of business in the morning than in the afternoon. The Convention, after sitting in the afternoon, if a lengthy discussion should arise, might hold evening sessions, and gentlemen who desired to make speeches would have a better opportunity afforded them for that purpose.

Mr. COLFAX observed, that he differed in opinion from the gentleman from Ripley. He was in favor of morning sessions, because those sessions were always the longest, and therefore they could do more business than they could if they were to meet in the afternoon. There was another reason why they should have morning sessions, and that was, it would give the Stenographer time to write out the report of their proceedings in time for the daily paper, thus having the report of their proceedings on one day in the paper of the succeeding day. If they should hold afternoon sessions the Stenographer would not be able to prepare his report in time for the paper of the succeeding day. I only speak now of my preference for morning over afternoon sessions, if but one is provided for, as appears to be understood and determined, will be the case. But I must be permitted to state that this Convention should sit two sessions per day, if they expect to finish their labors here within a reasonable time. There must necessarily be a great deal of debate on the various questions that will come under consideration, and that debate must be heard in this Hall. If we hold but one session per day, just double the number of days will be consumed for this debate, and thus delay the final adjournment of the Convention. The arguments of gentlemen that some extra time should be given to committees for a few days to prepare business for our action, might be entitled to some weight; but, for my part, I do not know why gentlemen of this body cannot sit on committees at night, as always do gentlemen of the Legislature. But, if the Convention do decide to hold but one session per day, I hope that that session will be in the morning, and not in the afternoon.

Mr. PETTIT said, he was decidedly in favor of morning sessions. He thought that a larger amount of business would be transacted in the morning, and sessions thus held, as had already been remarked, would enable the Stenographer to prepare his report of their proceedings on one morning, so that they would be published in the papers of the succeeding morning.

Mr. DOBSON stated, that he was opposed to the resolution. He was of opinion that the Convention should hold two sessions per day—a morning and afternoon session—and that the committees should meet in the old-fashioned Indiana way, in the evening. He hoped the resolution would be rejected.

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question being put on the motion of the gentleman from Switzerland, it was not agreed to.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that he had some experience as chairman of one of the committees, and he was satisfied that, unless some such resolution as the one under consideration was adopted, the committees would be greatly delayed in preparing their reports, and the business of the Convention would thus be very much retarded. He did not concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) that the committees should meet in the evening; he had had some experience on that point, and he felt bound to say that he had never seen any good resulting from night sessions of committees. It would be almost impossible to have the members of the committees all present in the evening, as there were generally so many engagements at that period of the day to occupy their attention; besides, after participating in the labors of the Convention during the day, gentlemen would be unfitted for the proper discharge of their duties in committees in the evening. He trusted the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. HALL said, he was desirous of having a resolution of this character adopted, in order that the different committees might have an opportunity afforded them of preparing their reports. The Convention had been in session for eighteen days, and had not yet received a report from any of the standing committees. In the Kentucky Convention, only nine days after it assembled, two of the most important reports offered during the session were received from standing committees. He trusted that no objection would be made to the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken upon the adoption of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

Several petitions were then read and referred.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The hour for taking up the special order having arrived, the Convention resumed the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) proposing to abolish the Grand Jury system, and substitute public examinations in its stead.

Mr. LOCKHART. There is, sir, perhaps no question that has been or will be submitted to the consideration of this Convention, of more importance to the people of this State, than the one now under consideration. The question for decision is—shall the Grand Jury, an institution which has prevailed for so long a series of years in the country from which we have derived so large a portion of our present laws and institutions, and which has been so long and so successfully in operation in this country—be abolished? This sir, is an important, a grave question, and one which demands the serious consideration of this deliberative body.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe, sir, has taken a bold stand in presenting as he has for the consideration of the Convention a proposition, which, if not entirely new is measurably so here. He proposes to change essentially the organic law of the State, and upon a point too which has not attracted the attention of Constitutional Conventions in other States of the confederacy. He desires, sir, to abolish the Grand Jury system and to substitute in its stead public examinations before justices of the peace. Instead of having bodies of men chosen by the constituted authorities of the State to examine into all violations of the penal statutes, he proposes public examinations before magistrates. I say, sir, this is a bold proposition. As was remarked by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) there are in Marion county ten townships and probably twenty-five justices of the peace. Should the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe prevail, the duties that now devolve upon the Grand Jury would be transferred to these twenty-five justices of the peace. You then have twenty-five petty courts in this county whose duty it would be publicly to inquire into all violations of the penal code, the evidence to be taken down by the respective magistrates and handed over to the Clerk of the Circuit Court, by him to be transferred to the prosecuting attorney and then, if in his judgment there should be evidence enough to warrant a prosecution, he is to make out a proper accusation and file it. This is the plan, as I understand it, presented by the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) suggests another plan. He suggests that the five oldest magistrates of the county be chosen to discharge the duties that now devolve upon grand jurors, and that they shall hold open courts at stated periods for the purpose of hearing criminal accusations, and if the evidence be sufficient, recognize or commit the defendant to answer at the circuit court, taking down the evidence the same as proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and file it in the clerk's office for the use of the prosecuting attorney; but he does not appear to be satisfied that his plan will work, and if it does not I understand him to be in favor of retaining the present Grand Jury system. Indeed, after listening to his interesting and able argument I came to the conclusion that he was in doubt himself what would be the best system—and to reduce his argument to a syllogistic form it amounted to this, that he was in favor of abolishing the Grand Jury if a better system could be devised; if not he was in favor of retaining it.

Mr. NILES. I regret to interrupt the gentleman, but I think he misapprehends my position. I am opposed, at all events, to retaining the Grand Jury system as an imperative provision of the new Constitution. Whether it will be best to engraft any substitute upon the Constitution, or to leave the whole matter for the Legislature, is a question about which I am somewhat undecided and comparatively indifferent, and should any substitute be adopted, I would leave it optional with the Legislature, after a reasonable time, to modify it, or even to return to the present system.

Mr. LOCKHART. I am satisfied with the gentleman's explanation.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe says that we do not keep up with the spirit of the age in maintaining the Grand Jury system; that it is an attribute of kingly power, and that it retards rather than advances the interests of society. I do not admit that Grand Juries were instituted as auxiliaries to the crown, but assert that they were instituted to protect the citizen against malicious prosecutions.

Allusion has been made to the court of the Star Chamber, by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, by way of illustrating the position he maintained in regard to the abolition of the Grand Jury system. Now, sir, I would ask the gentleman, whether, if his propositions prevail, we will not be brought back to that period in English history, at which the court of the Star Chamber commenced its usurpations of power; whether, if we abolish the Grand Jury system and substitute the one he has prepared, it will not bring us back to the commencement of the reign of Henry VII. Previous to that period Grand Juries were organized and used for the purpose of presenting accusations against criminals for prosecution.

The earliest history we have of that institution is that it was first introduced among the Saxons, but at what particular period it was adopted is uncertain. Long before the court of the Star Chamber came into power, and during the reign of Henry III, Grand Juries were in existence; and if my reading is correct, they were instituted for the protection of the subject, and not to enable the king to carry out his tyrannical purposes. It is true the Grand Jury was virtually abolished by the enlarged jurisdiction assumed by the court of the Star Chamber, during the reign of Henry VII, to enable the crown to carry on its malicious prosecutions. Will not the magistrates' courts, with their public examinations, be Star Chamber courts in miniature, substituting only the prosecuting attorney for the king.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe, did not, when speaking of English jurisprudence, allude to that period in English history commencing with the reign of Henry VII and terminating with that of Charles I, a period of a hundred years, during which the court of the Star Chamber triumphed in the overthrow of the Grand Jury system. He did not refer to the time when Henry and his successors took their seat on the bench and became a component part of the court, to carry out their own behests in violation of law and the rights of the subject. This system of administering the laws of England, prevailed for more than a century, and where was the right of the citizen during that time? This was the period so lightly passed over by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. The wrongs the people of England experienced during that period, called so loudly for redress that during the reign of Charles I, the government was compelled to come back to the Grand Jury system. From that period to the present this system has been in use, both in England and America; every State in this confederacy having incorporated it in their system of jurisprudence; and now in the middle of the nineteenth century we are told that to retain it is behind the spirit of the age. I do not believe it.

While the gentleman from Tippecanoe and the gentleman from Laporte are both strenuous in favor of the abolition of the Grand Jury system, they are equally anxious, they say, to afford to the accused an impartial trial by jury. How, sir, I would inquire, if this resolution should be adopted, and the Grand Jury system abolished, are you to increase the chances for fair and impartial trials. There would exist the same objection to making public examinations before a single magistrate, as proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, or three, four, or five magistrates, as proposed by the gentleman from Laporte, that there would be to public examinations before Grand Juries. The gentlemen who advocate the abolition of the Grand Jury system, admit that public examinations before Grand Juries would never answer—my opinion is that they would answer as well in the one place as the other.

Public examinations must inevitably tend to lessen the chances for a fair trial before a traverse jury. Suppose the public mind becomes inflamed in regard to some particular criminal, how can he rely upon having a fair and impartial jury when all the evidence for and against him is known? But, preserve the secrecy of the Grand Jury, let his case be examined there, keep the evidence from the public, and you increase his chances for a fair and impartial trial. How frequently is it now, that in counties where there have been certain violators of the penal law, that the public mind becomes exasperated and inflamed against the accused, so much so that a great number of applications are made for a change of venue; how much more frequent would these applications be if all examinations were public. And, sir, three-fourths of these applications are brought about by the public investigations which we must necessarily have before committing magistrates and at coroners' inquests. When any great crime has been committed, the whole community flock in to hear the trial, and the prisoner, knowing that fact—knowing that the public mind is prejudiced against him, from having heard the examination, applies for a change of venue. The court cannot fail to see that there is some ground for the apprehensions entertained by the prisoner, and, if not compelled by an imperative mandate of the law, would, from a sense of justice, feel bound to grant the prayer of the accused. The prisoner is transferred for trial, to another jurisdiction, where there are men whose minds have not been warped or prejudiced against him—where there are men entirely ignorant of the transaction, who can be placed on the panel, hear the evidence, and pronounce an impartial and just verdict. In my judgment, sir, nothing can be clearer than that, if public examinations are instituted, application on application will be made for changes of venue, because of the difficulty in getting fair and impartial juries. I would say here, sir, that I am not in favor of having all offenses punished by indictment. I have long since arrived at the conclusion that our legislation ought to be different on that subject, and that a large number of misdemeanors now punishable by indictment, might be tried before justices of the peace, reserving, of course, the right of appeal. I think that in this particular, the Grand Jury system may be modified, without infringing the rights of the citizen, but I am utterly opposed to its entire abolition, considering, as I do, that no substitute can be found. And, sir, before I would vote to abolish the Grand Jury, and place it in the power of one man to hear the evidence, take it down as he understands it, and then give the prosecuting attorney the power, from that evidence, to prepare an indictment and bring a citizen to trial—I say, sir, before I could vote for such a proposition as this, a radical change must be wrought in my mind. I would, sir, with my present impressions, as soon think of voting for the celebrated French declaration that there was no Sabbath, and that death was an eternal sleep. I prefer rather to vest that power in the hands of eighteen Grand Jurors—men not versed in law, and fresh from the masses of the people. Keep your prosecuting attorney out of the Grand Jury room, except when invited there as the legal adviser of the jury, so that he may exert no undue influence over them. Leave them to act free from dictation or any extraneous influence, and they will invariably do right. During my brief career at the bar I have prosecuted for the State, and can bear testimony to the high and honorable bearing of the citizens who usually compose Grand Juries. Let them receive the charge of the court, examine the statute law of the State, hear the evidence of the witnesses, and leave them unfettered by the admonitions of the prosecuting attorney, and, my word for it, ninety-nine out of a hundred of their decisions will prove correct. Malicious prosecutions, to be sure, may sometimes be preferred, but abolish the Grand Jury system and there will be ninety-nine malicious prosecutions preferred by the prosecuting attorney and his petty magistrates, to one made by the Grand Jury.

The question more particularly under discussion, sir, I suppose to be the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). He proposes, in the first place,

That the public will should not be restricted by unnecessary limitation of the legislative power.

Secondly, that the manner of preparing and the mode of prosecuting a criminal accusation, are matters purely legislative, and should be left to the legislative department of government.

Thirdly, that the committee on criminal law be instructed to omit the words, "indictment," "presentment," or "impeachment," where the same occur in sections 12 and 13 of article 1 of the old Constitution.

Now, sir, I am not in favor of the last two propositions. I desire to retain the clause relating to this subject in the new Constitution substantially the same as it is in the Constitution of the United States, and propose to amend his substitute by striking out all after his first proposition, and inserting the following:

"That the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law be instructed to report a section to be inserted in the amended Constitution, providing that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment by a Grand Jury."

I repeat again, sir, that there is no question in which the people are more deeply interested than in that of a fair and impartial administration of the criminal law of the State. It is due to our citizens and the State that such a system of jurisprudence should be adopted by this Convention, as will not only guarantee the rights of citizens, but will at the same time secure to the State her full rights, and enable us, under all circumstances, without unnecessary delay, to punish those who violate our penal laws. Can we do this, sir, by abolishing the present Grand Jury system, and substituting public examinations before justices of the peace in its place? I think not. I am of opinion that no institution or system can be devised so perfectly well adapted to secure the rights of citizens and of the State as that of the Grand Jury. I predict, sir, that if the principles contained in this resolution are adopted and embodied in the new Constitution, that at the expiration of five years there will be found a large majority of the people of this State in favor of coming back to the Grand Jury. It will be found that the expense of prosecuting before magistrates will far exceed the expense of the Grand Jury system. The expense, however, is not what I look at. The question is, is this institution an important element in the perpetuity of our free institutions? If it is, it matters not what it costs. The question is not one of dollars and cents, but is it the best system for effecting the purpose designed in its organization?

Mr. FOSTER. I never rise to address an audience, and more particularly a deliberative body, without feeling a kind of timidity or trepidation which I would willingly divest myself of, and such as many gentlemen present doubtless have oftentimes experienced. I am somewhat in the situation of an old lady, who, upon one occasion, when she had the hysterics, applied to me for medical advice. She undertook to describe her disease, and said that it was a kind of enlargement in the chest; that it would get up in her throat and produce a sense of suffocation, and finally remember, doctor, it is very queer, and I do not know what you call it, but I call it the swallows. This, sir, is indeed a very distressing disease, and I am sorry to say it, but I greatly fear that some gentlemen on this floor have also got the swallows. [Laughter.] As there are a goodly number of practitioners of medicine here, I do not know but what it would be desirable to raise a committee for the purpose of providing some remedy that will cure this affection, and if such a committee should be raised, I suggest, among other potions, whether a draught of the gentleman from Tippecanoe's tea (referring to a glass of highly colored liquid upon the gentleman's desk, when he spoke upon the Grand Jury system) might not have a very salutary effect.

I feel it to be an imperative duty, sir, to make a few remarks upon this subject, merely premising that it is one of which I have heard but little, and examined very slightly until its presentation here last week. It is true I might have availed myself of certain lucubrations of a member of this body, published in the Sentinel last summer; but unfortunately I was then engaged in the canvass, taking care of number one, and, therefore, the remarks I shall offer will be thrown out merely from the spur of the occasion, and for the purpose of defining my position before my constituents.

I profess, sir, to be a conservative, and not one of the progressionists of the age who appear to run with a kind of railroad velocity after every ignis fatuus or will o' the wisp of the day. I wish to adhere to the institutions and landmarks of my fathers, for I believe if they were not better men than those composing this assembly, they were at least as good, and were influenced by less sinister and selfish considerations than those which govern many of us at the present day. The sages of the Revolution, and those who immediately followed them, were patriots in the purest and strictest sense of the word.

An objection is urged against the present Grand Jury system that it is nearly a thousand years old. Now, sir, for one, I admire almost every thing that is old. I love old books, and old wine, and I was going to say old women, too. Why, sir, I respect the maiden lady who, even after having weathered Cape Forty, is still willing to embark on the treacherous ocean of matrimony, notwithstanding the shoals and quicksands, the rocks and squalls, which she is liable to encounter on her voyage. I also love the ivy-mantled town, and the moss-covered church, and I love the old relics of the Revolution. When I see a man bending with the weight of years, though he may be clothed in tattered garments and looked down upon in society; and behold his white locks bleached with the frosts of many winters, and his physical frame fast crumbling to decay, and know that he fought for his country in "the times that tried men's souls," I involuntarily approach him with respect, and treat him with a veneration only less than that which I pay to my Maker and my God.

Do you urge the antiquity of this system as an objection to it? Why, sir, I consider that one of its highest recommendations.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. President; I know nothing in relation to the common law, but have some slight acquaintance with English history, and I must say that I have not read that history in the same manner that the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and others who concur in his views, have read it. So far from the Grand Jury system being established for the benefit of monarchy, I contend that it was established for the benefit of the people. It is of Saxon origin, and it originated some time after the Heptarchy was abolished, when England was united under one Saxon monarch, and anterior to the Norman Conquest. It has existed for more than a thousand years during the various dynasties of Britain; and, like the meteor flag of England, which has braved the "battle and the breeze," during that long period, so this Grand Jury system appears to me, like some strong and mighty fortress on some high and elevated eminence, which has not only bid defiance to all the assaults of its enemies, whether external or internal, but has bid defiance to old Time himself.

Yes, sir, I admire—I reverence it for its antiquity.

But it is said that it has only been in existence in England and the United States. Why, sir, a higher compliment than this could not be paid to the institution. These two countries, as it is well known, are the most free and enlightened upon earth.

It has been compared, also, to the Inquisition of Spain and Portugal, and to the court of the Star Chamber. What comparison, I would seriously inquire of gentlemen, is there between the Inquisition of Spain and the Grand Juries of England and America? Let me give a brief history of the course pursued by a Grand Jury. The number of gentlemen generally composing a Grand Jury is fifteen or sixteen, who come to court at a prescribed time, where a great number of people are in the habit of assembling together. They are duly sworn to the faithful discharge of their duty, and the judge of the circuit court gives them a charge; and this very charge, on particular occasions, is calculated to diffuse more light in regard to law among the jurors and the people than can be derived from any other source, excepting, of course, those who are in the profession. After the judge has delivered his charge, the jury retire to their room and deliberate upon the various subjects brought before them. Permit me to say here, sir, that this is no Star Chamber process. Although there may be sixteen or eighteen men composing the jury, yet it takes twelve of them to find a true bill and indict an individual for any kind of offense. If there were only eleven in favor of the indictment they could not bring it in. This, of course, is a benefit to the accused.

What is the course pursued by the Inquisition of Spain! An individual is arraigned before that body without any knowledge of the charge brought against him. He is made to be a witness against himself. He is tried and condemned without any opportunity being afforded him of proving his innocence. Not so with the Grand Jury system. A man that is brought before that body, charged with some violation of the law, has the fullest opportunity afforded him to bring forward testimony that may prove his innocence. If he does prove his innocence, his character will stand higher in the community than it did before the charge was brought against him. But how is it with the inquisition? A familiar dressed in black robes constitutes the judge and jury; and any individual who may come under the displeasure of the inquisition is liable to incarceration in a dungeon for life, unless it is decided that he shall be made a victim to the Auto-da-Fe. I am astonished that gentlemen should compare the Inquisition with the Grand Jury, brought to this country by the pilgrim fathers, when they first set their feet on the rock of Plymouth, on the bleak shores of New England. Yes, sir, the same institution was carried to Virginia by the Cavaliers, and adopted by the Huguenots, when they fled from the tyranny and oppression of Louis XIV of France, and settled on the sunny shores of Carolina.

Mr. President, when William the Norman conquered England, and the last Saxon monarch was slain at the battle of Hastings, he and his immediate successor, William Rufus, endeavored, by the establishment of the feudal system, to destroy the Grand Jury system. For a time they succeeded in their nefarious attempt; but the system was resuscitated again, and notwithstanding the coercive measures pursued by the tyrannical and imbecile John, and by many of his line who were warriors and statesmen of great and deserved celebrity, yet it stood its ground against all the machinations of the kings of the Norman race, and also those of the Stuart line, which commenced with the first James, and terminated with his fanatical and tyrannical grandson, the second of the name. And ever since the abdication of the last named monarch, and the ascension of William of Orange to the throne of England, the Grand Jury system has been established upon a firm and stable basis.

Allusion has been made, sir, during this debate, to the trial and death of the Saviour of mankind. No analogy, in my humble opinion, can be made of his trial and the course pursued at the present day. True, he was betrayed by one of his followers; and when he was arraigned before the High Priest, the multitude, instigated by the Pharisees and others, cried crucify him! crucify him! and he was led away to death. But this was according to the foreknowledge and determinate counsel of God; and the Saviour himself declares that they did not know what they had done, when he prayed to his Heavenly Father to forgive them. It was the act of an infuriated mob which condemned the Saviour to the cross, and not the deliberate verdict of a jury of his countrymen.

I have no disposition to consume the time of the Convention further on this question. At some subsequent period, when this subject shall have been reported on by the committee who may have it in charge, I will probably trespass further upon the attention of this Convention, and endeavor to convince the most skeptical of the impolicy of abandoning the present system of Grand Juries, and substituting in their place an inquisition of justices of the peace—aye, of a single magistrate, in lieu of twelve or fifteen men equally as honest and well informed as himself.

On motion by Mr. HOVEY,

The Convention adjourned until 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The consideration of the special order was resumed.

Mr. HOVEY said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I look around this Convention and consider the learning, the talent, and the experience of those who are here assembled, and more particularly when I consider the very able manner in which the question under debate has been discussed, I must confess that it is with unfeigned diffidence that I have arisen to address you. Nor would I do so now, did I not feel that the duty which I owe to my constituents requires that I should not permit a vote to be taken on a question of such vital importance, without presenting to the Convention what I believe to be the views of those whom I have the honor to represent. Were I to remain silent on a question of the magnitude of that before the Convention, I should feel that I was recreant to the interests of those who sent me here, and would be deserving the appellation of an "unfaithful servant."

If a sentinel were stationed on the walls of a besieged city, it would be his duty to oppose any invading force. If that force be feeble, he should offer battle hand to hand, and if too strong for his individual efforts, he should at least do all in his power to repel the invasion.

Somewhat in the attitude of that sentinel do I stand on this floor—the State of Indiana the besieged city—the old Constitution the wall that surrounds her—and I, as one of the Constitutional delegates, a sentinel to guard and protect that wall. Wherever I find it deficient or weakened, it is my duty to strengthen or rebuild it, but I have no right to try experiments upon it—I have no right to spring a mine beneath, nor test its strength by any powerful engine of assault. Taking this to be my duty, I shall offer my feeble opposition to repel the assaults which have been made, with gigantic force, against one of our most venerable and noble institutions. The Grand Jury system is without a parallel in the history of nations or of man. Kingdoms have been overthrown, empires have mouldered into dust, but the Grand Jury, amid all the changes of a thousand years, has stood as firm and immovable as the pyramids of Egypt. Viewing it, sir, in this light, I am opposed to laying rude hands upon it, and making hasty alterations. The main arguments made by those who wish to abolish this system is, that it has faults—that Grand Juries have sometimes been corrupt—that they have indicted those whom they should not have indicted, and left unrepresented those whom it was their duty to present. But if that argument is to prevail, and the system, on that account, to be abolished, to what will it lead? Does not every gentleman here perceive that it will lead to a fallacious conclusion? Look at your petit juries, and consider the frequent results of their deliberations. Have they not frequently, by their verdicts, robbed men of their property? Have they not stamped upon the innocent the character of infamy? Have they not consigned to the gloomy walls of a prison, for life, those who were as guiltless as the babe unborn. Aye, and have they not caused the scaffold to reek with the blood of the innocent. Look at the judges in the highest courts. There the ermine has been stained—bribes have been received, and they have allowed themselves to be made the willing tools of power. But, sir, let us bring the comparison nearer home, and come down to the proceedings had in this Hall and the adjoining chamber a few years ago, and what will we discover? That the chosen representatives of the people—those who ought to have guarded their interests with the most sacred care—involved the State in an unnecessary debt, (and that, too, without the actual consent of the people,) which she will not be able to pay for the next half century to come.

What, then, is the conclusion? Why, that petit juries, judges, parliaments, and legislative assemblies have abused their powers, and have faults; but I ask if that be a satisfactory reason why they should all be abolished? Yet that is the tendency of the argument which has been urged with so much eloquence by the gentlemen who seem anxious for the abolition of the Grand Jury system. There is not a gentleman on this floor bold enough to say that he is willing to abolish the petit jury because it has sometimes committed the errors I have named. There is no human institution that is perfect; and, as has been well observed by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) there never will be one as long as the mind of man is finite.

Sir, I would remind gentlemen in this Convention, that it is an easy thing to tear down, but a much more difficult one to build up. The architect who designed and superintended the erection of this Hall, may have labored for years in studying those principles which enabled him to produce such a structure; and yet a madman or a fool in a few short hours, might level it with the ground. Rome, with her splendid villas, her magnificent palaces, and gorgeous temples—Rome, the great, the powerful, the triumphant, built with the spoils of a thousand nations, and cemented with their blood, was left in one night by Alaric, with his Goths and Vandals, a mass of blackened ruins. 'Tis easy to tear down, but it is hard to build up.

I will not attempt to go over all the arguments which have been urged, for with all due deference to the gentlemen who have advanced them, I think many of them can have but little weight. Neither will I with others attempt to trace the Grand Jury system to its origin, or inquire, whether it has existed one or two thousand years. I care not what its history and action have been in England, in times past. These are not questions for us to consider, but we should inquire what has been its action and history here. I care not whether it has subserved its designs in other countries, if it has answered the purpose with us. We know that it was early ingrafted into our republican institutions, and that it has "grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength," and if demolished, the whole superstructure must feel the shock.

What is a Grand Jury? Of what is it composed? Is it composed of lawyers and doctors, of clergymen, and justices of the peace? No; it is composed of the very bone and sinew of the county, of the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant. Should it ever be my lot to be tried for an offence, I will pray God to deliver me from being tried by a jury of lawyers, or justices of the peace. I want no man on a jury who has a smattering of the law, but those who have not been much in contact with that icy element, which freezes all the better feelings of the human heart, and deadens the ear of mercy.

It has been said, that the Grand Jury is a subservient tool of monarchy. Now, I contend that it is one of the most democratic features in the judiciary department. What is a pure democracy? It is a government where the people "en masse," make, judge, and execute the laws. Now, I leave it to gentlemen, whether the Grand Jury, which is composed of the people, and every term comes fresh from the people, is not more democratic than a judge or justice, who is elected for two or three years? Suppose you place the power of examination in the hands of one justice of the peace, as the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave) proposes. Would he not be considered as having exclusive privileges? And, would he not become more odious than the common informers of Great Britain? If, on the contrary, the indictment is found by a Grand Jury, the indicted will be silent, because he would reflect that they were his fellow-citizens, without prejudice against him, and that they would not be likely to present him without some good cause.

There is another point of view, in which I wish to contrast the Grand Jurymen, with the examining justice. The justice of the peace is sworn once for all, to faithfully perform his duties, and that oath is to last him during the continuance of his term. But, the Grand Jurymen is sworn for the single occasion, and his oath will make him ponder on his every act. He is to present no one from malice or ill will, nor leave any one unpresented, through fear, favor, affection, reward, or the hope thereof, but he is to present all things truly, as they shall come to his knowledge. Now, I ask which of the two is most likely to remember his oath, when the conduct of a person accused of crime is brought before them?

Plain cases of crime have been put by gentlemen, who favor the resolution, and in such they triumphantly ask, what is the use of Grand Juries? If the cases were all plain that were to be brought before such juries, I would unhesitatingly admit they would be of but little use. But cases are not all plain, and in a difficult one what figure would a justice of the peace cut, with at least the liberty of the prisoner in his hands. Sir, would he be as likely to act impartially as a Grand Jury? No gentleman here, at all conversant with law, or the practice of courts, can think so.

I have been very much pleased with many of the arguments which have been elicited, during this debate. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) has thrown before the Convention many valuable thoughts, and the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) with his gigantic intellect, has brought forward many reasons, which he doubtless thinks are sufficient to sustain his resolution. But, whatever effect they have had upon the minds of others, they have certainly failed to convince me.

One of the objections of the gentleman last named, is, that the proceedings are secret. Now, what does that amount to? Is not any member in this Convention aware, that by that very reason criminals will be brought to justice much more surely? And why so? Simply, because if a person should go before a justice of the peace to file an affidavit, there would be those generally standing round, who would spread the news, and the culprit being thus warned, would have an opportunity to escape. On the other hand, when an offence is inquired into before a Grand Jury, and an indictment is found, a writ issues, and the criminal is in the hands of the sheriff before he is aware that any charge has been preferred against him.

The Grand Jury system has another advantage; it prevents heart-burnings and neighborhood quarrels. A man might wish to inform against his neighbor for some gross offence, if it could be done so as not to produce ill feeling between the offender and himself. To present him before a justice of the peace would be almost sure to cause that result, yet he could go before the Grand Jury and cause the offender to be brought to justice both secretly and safely. Gentlemen may declaim against this as a malicious and cowardly act, but I would remind them that those who usually commit crimes are not men of the mildest temperaments, and that there is little bravery, or at least little wisdom, in an informer baring his breast to the midnight assassin, or run the risk of having his property consumed by fire by an enraged incendiary. But such a course is denounced as cowardly! I am far from believing that every man who goes before a Grand Jury is actuated by malice. A father might find it necessary for the welfare of his sons to report some abominable hell-hole of iniquity which might be destroying their morals and characters—some gambling den, some “doggery,” bidding all defiance to the law. Yea, he might even be induced to indict his own child to check his mad career. Away, then, as to this argument of malice. That that feeling in some cases may exist, I will not attempt to deny, but is certainly not the most common with witnesses before the Grand Jury.

But, sir, where will you find the most malice, the most perjury? In the small cases brought before justices of the peace, and most commonly under recognizances to keep the peace.

But there is another consideration why this secrecy is valuable. Unfortunately in this country, as in every other, we have the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the powerful and the weak. Now, sir, take a man possessing all the elements of popular favor—rich and influential—who has committed a crime, and let me ask in all seriousness, if an ordinary justice would be as likely to deal fearlessly with him as a Grand Jury of the country? Reason answers, no. Again: would that poor man be likely to inform openly against the influential character I have described? He might do it, sir, but if he should I contend that he would be an exception. And now, sir, I will say one word more in regard to the policy of the secrecy of Grand Juries. It is to prevent innocent men from being unnecessarily exposed. How many persons are charged with crime before that body of which the world neither hears nor dreams, because the testimony is insufficient. But if we had no secret examining court, the innocent would be frequently held up to the public gaze as though they were really guilty.

It has been contended that justices of the peace can and will perform all the duties of the Grand Jury. I have taken the trouble to look into the jurisdiction now possessed by those officers, and will read to the Convention the heads of the same:

“Assault, ferrying without license, vending obscene books, Sabbath breaking, tavern keepers, &c., selling liquors on Sunday, profane swearing, playing long bullets, &c.”

Jurisdiction is given over the following by the acts of 1848:

“Unlawful assembly, affray, assault and battery, assault and battery in parting combatants, selling unwholesome provisions, public indecency, extortion by ferrymen and bridge keepers, vending foreign merchandise without license, vending spirituous liquors without license, exhibition of shows without license, selling or giving spirituous liquors to a minor under 18 years of age or to an intoxicated person, tavern keeper taking larger price than charged in schedule of rates, &c., gaming, gaming in a grocery, carrying concealed weapons, disturbing religious society or other lawful meetings.”

Over all these offences justices of the peace have jurisdiction, and I now appeal to gentlemen from the different counties in this State, whether the justices attend to their duties under this law in the manner they should? I want those who favor the idea of placing such unbounded power in the hands of the justices of the peace to answer. I know they do not. If, then, they now fail to perform the duties enjoined upon them by law, how much greater would be their dereliction if clothed with all the power which the friends of this resolution wish to cast over them.

As an argument against Grand Juries, the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) had asserted that no writer of any eminence had ever eulogized the Grand Jury system. I thought at the time that that was a very broad assertion, and doubted whether the gentleman was not in error. I have since found that he was. Judge Story, in his 3d vol. of Commentaries on Constitutional Law, page 658, uses the following language:

"From this summary statement it is obvious that the Grand Juries perform most important public functions; and are a great security to the citizens against vindictive prosecutions, either by the government or by political partizans, or by private enemies."

What greater eulogy does the gentleman want than this? Were it necessary, and did time permit, I have no doubt a wheelbarrow load of books might be produced containing paragraphs fully as laudatory as this.

But gentlemen are anxious to have things so arranged that punishment shall follow the commission of the crime as quickly as the peal of thunder succeeds the flashes of the lightning. I would ask whether that would be a wholesome state of the law? What is the feeling that pervades the popular mind when a man is first accused of some high crime? Do the people feel for and sympathize with him? No—the cry generally is, "crucify him! crucify him!" That is the first impulse, and that impulse seizes justices of the peace as well as others. How will it result? Ten times in eleven in conviction—and that conviction can not fail to have bad effects upon the final trial. The Grand Jury, on the contrary, gives the public mind time to become cool, and the prisoner then has a fairer chance for his liberty or life.

It has been denied by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) that Magna Charta granted to the people of England the right of being presented by the Grand Jury before final trial. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Lord Coke says that the words in the Great Charter "per legem terra (by the law of the land) mean by due process of law, that is, without due presentment or indictment and being brought in to answer thereto by due process of the common law," 2 Inst. 50 51, also 3 Story on Const. 661. This shows clearly that the people regarded that mode of trial as a right, and the fact that King John granted it only under the compulsion of arms shows that he considered it a liberty that placed the subject still farther beyond the reach of kingly tyranny.

In the county I represent, this question was neither talked of nor canvassed. It is true that in some of the papers published in this city there were letters and articles sustaining this resolution, but so far as I could perceive, although ably written they had no effect. In the same paper also was an article recommending the abolition of the Senate, and establishing but one General Assembly. These articles were all well written, and from the style I suppose came from the same pen.

Mr. PETTIT. I can assure the gentleman that in that respect he is mistaken.

Mr. HOVEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I only mentioned the last article to show what radical reforms some men would advocate. I could hardly believe that in this country any writer who is at all acquainted with the history of the old confederation of the United States and the splendid failure of the "council of one thousand" in France, could seriously advocate such a reform, and yet the reasons and arguments used by the writer are fully as cogent to my mind as those used for the abolition of Grand Juries. It is an easy thing for talented men to give fine reasons for bad things.

In conclusion, sir, I will say that those who sent me here want but a few reforms, such as have been simply discussed throughout the State at large and known by experience to be necessary—they want no new fangled ideas—no experiments—no utopian plans—they want that which is known to be good to be given to them now, and leave all that is uncertain and doubtful to be tested by the future. This I consider to be sound doctrine, and I believe it is "better to bear the ills we have than fly to others which we know not of."

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as I have offered an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) I shall ask the indulgence of the Convention while I make a few remarks upon the subject now under consideration. I can say in common with other gentlemen that I feel a great degree of diffidence in approaching a subject that has already been debated with so much talent and ability, and I cannot therefore hope that I shall be able to make any remarks that will throw much additional light upon the subject. The Convention has certainly manifested a proper degree of patience in listening to this investigation. If the same patience and research shall be manifested hereafter in the discussion of important questions, which may come before the Convention, I have no doubt that the constitution we may adopt will receive the ready approval of the people. There are three features in the proposition before the Convention, and I presume that the members on this question may be divided into three parties. The proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe is to abolish the entire Grand Jury system. There are a number of very able men upon this floor favorable to that proposition; the gentleman himself has brought a great amount of talent and experience to bear upon the question. There is another party who think that this question should be left entirely to the control of the Legislature—that the public will may control and direct the manner in which criminal charges shall be preferred and prosecuted, and perhaps there is another party who believe that the present Grand Jury system should be retained, but that it should be so modified as to diminish the number of offenses the investigation of which may be brought before them. There are some considerations, Mr. President, which weigh largely on my mind against the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe for the total abolition of Grand Juries. I think, sir, we should approach with caution the abrogation or remodeling of a system which has been approved by the wisdom and experience of more than a thousand years. It has been said, sir, that the origin of the institution is a matter of total indifference; for my own part I do not so regard it. If the principle upon which the Grand Jury system is founded was originated for the sole purpose of sustaining tyrannical power, I should regard it as defective and illy adapted to a republican government: if, on the other hand it had its origin at a period however remote, amongst a people struggling to maintain the rude rights of a primitive freedom, it would be some evidence that it has for its foundation a radical principle of human liberty.

It was correctly remarked by the gentleman from Monroe this morning, that the Grand Jury system is of Saxon origin, that it existed in England prior to the Norman conquest, and although it continued to exist as one of the elements of the then rude and imperfect system of common law until the conquest of England by the Normans, it fell into disuse during the subsequent military despotisms as an improper barrier between the despot and his victims, and was only revived when at a more enlightened period the people of England wrested from an unwilling king some of the elements of personal liberty; and as an evidence that in England the right of the subject to be put upon his trial only through the intervention of a Grand Jury was deemed an element of liberty and a protection against the oppression of the crown it will be remembered that for the hundred years during which the Star Chamber, that fearful engine of oppression and tyranny, like the French guillotine, continued to do its work of death, the Grand Jury almost lost its existence as a part of the common law of England.

It may be remarked, Mr. President, that this principle is one of peculiar interest to the American people, from the fact that it was not only approved by, perhaps, the most enlightened nation in Europe, a people who have ever struggled to retain, at least, some of the element of Constitutional Liberty, but that, after the Revolutionary struggle, which separated the American colonies from Great Britain, when the minds of the American people were incensed against every institution of Great Britain, the several States of the United States, in 1789, shortly after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, adopted as a part of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, an article securing to the citizens the right never to be put upon his trial for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, except through the intervention of a Grand Jury. Sir, only four principles of the English common law were engrafted in the Constitution of the United States; the writ of habeas corpus—the trial by jury—protection of the citizen against unreasonable search, and the Grand Jury system, being the only purely legislative provisions contained in that instrument.

Now, sir, this is a matter which deserves reflection. The period, itself, when the Grand Jury system was adopted as a permanent feature of American law, is important. The men who adopted it were men remarkable for their virtue and patriotism, and for the deep devotion which they manifested to every principle calculated to build up and secure rational liberty. It is not probable that if this principle had been one calculated to build up the strong holds of power, it would have been incorporated into the American Constitution; not in language which would imply that it was intended for the punishment of crime, but in language which clearly implies that it was intended to protect the innocent from punishment. What is the language of the Constitution? "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless, on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, &c." Sir, it may be remarked that the best evidence of the inclination of a government to secure every liberty of the people, is the anxiety which is every where manifested to protect every man in his life and liberty, and to secure his happiness. And, sir, however indifferent the people of the United States, when the thirteen States of the Union formed the Confederacy, might have been as to the punishment of the smaller offenses, yet when it came to "life or liberty" the Fathers of the American Union seem to have been determined that there should be a bulwark between the power of the government and the accused, and that that bulwark should be the intervention of the Grand Juries.

There is a great deal of difference, Mr. President, between theory and experience. The gentleman from Tippecanoe has viewed this whole question, and considered the Grand Jury system as it has stood for ages past, and then he proposes to realize and adopt a plan which may better subserve the end for which the Grand Jury system was adopted, and he argues the question thus : that the Grand Jury system was not designed so much to protect the innocent from punishment as for the punishment of the guilty. Sir, I undertake to say that not only in England, but in America, the cause which originated and has perpetuated the Grand Jury system, was the necessity of creating some power between the power of the government and the party accused of crime. That such was the design, at least in the United States, is manifest from the language of the Constitution of the United States, and also of the Constitution of Indiana. In both of those instruments it is clearly not a power given to the government, but a right secured to the citizen and to him alone ; that is, that no man shall be called upon to answer a criminal accusation which may deprive him of his life or liberty, except twelve of his peers shall have said upon their solemn oaths, uncontrolled by the influence of power, that there was reasonable ground to believe him guilty of the crime charged against him.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to abandon, by a Constitutional provision, this system which has thus stood the test and been approved by the wisdom of ages, and to substitute therefor an untried theory—an experiment. Sir, I shall never be willing to abandon a long-tried system for the purpose of adopting an untested theory, unless it is manifest that the theory is correct, and we all know that the best theories will often be found utterly to fail. The elements of a government calculated to secure the happiness of man, required ages to attain perfection, and it has been well remarked that a government that has become, to a certain degree, as perfect as human nature can make it by the experience of successive ages, might be overthrown by the rude battle of a day ; that it takes a long time to perfect what it is very easy to destroy. I am opposed to theory when it comes in conflict with long established principles which have done well enough, and which are adapted to our republican institutions ; and, sir, the most enlightened minds that have ever existed ; men of the largest capacity, who have stood among their fellow-men as the giant oak among the lesser trees of the forest, have learned how impracticable it is for once permanent rules of action for the government of men in the varied relations of life, experience alone can perfect. Sir, look at the past. Even the great and philosophic mind of Locke when he made an effort to adopt a Constitution for one of the colonies of the new world, utterly failed to accomplish the object, and Plato's famous theory of a republican government, exists only as a monument of the fact that theory unperfected by experience must ever fail ; experience is the only light that can guide us in safety in the future. There are many objections to the Grand Jury, and the gentleman from Tippecanoe has well remarked that it is an expensive system, and I would add, sir, that it is said that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance," and that no government can be maintained and supported without some sacrifices, more especially a free government ; and I regard the sacrifice of money as nothing in comparison to securing to every citizen the rights which the Almighty designed he should enjoy. There are really evils in the Grand Jury system, and if this were a legislative body I would heartily approve of a remedy. Like all human institutions, it has its imperfections.

It is said that the great argument against it is that it does its work in secret. It may be answered to that, however, that crime itself is committed in secret, and that it is perhaps proper that the means resorted to by those who commit crime should be resorted to by the community in pointing out and punishing that crime. The right of the people to be secure in their houses and their persons from unreasonable search is one of the principles of the American Constitution, and yet the theory of the gentleman that that which is secret and which is not made open to the light of day must necessarily have something objectionable in it, is manifestly defective as inconsistent with the principles and practices of man in all the varied relations of public and private life. The home of the citizen is sacred from unreasonable search, and the Judge determines in the secrecy of his own breast the judgment which he shall pronounce.

The character of the citizen is sacred ; it should not be tarnished on an insufficient cause, and if he be unjustly accused the secrecy of the tribunal before which the accusation is brought will, at least in some instances, prevent even the whispering of a false accusation from resting upon him.

As I have already remarked, I conceive the Grand Jury system to have many defects,—radical defects, and in my humble opinion the system not only admits of reform, but that reform is imperatively demanded by the people. The lapse of time has produced many changes in the system. In its origin in England, each hundred of a county furnished one or more of the more intelligent yeomanry, who met together and formed the Grand Jury. It was presumed that a Grand Jury thus constituted was fully advised of all crimes committed within the county, from the fact that they were drawn together from different sections of it, and their business was simply to present crime. Therefore, the word "presentment" was used—a presentment being a presentation of a Grand Jury upon their own information, and an indictment being founded upon testimony derived from other sources. Such a thing as a presentment is very unusual in Indiana, or perhaps in any part of the U. S., yet the Grand Jury system is based upon the supposition that presentments are to be made of all crimes within the knowledge of the Grand Jury.

Every township is represented in a Grand Jury, and it is presumed that inasmuch as eighteen men are gathered from the various localities of a county, they must be aware of almost every crime which may have been perpetrated within its limits. It may be remarked that the Constitution of the U. S. only secured this right in cases of capital crime and high felonies; and it may be well said that the Constitution of the State of Indiana has gone too far in requiring an indictment or presentment as the foundation of the prosecution of every crime that may be committed.

I have already remarked that I believe the Grand Jury system is capable of great improvement, and that it is the duty of the people through their legislative department to remedy the evils which now exist. Being assembled as a Convention to reform the Constitution, I would ask, what are the ends which we are sent here to accomplish? to remodel the fundamental law of the State; to organize a form of government; to determine where the power of the people shall be vested, and the manner in which that power shall be exercised; but not to legislate. There is in every free government necessarily a power through which the people directly express their will; a department that construes and gives application to that will; and a power through which that will is carried into effect. There are three departments of government for this purpose, and they are known as the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments of governments. The judiciary department may be limited without any infringement of the rights of the people to control the public liberty. The executive department of the government may also be limited without an infringement of the necessary powers of popular government, but the very moment you attempt to restrict the public will by Constitutional limitation of the legislative power, you deprive the people, at least to a limited extent, of the right of self government. I do not care what may be the authority by which the foundations of a government may be laid, yet unless the public voice can be, and is expressed, the character of a republic no longer exists, as it is only through the legislative department that the public will can be expressed. What, sir, is the difference between a monarchy and a republic? In the one instance the will of the people is not regarded, it is not heard, it is not carried into effect; in the other instance "the voice of the people is the voice of God." I take it then, Mr. President, that every limitation of the will of the people is, to a certain extent, an abandonment of republican principles, and that whenever the body of the people meet for the purpose of framing a Constitution, unless you leave unlimited the channels through which the public will is to be expressed, to a certain extent the right of the people to self government will be limited. Suppose, Mr. President, that the people of the State of Indiana were met together as the people met in ancient Athens, or more recently in the little democracy of San Marino, to express their own will, in that manner which is the most democratic, by their immediate voice, would any man say that that will should be in anywise restrained in the exercise of the powers of sovereignty, and although it may be necessary to limit the power of the legislative department being one remove from the source of all temporal power, the people, yet every unnecessary restriction on the legislature is a restriction upon the public will. But the gentleman from Tippecanoe does not propose that this restriction shall be absolute, but that after five years have elapsed the people may again exercise the right which the Almighty has given them to enact laws for their own government. Now I say let the people govern; let there be no unnecessary limitation upon the power through which the public will is to be expressed.

The resolution of the gentleman, it appears to me, amounts to about this; that the people of Indiana are a sovereign people, but at the same time that it is not wise or politic, that they should exercise their liberty without some limitation; that it is therefore proper that they should not be authorized through the legislative department of their government, to determine the mode in which crimes shall be punished. It is proposed that for five years the matter shall be placed beyond the control of the people; that that principle which has prevailed for centuries should be suspended, and that after the expiration of five years if the people think proper to renew its operations, they may do so. I undertake to say that the principle which dictates the resolution, is an impolitic limitation of the public will. For what purpose was the Convention convened? It was to take up the Constitution of the State and revise and amend it, by changing some of its provisions; and I find that almost every amendment that has been proposed, has in some wise been found to be necessary by some improper restraint put upon the legislative power by the Constitution of 1816. Among the first resolutions which have been offered in this body, was one designed to appropriate certain fines and penalties to the use of common schools. In the Constitution of 1816 those fines and penalties were unchangeably appropriated to the use of county seminaries. Now let gentlemen consider this question for a moment. Here was a matter purely legislative—totally destitute of any fundamental principle—because the manner in which public money can be applied is a matter which can safely be left to the people, and yet in the Constitution of 1816 these fines and penalties were expressly appropriated to a particular object, and for more than thirty years has defeated the will of the people of the State. Now at the time that this provision was incorporated in the old Constitution it seemed to be well enough. There was a large fund appropriated in lands for the endowment of common schools and a State university, but nothing for any intermediate institution of learning. It was supposed by the framers of the Constitution of 1816 that these lands were amply sufficient for these two purposes, and therefore these fines and penalties, resulting from the punishment of crime, were appropriated by constitutional enactment, to the endowment of seminaries in the several counties. Now, sir, what was the effect of this provision? In less than ten years it was ascertained that the provision was an unwise one, that the county seminaries would not accomplish the end for which they were designed, and it was also ascertained that the lands appropriated for common schools were not of sufficient value to effect the object. But the public will in this matter, by unwise Constitutional legislation, was restricted, and could not be exercised in remedying the evil until the people should call a Convention for the purpose of revising and amending the organic law. Now, sir, was there any necessity for such a provision? Was that an unsafe matter to leave with the people? And yet the framers of the Constitution did not seem to remember that they were incorporating a legislative principle in it which might ruinously effect some of the best interests of the State. I am not in favor of incorporating any provision in the Constitution unless it is a well tried and well understood principle, fundamental and organic in its character, and well approved by wisdom and experience. I am not willing to engraft upon the Constitution any provision which will be uncertain in its effect. I am not willing to try experiments which may last for years, and the effects of which may be experienced through centuries, by any unnecessary restriction of the popular power. It will be admitted, I presume, by all that the manner in which a criminal accusation should be preferred, or the manner in which it shall be prosecuted, are matters purely legislative, and that it properly comes within the control of the legislative department. But it is felt that the Grand Jury system is an evil, and that the people may not remedy it, and that it is therefore the duty of the Convention to remove it. Now I take it that the same people who have elected us have intelligence enough to elect an equally intelligent body of legislators. However wise this Convention may be, however much intelligence and talent there may be within these walls, we do not monopolize the intelligence and patriotism of this and all coming time; there is and will be still among the people of the State of Indiana, material sufficient for good legislators—men who will carry out the will of the people, by adopting such legislative provisions as experience shall from time to time suggest, and as the public will shall require.

Again, it may be said that inasmuch as the change proposed is a matter of experiment and has never been tried—I mean the punishment of the higher crimes; crime through the intervention of any other agency than that of Grand Juries—it cannot safely be incorporated into the organic law and may safely be left with the Legislature. It was remarked by the gentleman from Laporte on yesterday, that the great security against crime, is to be found in the intelligence, and virtue, and patriotism of the people; and it was further remarked by that gentleman, that whatever may have been the dark and benighted character of that age in which the Grand Jury system originated, that at this time, the people of Indiana have attained such a degree of intelligence that a different policy in the punishment of crime can be safely adopted. Now, I have as much respect for the people of Indiana as any man upon the floor, and I certainly have perfect confidence in their patriotism to desire that the government shall be administered upon true republican principles. And, sir, our confidence in the intelligence of the people admonishes us that we can leave this matter safely in their hands. If the people shall require it, the Grand Jury system should be abolished by the Legislature, and if in the course of two or three years it should be found to have an injurious effect, then the people can return to it by legislative enactment. In the name of God I say, let them exercise their own will. I cannot imagine for the life of me, why it is that we must do this work. It certainly strikes my mind as a matter purely legislative; and the only argument that I can conceive of, in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe is, that the legislative department of government may not be equally willing with ourselves to act for the benefit of the people. Now the confidence which we have in the intelligence of the people ought to admonish us that their representatives will be as anxious to carry out their will as we are, and that if experiments of this kind are to be tried, they can try them in such a manner as will be likely to produce the least public injury. I am not prepared to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, for the reason that I believe the Grand Jury system is calculated to secure the rights of the citizens, and should not be lightly abandoned. I regard it as a power calculated to preserve his property, and his person, and his character from unfounded accusation, but I oppose it mainly because it is a mere matter of legislative expediency.

The gentleman proposes that all examinations shall be public, and that the character of the citizen shall be wholly affected by the public declaration of crime made against him. The Grand Jury system affords a better and a surer plan. It says to the citizen, neither your character, nor your life, nor your liberty, shall be affected by any accusation of crime, until twelve men upon their solemn oaths, have said that you are probably guilty of the offense. Sir, I will venture the assertion, that there are thousands of citizens within the limits of the State of Indiana, whose characters are unaffected, untainted, untouched by even the suspicion of crime, whose characters might have been blasted, if the offences laid to their charge by malice, had been prosecuted in public, instead of through the medium of this institution. If accusations are to be made before justices of the peace, the first serious one that is made against a citizen, however malicious, might blast his character and remain a blot upon it forever. It would, too, put an individual within the power of malice, whereas the Grand Jury system is slow and deliberate in its operations, and, in many instances, at least, secures the character from being injured or aspersed by malice. I hope from the very fact that there are half a dozen different plans proposed as substitutes for the Grand Jury, that we shall be admonished that it is an experiment, and had better be left to the Legislature if it is to be tried, so that the evil may be remedied without another Constitutional Convention—if any evil should be found to arise. That Grand Juries have accomplished their object to a certain extent, I think all gentlemen will admit, and it is manifest from all the facts which have been elicited. But that any one of the proposed plans will accomplish the punishment of guilt on the one hand, and, on the other, secure the innocent from punishment, both in his person and his character is by no means evident. I trust, therefore, that the matter will be left to the Legislature; that we will form a Constitution containing nothing but radical and fundamental principle well tried and approved, both by the judgment and experience of the present and the past. If we adopt a Constitution full of legislative provisions, subject to change as experience requires, we will find that in a few years the people will have to hold another Convention for the purpose of revising it. A constitution, sir, should be made to last permanently—not for a day, or half a century, or for centuries, but for all coming time. If it be one containing nothing but fundamental and well-tried principles of radical republicanism, it must exist while man exists, or at least till the arrival of that period when “the lion and the lamb shall lie down together.”

Mr. BASCOM. I do not rise, Mr. President, with the expectation of shedding any new light upon this subject, after so many speeches from older and abler men. This proposition, presented in the form of a resolution, for the abolition of the Grand Jury system, by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) is a new question, and one which I came not here to discuss; nor do I think it worthy of the time which has already been spent in its discussion. It is not, in my humble opinion, an important question for the deliberations of this Convention. If we listened attentively to the speech of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and implicitly received all of his representations, we should all believe that Grand Juries were among the most wicked and oppressive things in the world; that they were engines of cruelty and malice, and that society could no longer endure their presence. We should come to the conclusion that the system was a monster which it was the bounden and imperative duty of this Convention to destroy forthwith.

But, sir, upon the opposite side of this question, among those who oppose this resolution, I find equal extremes. Those who have advocated the retaining of the Grand Jury system would have us believe that it is one of the greatest institutions of the country; that the whole judicial system would totter, and perhaps fall, without this adjunct; that it is at the foundation of all justice, and that without it society could not get along. They would have us believe that the Grand Jury system is a great patent medicine—a sovereign panacea for all the political diseases and ailments of the State. I can no more adopt this view of the case than I can fly to the other extreme. I shall not decide in favor of anything because it comes down to us from ancient times, nor shall I catch at a proposition and go for it because it is new. I came here to advocate a few simple reforms in the Constitution—those reforms which have been discussed among the people, and upon which their minds are definitely and satisfactorily made up. I did not come to this Convention to abuse Grand Juries because the newspaper called the London Times, or any other foreign newspaper, abuses the system, nor to defend it because it has been in existence for so long a period of time. I confess, Mr. President; that I care but very little whether Greece or Rome, and other ancient nations, had Grand Juries or not, and I care as little as to the object of the institution of the system in England. All that I want to know upon this subject, and all that is necessary for me to know, is this: do my people—my constituents—want Grand Juries as heretofore, or do they desire a system of public examinations to be substituted in their place? When I know their wants and opinions upon this subject, then I am ready to act. I do not mean to be understood as affirming that the debate has been altogether out of place, or entirely useless. I have been much enlightened by some of the speeches upon this subject. I have heard much on the advantages and disadvantages of Grand Juries that I was not before aware of; still I think its friends have been too partial to it, and have overpraised it, while its enemies have gone to the other extreme and abused it more than it deserved. Time will show, or would if a new system were adopted in place of the old one, that as many faults would be found and as many imperfections discovered in the plan of public examinations as have been found in the Grand Jury; so that the fact that the present system has faults and imperfections, which are admitted by its friends, constitutes no good argument for its abolition. And I would inform gentlemen that however the case may be in other parts of the State, the Grand Jury in my county does not go about the neighborhood to hunt up information about turkey shootings or a horse race; they attend to more important matters, and generally sit but one or two days.

It is my opinion that if you will give justices of the peace jurisdiction over these matters as well as Grand Juries—that is, allow a given number of justices of the peace to present a man for trial—there will not be so much clamoring for the abolition of Grand Juries.

We do not want a constant succession of courts at the county seat, but the people desire that the courts should be held as seldom as possible. And inasmuch as a court of public examination would sit as often as a court of record, the number of courts and their sessions would be increased, hence I think that if you carefully examine the state of public sentiment you will find that the people of the State are generally satisfied with the system of Grand Juries.

Many long speeches have been made here, some, perhaps, to make a large show upon the journal—to create the impression outside the Convention that these speakers are the great men, and are doing all the work here; others of these long speeches have been made very smooth and very fine, to suit the ears and take the fancy of the ladies in the gallery.

Mr. President, I care not for the experience of the past; I shall not stop to inquire what they have done in England; I want the views and experience of the men of this Convention. I want gentlemen to tell me what are the feelings and wishes of the people of Indiana upon this subject; and then I want to act upon this question accordingly. Let us meet this question with these inquiries, as we should, and not, as some would have us, go hunting all over God's creation for the purpose of finding this article in a London or an English newspaper, and another in a New Orleans or a Missouri paper, for the sake of making a long speech with a great show of authority and research. I will take the liberty of suggesting to gentlemen that, in my opinion, the people of this State do not wish to have us spending a week in discussing this Grand Jury question; for in my part of the State the subject has hardly been mentioned; it has not been mooted at all. Now, when I have discharged my duty to my people who sent me here, I am satisfied, and I shall not stop to inquire, nor do I care whether the people of foreign countries are satisfied with my conduct or not.

I have thus expressed the views and feelings which induced me to speak, and to support the Grand Jury system, or at least the views which will prevent me from going for its immediate abolition.

Mr. WOLFE. Mr. President, I have not much to say relative to the resolution before the Convention; but were I to remain entirely silent while this debate was going on, my constituents might think that I wanted to conceal my views, or was afraid to express them. This is not the case.

I find that the lawyers have monopolized the most of the speaking in this Convention; and I believe that the farmers who are here as delegates have not as yet spoken upon the subject. As I belong to that class, and represent farmers among other interests, I beg your attention to the few and brief remarks I have to make at this time.

Mr. President, after listening to the lengthy and able debate upon the subject of Grand Juries—after hearing the representations and arguments of those who believe that the system is a bad one and should be abolished, and public examinations substituted in its place; and the arguments of those who maintain that no system can be substituted in the place of Grand Juries which would answer the ends of justice so well and so satisfactorily; I say, after listening to all these arguments, I must oppose the resolution for the abolition of the Grand Jury system introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). I must oppose the resolution, because I believe it unconstitutional; and I put forth this opinion boldly, notwithstanding the remark of a distinguished lawyer upon this floor the other day. That distinguished lawyer, in reviewing the argument of a gentleman who published an article in the newspapers to show that it was unconstitutional to abolish the Grand Jury system, said he “wondered the cows in the spring of the year did not mistake the writer for something green, and eat him up.” Notwithstanding this attempt to ridicule the position taken by those who believe it unconstitutional to pass a resolution of the kind now before us, I must interpret the United States' Constitution according to my convictions; for I have taken an oath that I would do so. I will not rely upon what others may say in regard to it. Some gentlemen profess to have received new light upon this subject within the last three months, that has shown them they were wrong in their previous belief in the wisdom and utility of the Grand Jury. Is it not a shame, sir, that so many able men have lived so long in the dark, and been in ignorance of the real character of our institutions until the present time?

But I oppose the resolution, first, because I believe it clashes with the Constitution of the United States; and secondly, I oppose the amendment offered to it, not because I believe it unconstitutional, but for reasons which I will give hereafter.

Although I have watched the course of this debate, I have seen nothing presented as a substitute which I believe will do in the place of Grand Juries. I have been expecting that gentlemen would lay before us a system that would operate better than the old one; a system which should keep all the good to be found in the Grand Jury, and leave out all its evils, which we have heard so much complained of. But thus far, the projectors and friends of the resolution have failed to lay before us such a substitute. I have waited upon them with patience, but I have been entirely disappointed. Is it to be wondered at, I ask, that we cannot go for the resolution?

Let us look at things as they are. When the proper time for the session of a Grand Jury arrives, the county clerk draws from amongst the names of the people of the county fifteen or eighteen names to constitute the Grand Jury. These men, thus selected, are summoned to appear at the county seat at court time. There they take a solemn oath, and then receive from the judge a charge relative to their duties and responsibilities; this charge is very often an hour in length. And who are present to hear it? I wish to call the attention of the Convention to this feature of the Grand Jury system; for I regard it as of the greatest practical value to the people at large; for it is while the judge is charging the jury that they receive some of the best lessons in the laws and institutions of their country. Witnesses, parties who have suits in the court, both the Grand and petit Juries, and large numbers of citizens are always present. A solemn and carefully considered charge to the jury is given by the court, instructing them as to the nature and objects of their office, and enjoining upon them their duty. The judge takes up the statute law and tells them what crime is, explaining the different degrees of crime and the various grades of punishment fixed for those crimes. The people hear all this, they are affected by it, they become more intelligent and better instructed upon legal subjects, and they go home and talk over the matter with their neighbors. We have in Indiana some ninety-odd counties, and thus we have in each year one hundred and eighty of these charges delivered in presence of a large number of the people of the State.

Who is to be selected to act in the place of this Grand Jury, should public examinations be substituted? A justice of the peace? One man instead of twelve or fifteen? Any one will see that there is but one-twelfth of the chance for an able and impartial investigation that there would be in the case of the Grand Jury.

But the friends of public examinations tell us that they are to be conducted openly; it is a fair, open matter, they say. But, sir, how often is it that Grand Juries refuse to find bills of indictment against accused parties? Then nothing is known of the matter, and the innocent citizen, who has been falsely accused, goes on unharmed in his business. But in the case of public examinations how different is it. There the testimony has all been heard; the party has been brought up in public; malicious enemies have had the opportunity to vent all their spleen upon him, and the impression is somehow made on a great number of the bystanders that the accused party is guilty, and that impression cannot be eradicated, though the party is pronounced innocent by the examination. And if he should be presented for trial by the examining magistrate, he has no fair chance for an impartial trial; for nine chances in ten, some members of the petit jury will have been present at the public examination, heard the testimony, and become prejudiced against the accused. The hearing of the testimony, and the commitment of the accused for trial, cannot but have an effect upon them. For these and other reasons, it would, in my opinion, be the height of folly to abandon the old system and to adopt any new one that has been presented to this body.

It has been urged by the gentleman from LaPorte (Mr. Anthony) that the Grand Jury system is a very expensive one—that it costs the people of Indiana some twenty thousand dollars a year; and on this account, if for no other, should be amended or a better one substituted in its place. If the expensiveness of a system is to be the rule by which we are to decide upon retaining or abolishing it, let us abolish our supreme and circuit courts, for they are very expensive. We might abolish our legislature also, and save many thousands of dollars annually. But who will be good enough to tell us how much we should loose by such a “penny wise and pound foolish policy?”

Mr. President, I oppose this amendment to the original resolution, on the ground that it would, if adopted, defeat the object for which the Convention was called together.

If the people have complained of one thing more than another, it is the instability of Legislation. They have been, for many years, clamoring against this, and to provide a remedy against so much instability in future legislation, was one of the principal causes for the assembling of this body. The people desire that the laws should be more stable, and that the legislature should meet less often. In a word, sir, they do not wish the legislature to be simply a law-making and law-repealing power.

It has been proposed by some gentlemen to dodge this whole question by referring the matter to the legislature. Now, sir, for one I did not come here to shift the responsibility the people designed we should bear, off upon the shoulders of the legislature, which is to sit here in a few months. I know that there are many here who are disposed to favor the proposition to leave this question of Grand Jury or no Grand Jury, with the legislature; but I trust that there are many here who will not act in that way. I hope that the venerable fathers among the delegates to this Convention, the silent workers who talk but little, will stand by me in this cause, and not shrink from the responsibility of settling this question in the new Constitution.

Much has been said by the friends of public examinations instead of the Grand Jury, about the secrecy of the latter system. Why, sir, you might as well complain of Deity himself on this score, for he hides from us all of the future; nor has he seen fit to reveal to us all things in the present. What man is there among us that has not a secret depository of his own? How many persons are there who would on no consideration divulge all that lies hid in their hearts! Very few, sir—very few indeed. There is no success in any great undertaking without a certain degree of caution, and perhaps absolute secrecy. Our political institutions emanated from that great and well recognized principle of human nature. Nature, in many of her operations, is secret. Man, made in the image of his Creator, has his secret repository. Many times have we all seen evils growing out of the divulgment of secrets. When I say that the care and secrecy of this institution weighs much in my mind in favor of its perpetuity; it proves that it is and must remain a pure institution.

Again: I am opposed to the amendment for another reason. We have been now for four days discussing the subject. The amendment proposes to leave the whole matter to the legislature, whereby all this discussion, the twenty-four hundred dollars which that discussion has already cost the State, and all the time it may yet consume in this Convention, would be entirely lost. Shall we, by the adoption of the amendment loose all this? Can they discuss the matter with more ability than we are doing? I contend that we are the men to decide this question, and better qualified than any legislature that will come after us.

Again, sir: it strikes me that we should be endangering the acceptance by the people of the Constitution we shall make, if we abolish the Grand Jury system. I say this because it is well known that this matter has not been agitated among the people. They have not demanded it at our hands, and on our part it would be too great a stretch of power. There are thousands among the people of Indiana who would vote against a Constitution containing a clause abolishing the Grand Jury. We ought to act very prudently in every thing we do here. I think there is a spirit of innovation prevalent in our midst that should be carefully guarded against. I have seen and conversed with many men who took a warm interest in the assembling of this Convention, before and since the election of delegates, and the caution generally given was, "be careful and avoid doing too much." It strikes me, then, that we should pause and reflect, and make sure that we are not already going too far—so far that the people will not accept and approve of our doings.

Some of the friends of the proposition to abolish Grand Juries have said, only give us time enough and we will present a system in its stead which will meet the general approbation. Well, sir, have not the gentlemen had time enough already? And what have they produced? Nothing at all that any considerable number of the Convention will agree to accept. I am not willing to take trust for pay. There is the able gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) who has been laboring to find a substitute for three months or more, and what has he produced? Now, sir, I am willing to give these anti Grand Jury men four or five days longer time in which to get out their substitute, but, after they have had so much time, I am unwilling to give them any more at the expense of the State.

Mr. TERRY moved that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. RARIDEN. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion a moment, to give me an opportunity to present a proposition which I am desirous of getting before the Convention at this time?

Mr. TERRY expressed his willingness to withdraw his motion, if Mr. RARIDEN would renew it for him; to which Mr. R. assented.

THE STATE BANK.

Mr. RARIDEN then presented the following:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as an article on corporations:

INCORPORATIONS.

The Legislature shall have power to pass general laws under which individuals may incorporate themselves for any purpose, as a body corporate, with such powers, privileges, and liabilities as the Legislature may see fit to bestow and impose upon them; and, after such incorporation, under such general law, the rights and privileges of such corporation shall in no wise be diminished by legislation, without the consent of the incorporators; and in all litigation, where the rights and acts of such incorporation may be involved, the same rules of construction and interpretation shall be applied to corporate acts that are applied to the actings and doings of natural persons. But no bank or any other pecuniary institution, with the functions to loan money, issue bills of credit, or receive deposits, or any of them, shall ever be incorporated under such general law, without the stockholders thereof being individually liable for all the acts of such incorporation to the full amount of their stock.

Resolved, That the following be adopted as a substitute for article 10 in the Constitution:

The State Bank of the State of Indiana, with the consent of the Board of Directors thereof, shall continue to exercise and enjoy all and singular, the functions and privileges bestowed upon it by its charter and the amendments thereto, until the first of January, 1865, remaining in all other things as though its rights and functions had not been prolonged by this Constitution; except that the Board of Directors may increase the capital stock of the State in any branch of said State Bank out of the fund set apart by the charter of said bank for the use of common schools, to such amount as said board may think safe and profitable, and, at the same time, increase the individual stock of said branch to the same amount, which increased stock shall be in all things as the original stock of said branch, except that the Legislature of the State, at any time after the creation of the State stock out of the avails of profits upon said stock to purposes of common school education, or in aid of a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the State debt; and nothing herein contained shall prevent the Legislature of the State, at any time after the year 1862, from prolonging the charter of said State Bank, from enlarging or diminishing the capital stock thereof, or from modifying its powers and liabilities, by and with the consent of the Board of Directors thereof, or from re-chartering another State Bank with such capital, powers, and liabilities as the Legislature may think proper to bestow upon it; and any time after the expiration of one year from the adoption of this Constitution by the people of the State, the Legislature may provide for the incorporation of other banks within the State with such capital and such powers, franchise, privileges, and liabilities, as may be thought proper by the Legislature; provided, however, that no monied incorporation in the nature of, or with any of the functions of a bank of issue, discount, or deposit, shall ever be granted by special act, or created under any general law, without making the stockholders thereof individually liable for all the liabilities of said institution to the amount of the stock owned by such individuals at the time such liability occurred.

Mr. RARIDEN. My object, sir, is to present this proposition, which is upon a subject of great importance, and one that will occupy a great portion of the time and earnest consideration of the Convention, in so tangible a shape that no one can mistake its purport.

A MEMBER. Nobody will ever mistake the paternity of that proposition.

Mr. RARIDEN. Perhaps not. But I was going to remark that the subject of corporations and banks would draw out much discussion here, and it has been my object to draw up a brief, clear, and comprehensive proposition, for the subject of that debate. The first proposition is to be an article to be inserted in the new Constitution in relation to corporations. The other refers to banks, and is a substitute for the 10th article in the present Constitution.

I ask that the propositions may be laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

SEVERAL VOICES were here raised against the printing.

Mr. PETTIT. I really hope that no objection will be made to the printing of these propositions. In the first place they should be printed for the use of the Convention; and in the next place they should be printed in courtesy to the gentleman who presented them. There is not a single proposition there that I can go for; but it is certainly right and proper that they should be printed. I hope that at least one hundred and fifty copies will be ordered.

Mr. CHAPMAN called for a division of the question,

And the question being first upon the motion to lay on the table, it was agreed to.

Mr. PRATHER moved that three hundred copies be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I believe that by a resolution of the Convention every proposition laid on the table will be printed, as a matter of course. I regard the propositions just presented as very important ones, and I desire to see them printed, although all are aware that I cannot vote for them. But I will now say to the gentleman (Mr. Rariden) that I am opposed to this course of procedure, because it is anticipating the action of the committee to whom the preparation of a report upon this subject has been entrusted.

If we continue to introduce propositions of this kind how long will it be before we shall get a report from that committee? The banking question is one of the most important that will come before us, and it is of the highest importance that we get the report before us soon.

Mr. RARIDEN. It is for the purpose of expediting business that I have offered these propositions. It will not obstruct nor delay the committee in making their report. I took the position in the beginning that every subject must be thoroughly discussed in the Convention before the committee should report upon it. Instead of desiring to obstruct or hinder the committee I desire to give them the opinion of the Convention upon the subject matter of their report, and, sir, I hope all the committees may be thus admonished of the sense of the Convention.

Mr. KELSO. I am in favor of printing these propositions, and for this reason. There is, to be sure, a Bank Committee composed of some seven or eight members, and we have submitted to them the tenth article of the Constitution of Indiana. But suppose them to return whatever report you please, every member has then the right to introduce and propose any amendment to that report he may see fit. So many may be introduced and consented to by the Convention, that by the time you get the article in the new Constitution the committee who brought in the original article might be unable to distinguish a line of their original report. Now I am in favor of full discussion here upon every subject to be reported upon, so that the committees may know the sense of the Convention upon the subject of their reports, and they will thus be enabled to present more perfect reports, and such as will go through this body with but slight alterations.

I hope the propositions will be printed and distributed all over the country. I cannot support them, and I do not believe there is one man in fifty among the people of the State, who would have imagined that a proposition to extend the charter of the State Bank from eighteen hundred and fifty-four to eighteen hundred and sixty-five, would have been presented to this Convention. I say it is important that the people should see and know that such a proposition has actually been made. The report of the Cashier of the State Bank was printed.

A VOICE. That was a matter of information.

Mr. KELSO. And so is this of the most interesting kind. I hope no further objection will be raised to the printing of these propositions.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I shall go for the printing of the propositions just presented, although there is no one of them which I can support. It is due as an act of courtesy to the gentleman, (Mr. Rariden,) and the propositions themselves should be spread all over Indiana.

Mr. LOCKHART. I shall vote to print the propositions just offered, and along with them I should like to have printed the following:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, the interests of the people and the honor of the State demand that a provision be inserted in the Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from incorporating any bank or banking institution in this State.

A motion was made and negatived to print three hundred copies of the propositions.

A motion was then made to print two hundred copies, which was agreed to.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

FRIDAY, OCT. 25, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. HULL.

The journal having been read,

Mr. READ of Clark moved that the regular order of business be suspended, for the purpose of receiving reports from committees.

Mr. KELSO moved to amend the motion so as to suspend the rules generally for one hour.

Mr. READ accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion.

The motion was agreed to.

CONVENTION.

Mr. FOSTER rose for the purpose of making a correction in the published report of the proceedings. The introduction of a set of resolutions had been erroneously attributed to him, he said; and while he coincided in some of them, he certainly did not wish to be considered the author of the others.

The resolutions, said Mr. FOSTER, are these:

1st. "Resolved, That there shall be a provision in the Constitution prohibiting free blacks from emigrating into this State."

2d. "That the pay of the members of the Legislature be fixed at two dollars per diem for the first six weeks, and one dollar per diem for any length of time thereafter."

I am not demagogue enough to propose such a resolution as that, sir."

3d. "That no officer shall be elected or appointed for a longer time than four years."

But without detaining you, sir, by reading them all; one is that the Grand Jury system be abolished. Now I assure you, sir, that I never introduced any such resolutions as these; and I hope they may be attributed to their rightful owner.

Mr. MOORE. I will inform the gentleman from Monroe that I am the author of those resolutions, and I desire to say, at the same time, that I presume there is no more demagogueism in them than is frequently exhibited by the gentleman from Monroe himself. I think he is about as much of a demagogue as I am.

Mr. PETTIT. I desire to make a correction also of the report of some remarks made by me on the second day of the session in reference to my resolution for the appointment of three committees. There is a large omission in the report, but of that omission I have no complaint to make. I only say as a general thing, however, that it is the duty of the Stenographer to report all that members say; he is not at liberty to leave out any portion of the remarks of a delegate without his consent, and especially at the suggestion of any other person. He ought not to mutilate the report. But I wish more particularly to correct another paragraph which I will read:

"With reference to the proposition of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) he must say that he considered it of but little practical utility. It was true that if, as the gentleman proposed, nineteen committees were organized, a number of gentlemen would be gratified in being appointed chairmen of those committees. For one, he was willing to take the tail end of any committee, although he would take occasion to say that a committee thus constituted would be like a kangaroo—strongest in the hind quarters.”

Now it will be recollected that what prompted this remark was that a gentleman near me, when I said I had no ambition to be at the head of any committee, rather sneeringly and tauntingly, as I thought, cried out “consent,” to which I replied, very well, consent, Mr. President, but I am inclined to think that the committee will in that case be like a kangaroo—strongest in the hind quarters. The remark could not have been justified on my part without the ejaculation which called it out first having been made. I hope that so far as that is concerned, the Stenographer will make the necessary correction in the original report, so that it may appear correctly when published in book form. As to the omission that I have referred to, I am quite as well pleased that it has been made, but I thought it proper to state that it was not done at my instance.

Mr. BORDEN. If the gentleman from Tippecanoe designs to intimate that I had anything to do with, or was in the remotest degree the cause of the omission that he refers to, he is entirely mistaken. I have never said a word to the Stenographer on the subject.

Mr. PETTIT. Not at all. I did not suppose that the gentleman from Allen had anything to do with it. I suppose that the Stenographer, thinking it unimportant, had taken it upon himself to leave it out. I never understood from him or from any other person that it was calculation or design which induced the omission.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Auditor of State on the subject of the enumeration of the inhabitants, which was laid on the table, and 300 copies ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT also laid before the Convention a communication from the President of the State Bank, relating to the affairs of that Bank, which was laid on the table.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson presented two petitions from citizens of Jefferson county, praying that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks be prohibited.

The petitions having been read, were referred to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. READ of Clark, from the committee on State officers other than executive and judiciary, submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT: Committee No. 4, to which was referred sections 21 and 24 of article 5 of the present Constitution, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report the following article and sections, and ask that they may be inserted in the new Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. —. A Secretary of State shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and be commissioned by the Governor for two years, until a new Secretary be elected and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Secretary of State more than four years in any term of six years. He shall keep a fair register, and attest all the official acts of the Governor, and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes, and vouchers relative thereto, before either House of the General Assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined upon him by law.

SEC. —. There shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and commissioned by the Governor, a Treasurer and Auditor, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold their office for two years, and until their successors be elected and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer or Auditor more than four years in any term of six years.

The article and sections reported having been read a first time.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he would like to know if there was any rule which prescribed the process through which these provisions of the Constitution must pass, and how many readings they must have.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that they must necessarily have three readings; that was the usual course.

Mr. PETTIT said, as this was the first portion of the Constitution which had been reported, he would suggest that it would be proper that there should be some understanding as to what must be done with it; and in order that they might know precisely what they were about, he would move to lay the report on the table, and that it be printed; and he would say a single word in reference to the number to be printed. He desired that the number should be so large that there should be at least two, if not three copies of each division of the Constitution for each member, so that, if, by the time that particular item came up for consideration, the first copy should be lost, there would be another in the document room to which reference might be had. He desired that there should be surplus copies, not for the purpose of sending them abroad, but that every member might have a copy in his possession when the article or provision should come up for consideration. He would move, therefore, —

The PRESIDENT. The report is not now pending. It has been introduced and read a first time. When it comes up on its second reading, the gentleman's motion will be in order.

Mr. PETTIT. Sir, it is in order now to move the printing of the report. Is it not?

The PRESIDENT. No sir. The Chair would remark, that, under the rules, a motion to print cannot be made when the subject has passed from the consideration of the body.

Mr. PETTIT. Where is that rule to be found?

The PRESIDENT. In Jefferson's Manual.

Mr. PETTIT. That may be a rule for the Legislature, but it is no rule for this Convention. We have never adopted the rules contained in Jefferson's Manual. The Convention ought not to tie its hands upon so necessary a motion as a motion to print.

Mr. DOBSON. By the way of obviating the difficulty, I will move to suspend the rules, that the article may be read a second time now.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that, according to parliamentary usage, by which legislative bodies were governed, when a bill was read a first time, the motions in order were, to reject the bill; that it pass to a second reading—or to lay on the table and print; the latter motion he thought was the proper one. He objected to the motion of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) because if it were agreed to, it would throw this report one step in advance of the position which, according to the regular order of business, it ought to occupy.

Mr. READ of Clark said, he feared that unless the Convention pursued the parliamentary course, they would go into confusion.

The PRESIDENT remarked that it must be apparent to every one, that the rules which has been specifically adopted by the Convention were insufficient for the government of its action in all particulars, that they must necessarily, impart, at least, be governed by parliamentary law. If they were to disregard every thing but what was written in their code of rules, they would not be able to get along with the business of the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT withdrew his motion to print.

Mr. DOBSON, also, withdrew his motion to suspend the rules; and the report passed to a second reading to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper.) The resolution instructs the committee on currency and banking, to report a provision declaring that after the expiration of the present Charter of the State Bank, all connection between the Government and the Bank, shall cease.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said, he desired to call the attention of the Convention, for a few minutes, to the subject embraced in this resolution; and he was apprehensive that, unless he availed himself of this suspension of the order of business at this time, he might not have an opportunity to express his views in relation to this object for some time to come.

I desired to say, continued Mr. Pepper, in regard to this question, that it is a distinct question, and that it is a question about which I have been induced to believe there could be no great difference of opinion on the part of gentlemen, without distinction of party, who claim to be in the true sense of the term republican. The doctrine that Church and State shall be disconnected, and that the Government and Banks shall be disconnected, are doctrines equally republican in their character.

Now, sir, it is a question of importance; it is one of those questions which are to be decided by this Convention. It is, in my judgment, the most important question that is to be deliberated upon, or acted upon during the session of this Convention. Upon this question I am ready and willing to show my hand—to declare my convictions—to avow my principles. While I wish most earnestly and most seriously, that this resolution will be adopted in some form, for I do not insist on the phraseology, I wish to say that I am, at the same time, opposed to what is usually termed free Banks. I wish it to be understood that I am opposed in sentiment to all systems of Banks, and banking that have been in use in this country I mean Banks of issue. But, while I give these as my own sentiments, I am persuaded that the people of my particular district, as well as the people of the whole State, are not now prepared to dispense with a paper currency. They are not willing to do it. They are in favor of a paper currency. I believe that to be so. And I am, therefore, in favor of incorporating one of the best elements for the security of the people in this Constitution, a provision, that we may have a well regulated State Bank—if you please to call it so, without any connection with it as a co-partner or stockholder, on the part of the State. If we should have any banks hereafter, I should wish that the State may exercise a control equal to that which she now exercises over the State Bank, and the branches of the State Bank of Indiana.

Well, sir, I have said that I believe it to be a fundamental republican principle that the states, in their political organization, shall be disconnected from banks and banking. I have no idea, Mr. President, that a state, in its existence as a body politic, is any more fit to deal in bank stocks as a co-partner, or stockholder, than it is fit to deal in any other commodity, merchandize, produce, or what not. And this would seem to be consistent with common sense. It seems to me that every gentleman must acknowledge that this position is true. But let us look at the reason for it. A state can certainly manage no department of business, by or through any other means than an agent; and it is well known, by every business man—by every gentleman who has reflected much on the subject of business, that business is never so well attended to by an agent as by the principal, or person mainly interested. A state is, therefore, not fit to be banker for this reason. It may be said that our State Bank and its branches have worked wonderfully well; that it has been, perhaps, better managed than any institution of the same character, in any of the states of the Union. I will not deny that the officers of the State Bank and its branches have managed their business, so far as I know, very well and very prudently, generally. It may be said that the Bank has made for us, at a State institution, a large fund for education, for common school purposes. That fund is represented as being now over eight hundred thousand dollars; and it is supposed that it will be over a million of dollars at the expiration of the present charter of the State Bank. Well, sir, suppose it should be a million of dollars. I can show this Convention, if they need any such information, but I presume they are already in possession of it, that this fund has been lost to the State, not by any improper proceeding on the part of the State Bank or its branches, but it so happens that it has been loaned, under the authority of the Legislature, by the President of the Bank, for purposes of internal improvement.

Well, sir, I believe the then President of the State Bank was an honest man—I believe he is an honest man now; and that the transaction in regard to this matter was a perfectly honest transaction, but the result has been that the money is lost to the State.

Now, this is, to my mind, the strongest argument in support of my position, that the State is not fit to be banker, or to be engaged in banking operations.

Although I am persuaded that the affairs of the Bank have been managed with great prudence indeed, and that a statement of its affairs will show large profits to the stockholders as well as to the State, yet I have no fancy that the State shall be connected with banking operations at all. And, besides, is there any evidence that this good management will continue?

It may be said that the men at present engaged in that institution are good business men—men skillful in the transaction of the business pertaining to banking. Of this I have no doubt; but will they live forever? Have we any assurance that their successors will be as well qualified, of as good business tact and qualifications as they are? I think we have not.

The whole history of nations and of individuals, has left us melancholy examples of the caprice and weakness of different ages since the commencement of civilization. Individuals and nations have gone mad on many subjects, but especially on the subject of finance and money operations generally. It has been wisely said that men think in herds; and I will add that they go mad in herds. If we look at past history, we shall find many thousands of examples of this; and it should teach us the impropriety of connecting monied institutions with State governments or any other governments. How many delusions of this kind have prevailed within the short period of a few hundred years; and even within the period of the lives of some who are now present. The most extraordinary of all these, perhaps, occurred before our Revolution, and not long before it. I mean the South Sea bubble, and the great Mississippi scheme, with which the government of France was connected; and not only the government, but almost every leading peer of France, and which ruined a whole community. If it had been merely an individual concern—if it had been a corporation entrusted with government stocks, it could not have produced a tithe of the injury that it did produce. And this, it appears to me, affords us a strong argument against a government having any connection with Banks or incorporations of any kind.

Well, sir, as I have remarked, if we examine history we shall find that whole communities, at various times, have gone mad in consequence of delusions in regard to money projects. These have been a more common means of leading men into madness and folly, than almost any other; and it takes a long while to bring the people back to sober sense and reason.

Well, sir, I said I was opposed to what is commonly denominated free Banks. I believe we are not at present prepared for that system; that is one reason, and I will not enter at present upon the discussion of that subject, because I do not wish to discuss it, further than to call the attention of gentlemen on all sides to one provision contained in the resolution which I have offered, upon the merits of which it is necessary and proper that we should decide before any plan of Banks or Banking shall be determined upon.

If we determine that the State shall not hereafter be a stock-holder in Banks, or in any way connected with Banking operations, the committee on Banks and Banking will be prepared to make their report, in conformity with such determination on the part of the Convention.

At present, I have reason to think that the committee on Banks and Banking, and particularly the chairman of the committee—a gentleman with whom I have been long acquainted—whom I know to be an honorable and high-minded gentleman—will, notwithstanding the modesty of his pretensions as represented to us the other day in his remarks, be competent to manage the duties which have been assigned to him on the committee—that he will perfect a plan similar to the one indicated by the resolution of the gentleman from Wayne; and I have no doubt that it will be approved if carried into effect.

I believe, sir, that there is no evil more to be dreaded by a State, except war and pestilence, than a connection between the government and Banks.

These are my serious convictions; and entertaining these convictions, I most sincerely deprecate the extending of any favor to such a plan or such a system. But my first objection—and I think it is a proper objection—is, that it is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and I do insist upon it, that the sense of the Convention should be taken upon the single proposition. Shall the State hereafter favor the present system? Shall the State be connected with the business of Banking as a stockholder in any Bank? That is the question. And I wish that gentlemen who are opposed to the Government being connected with Banks, would show their hands; that they would come out, and stand up to the question, without fear, favor, or affection. I do not suppose that honorable members of this Convention labor under any fear or apprehension that Banks, as they now exist, will ever have it in their power to injure them. They have no fear of being under any such influence.

Sir, I have no wish to create any feeling against Banks, nor the manner in which the affairs of Banking are conducted. I even admit, as I said before, that they have been well managed, that they have been prudently managed, but I am seriously opposed, on principle, as I have no doubt every true republican is, to any connection between popular Governments and Banks.

I desire, sir, that this subject shall be discussed. I wish to have the opinions of gentlemen on the subject. I hope that it will not be smothered. I wish that the friends of the proposition may have an opportunity of discussing it, and that its opponents will have an opportunity of showing their reasons against it, and if they can produce a conviction in the minds of members of this Convention that the resolution ought not to pass, of course I shall acquiesce in the decision that the Convention may make; but I do hope, as I believe this to be a very important measure—and I think every gentleman will so esteem it—that it may not be hurried to a decision until every gentleman who desires to say any thing in relation to it, shall have had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. KELSO. This is certainly a very important matter, and one that ought not to be hastily shuffled through. There is an amendment pending to make the resolution a matter of inquiry, instead of an imperative one, as at present. My colleague has just remarked that he is not particular about mere verbiage, if so let him consent that his imperative resolution be reduced to one of inquiry.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I will remark that I am a member of the committee on banks and banking, and we have agreed that this resolution, if not previously otherwise disposed of, shall be referred to the same committee of the whole to which the report of our committee may be referred.

Mr. KELSO. Then to preserve it for that reference, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. REED of Monroe. I wish that the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) would withdraw his motion for one moment.

Mr. KELSO. I will withdraw it a moment to oblige the gentleman from Monroe.

Mr. REED. I wish to present to the Convention at this time, the words of a man of as remarkable sagacity as ever lived. I will only read two or three paragraphs from the farewell address of Andrew Jackson to the American people. He says:

"The several lessons of experience will, I doubt not, be sufficient to prevent Congress from again chartering such a monopoly, even if the Constitution did not present an insuperable objection to it. But you must remember, my fellow citizens, that eternal vigilance by the people, is the price of liberty; and that you must pay the price if you wish to secure the blessing. It behooves you therefore to be watchful in your State as well as in your Federal government."

This passage, (said Mr. Reed) if there is a line of this memorable address more important than another, particularly commends itself to the notice of this Convention.

"The power which the moneyed interest can exercise, when concentrated under a single head and with our present system of currency, was sufficiently demonstrated in the struggle made by the Bank of the United States. Defeated in the General Government, the same class of intriguers and politicians will now resort to the States, and endeavor to obtain there the same organization which they failed to perpetuate in the Union; and with specious and deceitful plans of public advantage, and State interests and State pride, they will endeavor to establish in the different States one moneyed institution, with overgrown capital and exclusive privileges sufficient to enable it to control the operation of the other banks. Such an institution will be pregnant with the same evils produced by the Bank of the United States, although its sphere of action is more confined; and in the State in which it is chartered, the money power will be able to combine its whole strength, and to move together with undivided force to accomplish any object it may wish to attain. You have already had abundant evidence of its power to inflict injury upon the agricultural, mechanical, and laboring classes of community, and over those whose engagements in trade or speculation make them dependant upon bank facilities, the domination of the State monopoly will be absolute, and their obedience unlimited. With such a bank and a paper currency, the money power would in a few years govern the State and control its measures."

"The mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency which they are able to control, from the multitude of corporations with exclusive privileges, which they have succeeded in obtaining in the different States, and which are employed altogether for their benefit; and unless you become more watchful in your States, and check this spirit of monopoly and thirst for exclusive privileges, you will, in the end, find that the most important powers of government have been given or bartered away, and the control over your dearest interests has passed into the hands of these corporations."

One paragraph more, Mr. President, and I have done:

"The paper money system, and its natural associates, monopoly and exclusive privileges, have already struck their roots deep in the soil; and it will require all your efforts to check its further growth, and to eradicate the evil. The men who profit by the abuses, and desire to perpetuate them, will continue to besiege the halls of legislation in the General Government, as well as in the States, and will seek by every artifice to mislead and deceive the public servants. It is to yourselves that you must look for safety, and the means of perpetuating your free institutions. In your hands is rightfully placed the sovereignty of the country, and to you, every one placed in authority is ultimately responsible. It is always in your power to see that the wishes of the people are carried into faithful execution, and their will, when once made known, must sooner or later be obeyed. And while the people remain, as I trust they ever will, uncorrupted and incorruptible, and continue watchful and jealous of their rights, the government is safe, and the cause of freedom will continue to triumph over all its enemies."

"But it will require study and persevering exertions on your part, to rid yourselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly, and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform upon this subject, that you must not hope the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. My humble efforts have not been spared during my administration of the Government, to restore the Constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done towards the accomplishment of this most desirable object. But enough yet remains to require all your energy and perseverance. The power, however, is in your hands, and the remedy must and will be applied if you determine upon it."

These are the words of the illustrious Jackson—they are the most appropriate to this time and place, and I will not add to them any speech of my own.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Now let us have the song of Moses, after the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea. (Laughter.)

Mr. KELSO renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON. With the leave of the Convention, I should like to make a brief explanation.

Leave was granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMILTON. I perhaps have been misunderstood. I am not wedded to any particular plan of settling and disposing of this bank question. Whether we shall grant a renewal of the charter of the State Bank or not, is a question that should be left to the Legislature. But I rose to say that my friend from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) made me endorse the sentiments of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). Now I respect that gentleman very much, but those propositions offered by him are his own sentiments, and not mine. I neither endorse them nor disapprove of them. So far as I am concerned, I wish to approach their consideration with calmness; and I must express the hope that they will be weighed well by all, without regard to party feelings, and I hope that democratic or whig feelings and views will not enter into the discussion during all our deliberations.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. If the gentleman from Allen will not endorse the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) I certainly owe him an apology.

Mr. RARIDEN, in his seat, no endorsement is needed, gentlemen.

The PRESIDENT announced that the hour for taking up the special order of the day had arrived.

Mr. COOKERLY said, that Mr. Terry who had the floor for this morning, and who was prepared to speak upon this question, was unwell and could not address the Convention at this time.

A VOICE. Speak in his place.

Mr. COOKERLY. I feel obliged for the suggestion, but I do not represent that side of the question.

Several members here called repeatedly for the question which was upon the amendment to the resolution of the delegate from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) proposing to abolish Grand Juries.

The PRESIDENT. The question is—

Mr. BORDEN. I hope, sir, in courtesy to the gentleman who has the floor, and intended to speak this morning, that the Convention will consent to postpone the special order of the day.

The PRESIDENT was about to put the question upon the adoption of the amendment to the resolution when

Mr. PETTIT said, I hope, sir, the question upon this important matter will not be taken until the Convention is full. There are some members who wish to debate it who are not present to claim the floor, because they understood that it was pre-occupied for this morning, and in courtesy to that gentleman we should continue the debate. There are many who have expressed a desire to hear from their constituents upon this matter before they voted, and these would be gratified if the subject could lie over for several days.

If no other gentleman desires to discuss the question (relative to the abolition of Grand Juries) I will move that the special order of the day be postponed until next Monday morning at nine o'clock.

SEVERAL VOICES. Postpone it until Monday week.

Mr. PETTIT. Very well, I have no objections, and I move that the special order be postponed until one week from next Monday.

The question being put upon the motion to postpone, it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Randolph (Mr. Hawkins).

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing by a clause in the new Constitution "that a majority of the legal votes of this State at a general election, by a direct vote upon the subject, may extend the right of universal suffrage."

The pending question being upon the following amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Hovey,) to insert the words, "except negroes, mulattoes and Indians,"

The question being put upon agreeing to the amendment,

The ayes and nays were demanded.

Mr. KELSO. As this is merely a resolution of inquiry I hope that the amendment will be withdrawn and the resolution permitted to go to the committee to which it is directed.

Mr. COLFAX. Allow me to add my appeal to the gentleman from Posey that the amendment may be withdrawn.

Mr. KILGORE moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, enquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution that the number of Representatives in the Legislature shall never exceed one hundred, and the number of Senators shall never exceed fifty, leaving the Legislature with power to reduce said number at any time, if such reduction shall become necessary.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to amend as follows: Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

"That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, be instructed so to amend the Constitution, that the House of Representatives shall consist of seventy members, and that the Senate shall consist of thirty."

Mr. COOKERLY remarked, that he would like to have the resolution made the special order for some day next week.

Mr. RARIDEN suggested, as an amendment, that the basis of representation should be one Representative for every twenty-five hundred inhabitants, and one Senator for every five thousand inhabitants, until otherwise changed by the Legislature.

Mr. COOKERLY. If in order I will move to make the resolution the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend the gentleman's (Mr. Cookerly's) motion by referring the subject to a committee of the whole, and making it the special order for Wednesday next at two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALPOLE moved that the committee on apportionment be discharged from the further consideration of the several resolutions which were referred to them, but now made the special order for some future day. If the committee is discharged, said Mr. W., these matters will be discussed and determined upon in committee of the whole, and the labor of the Convention will be abridged.

Mr. WOLFE. It will be too early to discuss the matter, for we shall not have the census returns all in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to procure, as soon as practicable, from the Marshal, the number of inhabitants of this State, and that he further be directed to procure from the proper authorities, the number of inhabitants in each State of the Union, according to the present census, as authorized by act of Congress, and furnish the same to this Convention.

Mr. KELSO. What is the object of this resolution? If it is for our benefit in this Convention, I would move to amend, so as to make it the duty of the Secretary to lay this information before the Convention, after it has been obtained.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe that my resolution is german to the subject before the Convention, which is the apportionment of the representation of the State. We are assembled at a most opportune time for the apportionment of the State, for both legislative and Congressional apportionments. The census has just been taken by the General Government, and we have the fullest, the most accurate, and most reliable information as to the basis of apportionment. We have as good right to make a Congressional apportionment, as any future Legislature that may assemble.

Mr. KELSO. I now understand the gentleman, and I move so to amend his resolution, as to make it the duty of the Secretary, to lay the census returns before the Convention, when he shall have obtained them.

Mr. PETTIT. I think, sir, that we are anticipating entirely too much in proposing to make a Congressional apportionment in this Convention. It will be two years from next August, before there will be a Congressional election, under a new apportionment.

Now, sir, I am willing to vote for that resolution, so far as it proposes to collect the census returns for the State of Indiana—but I shall oppose that part of it, which proposes to collect the census returns from all the States in the Union. It seems to me that it would be putting the Secretary of State to a great deal of unnecessary trouble and labor, to collect the census returns of all the United States. He would have to write to all the Secretaries of other States; for all of this information has not yet been forwarded to the General Government at Washington.

I move to strike out of the resolution of the gentleman (Mr. Foster) so much as relates to collecting the census returns of other States.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe that it is conceded on all hands, that we need to get the information called for, so far as this State is concerned. And, I differ with the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit), in his views of the necessity and policy of making a Congressional apportionment at this time, and I can cite the gentleman to precedents in favor of my position. The Congressional apportionments of 1830, and of 1840, were made while there was yet another Congressional election, under the old apportionment.

It is well known that by an act of Congress, the old mode of apportionment is changed, and that, hereafter, the House of Representatives at Washington, is to consist of a certain number, and that the States, in apportioning, must send but a given number of representatives, so that the aggregate shall not exceed the number fixed. We must ascertain the number of inhabitants in all the States, before we can know to what number of Congressmen we are entitled. It was with this view that I drew up the resolution now before the Convention. It will involve but a slight expense, and as to the labor it may require, the writing of some thirty letters, not more.

It has been suggested, that all the newspapers would publish this information, and the Convention might get it from them. This will not answer the purpose at all, for if the newspapers do contain the census returns, they will not be in an authoritative form, and we must have it in an official and authorized form.

I am willing at any proper time, to discuss the right of this Convention, to apportion the State for Congressional purposes. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, will not prevail, but that the original resolution will be adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY said, he thought that if the Convention had the right to apportion the State into Congressional districts, so long a time before their would be an election under it, it would be entirely unnecessary to do so. He desired to see the amendment that had been offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, adopted.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be first upon the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The question next recurring upon the original resolution (Mr. Foster's) as amended, it was adopted.

Mr. WATTS offered the following :

Resolved, That the chairmen of the several committees of this Convention, report back to the same, the Constitution of the State, with the several proposed amendments, and that this Convention will take up the same, article by article, with the proposed amendments, to the same, and debate and pass the same in full Convention.

Mr. WATTS. I have a few remarks which I should like to make to the Convention, upon the subject of this resolution.

It has been said, that there should be no reports made from standing committees, until the Convention has given a pretty full expression of its sentiments, upon the subject matter of that report. By my plan the Constitution would be read over section by section, and the opinion of the Convention upon the various subjects, would be gathered as we went along, the various amendments could be offered in their proper places, and when we had read and amended the last paragraph, the Convention would be ready to adjourn, and its members to go home. I think such a course would very much expedite business, and save a great deal of expense and time.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the resolution was laid upon the table.

DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. TAGUE offered the following :

Resolved, That the Superintends of the Asylums for the Deaf and Dumb, and the Blind, be requested to inform this Convention, at an early a day as practicable, the number of students in each, together with their names, ages, counties, &c., together with the cause of their deafness, and blindness, if known. Also, that the Superintendent of the Asylum for the Insane, report to this Convention, how many inmates are under his charge at present, how many have been discharged as cured, and the causes of the insanity of each, so far as he knows.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to amend by striking out from the resolution, that part, which calls for information, as to the causes of these diseases.

It would be a very lengthy history indeed, if we were to have a detailed and circumstantial account of the remote, and almost numberless causes, and inceptions of these afflicting maladies. I hope the gentleman will accept of the amendment.

Mr. TAGUE. I will accept the amendment.

The question then being upon the original resolution,

Mr. KELSO. Of what possible use can the resolution now be? There can be no necessity for this body, knowing the number merely afflicted with these diseases.

Mr. MORRISON. The resolution has as much virtue in it now, as before the amendment. This Convention has not assembled for the purpose of ascertaining cures for optical or other diseases, and, therefore, it is not necessary that we should know the causes which resulted in the blindness of the unfortunate inmates of the Blind Asylum. We cannot desire to know, whether the causes of blindness in this one case, was ophthalmia, and in another, weakness of the optical nerve.

Mr. KELSO. The gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) thinks its unnecessary for us to know the causes of disease, because, he says we are not assembled here for the purpose of curing the inmates of our State benevolent institutions. Yet he think it important that we should know the number of inmates. I would ask him if he thinks we are here to erect buildings for the Deaf and Dumb, and the Insane of the State?

But as the mover of the resolution has signified his willingness, I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON offered the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this Convention with a list of the names of all persons pardoned, or whose sentences have been commuted by the Governor, during the twelve years ending on the 1st of January last; the crimes for which they were sentenced, the nature of that sentence, the date of the sentence, and the date of the pardon; also, all fines and forfeitures by the Governor remitted during the same period, the amount so remitted, the names of principal and surety, and the crime or misdemeanor for which the forfeited recognizance was taken or fine imposed.

Mr. READ of Clarke moved to amend the resolution so as to reach over a period of twelve years. He said that much more satisfactory results would be arrived at from going back twelve years.

The amendment was accepted by the mover of the resolution, and the original resolution adopted.

Mr. BRIGHT offered the following:

Resolved, That for the purpose of furnishing the information required by the Convention of the Secretary of State, he be authorized to employ a clerk temporarily, until such information can be obtained.

Mr. BRIGHT. The resolution of this morning, calling upon the State officers for information as to the amount of fines remitted and sentences commuted, will require so much additional work that the services of a clerk are much needed for the time being.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the resolution so as to give the Secretary of State the right to call upon one of the Assistant Secretaries of this Convention for any assistance he may require in order to furnish information to the Convention.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN. If the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) is right, I think we should re-consider the resolution passed this morning, and so amend it as to require less labor and time in preparing the information.

Mr. READ of Clarke. In a communication which I had with the Governor a few days since, I understood him to say that he had made out an answer to the interrogatories propounded to him.

Mr. GIBSON remarked, that all of the information called for was highly important.

Mr. HARDIN remarked, that if the vote was re-considered he should move to extend the inquiry beyond the term of twelve years.

Mr. GIBSON. Twelve years is sufficient for all practical purposes. The resolution, as it is, calls for nothing but what we want. It will elicit no information that the Convention does not need. I venture to say, sir, that this Convention will be surprised when the communication from the Governor comes in, to see the amount of fines and forfeitures that have been remitted. No prerogative of the Governor's office has been more abused than this. I allude to no person in particular; I am speaking of all the Governors, without distinction.

Mr. READ of Clarke. I would make no charge against any of the Governors, but I must say, that in my opinion, the pardoning power has been more abused than any other in the State. And yet I freely admit, that had I been in the Governor's place for the last twelve years, I might have granted as many pardons as the Governors have. I know that the case of a wife on her knees before the Governor, begging for executive clemency in behalf of a husband—or a mother for a son, is most affecting, and an abuse of the power does not reflect so much upon the chief magistrate of the State as upon the system.

Mr. WALLACE. I agree with the gentleman from Clarke (Mr. Read) when he says that there is no power so difficult and delicate to exercise as the pardoning power. I, sir, have had some experience in this matter, and, perhaps, can speak understandingly upon the subject. I think that the resolution calling for information as to the exercise of the pardoning power, should be amended so as to embrace all of these acts of executive clemency since the organization of the Government.

I agree with the gentleman from Clarke, that we should endeavor to lighten the responsibility of the Governor in this respect. He should have some one to share it with him.

The power vested in the Governor to remit fines and forfeitures has also been used to a questionable extent. And I would say, in regard to this, what I say of the pardoning power; the Governor should have some other body or officer with whom its exercise and its responsibility should be shared.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the Secretary please read the resolution?

The resolution was read.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think, sir, that any resolution having for its object the authorizing of the Secretary of State, or the Governor, to employ an additional clerk or clerks, is at all necessary, and if gentlemen will give me their attention for a moment, they will see that this Convention is entirely wrong in attempting to make provision in regard to this matter. I presume that it is generally known that the Governor of a State has at his disposal what is called a "contingent fund," upon which he may draw when he thinks that the exigencies of the public service demands. Should he overdraw the amount of this "contingent fund" he would inform the next Legislature of the fact, and the amount would be promptly voted. So we need not arrest the deliberations of this Convention to inquire whether or not the Governor has sufficient assistance to enable him to perform all the duties of his station.

The vote being taken upon the motion to reconsider the resolution calling upon the Executive for certain information, the Convention refused to re-consider.

On motion by Mr. PEPPER of Crawford,

The Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, Oct. 26, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. OWEN, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, submitted the following report, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions and memorials therein referred to:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, to whom were referred sundry resolutions and memorials on the subject of imprisonment for debt; on the extension of the right of trial by jury; on the taking of private property for public use without compensation first made; and on the propriety of prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from settling hereafter in this State, have had these subjects under consideration, and have instructed me to report the result of their deliberations in four sections, herewith submitted, to be incorporated in their proper places in the amended constitution.

The resolutions and memorials are herewith reported back to the Convention, with a recommendation that they be laid on the table.

And the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of these subjects.

SECTION —. There shall not be imprisonment for debt, except in case of strong presumption of fraud.

SECTION —. In all cases where the amount in controversy shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars, and in all criminal cases whatever, the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

SECTION —. No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders and tendered to the owners by the person to be benefitted—but such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal.

SECTION —. The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into, or settling in, this State; and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter.

The sections reported having been read a first time, were passed to a second reading.

Mr. STEVENSON desired to move that they be printed.

The PRESIDENT. The motion would not be in order until the propositions should come up for consideration on their second reading.

Mr. NILES. As a member of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, I beg leave to submit a minority report; with reference to the same subjects that are embraced in the report of the majority which has just been read. It was my misfortune to be unavoidably absent from the meeting of the committee on yesterday. Though standing alone, as I happen to do, I have this morning prepared a counter report which I beg leave to submit, and which I will read.

Mr. NILES read the following minority report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: As a member of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, I respectfully report back to the Convention sections five and seven of the present Constitution of the State, which read as follows, namely:

"That in all civil cases where the value in controversy shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars; and in all criminal cases except petit misdemeanors, which shall be punished by fine only, not exceeding three dollars, in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe by law, the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate."

"That no man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken and applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, or without a just compensation being made therefor."

And I recommend their adoption as parts of the new Constitution, in lieu of the sections on those subjects, reported by a majority of said committee.

I also signify my dissent from the report of the majority of said committee relative to negroes and mulattoes. JNO. B. NILES.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Laporte, that any proposition submitted for the action of the Convention must come from the majority of the committee. A minority has not the right to submit matter for the action of the Convention.

Mr. NILES. I must confess, sir, that I had some doubts upon the subject, and to satisfy myself I submitted my report to several experienced gentlemen, who thought that it would be in order. It would be clearly irregular except for the peculiar rule adopted by this Convention with reference to reports from the committees, providing that reasons shall not be reported—that simply the articles or sections shall be reported without argument. A committee evidently includes all its parts. And it occurred to me that this rule must modify the common rule of legislative bodies throughout, and that unless a minority are permitted to report sections to be substituted for those reported by the majority, their lips must be sealed.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the minority have the power to report reasons.

Mr. NILES. If that is the decision of the Chair, and consented to by the Convention, I shall remain content.

Mr. EDMONSTON. The gentleman from Laporte can attain his object by proposing the matter of his report by way of amendment when the propositions reported by the majority shall come up.

The SECRETARY again read the articles reported by a majority of the committee, and they were passed to a second reading on to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENSON desired to make a motion to print, but

The PRESIDENT said, the proper time for a motion to print would be when the subject should come up for a second reading.

STATE DEBT.

Mr. HALL, from the committee on the State Debt and Public Works, reported the following, which was read a first time and passed to a second reading:

Mr. President: The standing committee on that branch of the Constitution which relates to the State debt and public works, have directed me to report the following article, which is asked to be incorporated in the new Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE —

SECTION —. The credit of this State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, or corporation.

SEC. — The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt—but such debt shall not, at any time, exceed one hundred thousand dollars —Provided, that the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for public defence.

SEC. — No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of this State, except for the purposes mentioned in the — section of this article, unless provision be made therein to levy and collect an annual tax sufficient in amount to pay the interest thereon, and to discharge the debt within twenty-five years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it.

SEC. — The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws to diminish the resources of the sinking fund, as now established by law, but may pass laws to repeal it.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN gave notice that on to-morrow, or some day thereafter, he intended to offer a proposition so to amend the rules, that reports of sections or propositions to amend, shall be printed upon their first reading.

COUNTY AREA.

On motion by

Mr. KILGORE, the resolution submitted by him on yesterday, was taken up for consideration, and read by the Secretary. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on county and township organization, powers, and officers, be instructed to report a section for the new Constitution, in lieu of Sec. 12, Art. 91, of the present Constitution; expressly prohibiting the Legislature from reducing any county now organized, below four hundred square miles.

Mr. COOKERLY proposed to amend by changing the proposition so as to make it a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, the committee on county and township organization had already two or three resolutions before them, in the very words of this one.

Mr. COOKERLY withdrew his amendment.

Mr. LOCKHART proposed to amend the resolution so as to give a discretion to the Legislature upon this subject.

Mr. ROBINSON proposed to amend the amendment by striking out from the original resolution, the words "four hundred," and inserting the words "three hundred."

Mr. KENT inquired of the chairman of the committee on county and township organizations, whether a similar proposition was not already before that committee?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has already stated that there are two or three.

And then, upon the farther motion of

Mr. KENT, which was agreed to, it was Ordered, That the resolution and pending amendments, be laid upon the table.

STATE DEBT.

Mr. MAGUIRE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the State debt and public works, be directed to inquire into the propriety of inserting in the new Constitution, a clause providing that the proceeds of the State's interest in any of the public works, shall be devoted to the payment of the principal of the public debt; and also, that any surplus in the treasury, at any time hereafter, arising from taxes for general State purposes, shall be set apart for the same purpose.

Mr. KILGORE proposed to amend, by inserting, at the proper place, the words, "set apart for the benefit of common schools."

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the whole matter upon the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. MAGUIRE, who desired to explain the object of the resolution. He said that the committee upon the State debt and public works, had had a meeting yesterday, with reference to the subject which they reported upon this morning; and, at that time the subject of this resolution was agitated before the committee, and it was considered by them that they had no power to report upon a matter which had not been referred to them. With regard to the resolution itself, and the amendments, (he continued,) the resolution contemplates that the proceeds of the public works of the State—such as the Madison Railroad, the Central Canal, or the Wabash and Erie Canal, (if it should ever be redeemed by the State, which is not very probable,) may be appropriated for the payment of the public debt. It is well known that the debt was contracted for the purpose of making internal improvements for the State, and, therefore, it seems but right and proper that their proceeds should be appropriated to its payment.

Mr. Kilgore's amendment having been prepared in writing, was now read, as follows: strike out the words "devoted to the payment of the public debt," and insert in lieu thereof, the words, "set apart for the benefit of common schools."

Mr. HALL. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The resolution is merely a proposition of inquiry; and, as stated by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,) the subject was spoken of in committee on yesterday, and it was thought proper to have it referred to them before taking action upon it. What conclusion the committee may come to upon its consideration, is unknown to me. I hope, however, the amendment will not be adopted, and that it will be the pleasure of the Convention to let the resolution take the ordinary course—let it go to the committee, and, should they come to an affirmative conclusion upon it, and report that this fund ought to be applied to the payment of the State debt, gentlemen will still have ample opportunity to investigate the subject.

Mr. BORDEN. In the portion of the State where I reside, this subject of doing something toward the payment of the State debt, has been considerably agitated. I am glad, therefore, that the resolution has been introduced, and hope it will be adopted. I think it would be well to insert a provision in the Constitution of the State, directing that, when the 25 cts. on the $100 valuation, now levied under the arrangement with the bond holders of the State, shall produce an excess over and above paying the interest on the debt, that that excess shall go into a sinking fund, and be applied to the retiring and payment of the principal of the debt itself. I believe that, if this Convention should close its labors without doing something for the extinguishment of the public debt, and relieving the people from the burthens of taxation which are now bearing them down, the body will fail to answer one of the purposes for which it was convoked. And the only way by which that object can be attained must be by a prudent husbanding of all our resources, and applying them faithfully to this purpose.

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was not agreed to.

And the question was then taken on the resolution and it was adopted.

NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

Mr. COLFAX offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of separately submitting the question of negro suffrage to the people.

Mr. COLFAX said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I know how unpleasant and embarrassing it is for a member to offer and attempt to advocate a proposition in any deliberative body where he realizes that the feelings, and as I may be permitted to add in the present case, the prejudices of the majority are strongly and immovably enlisted against it. But, notwithstanding this, I desire to speak briefly in support of the proposition I have presented.

It matters little—very little, sir,—to a man who seeks only for justice and truth, whether he be on the popular or unpopular side. If his views are honestly entertained; if his propositions are dictated by duty, he should stand up fearlessly, regardless of the fate that may await him or them. Whether he shall be received with applause or hisses—whether his propositions shall be swept down in defeat, or triumph in success—whether he shall find himself in a strong majority or a weak minority, should not, in the least degree, influence his action. And, therefore, Mr. President, the question, whether this resolution would be adopted or rejected, did not enter my mind when I penned it, nor has it affected my course now. But I have thought that I could show to the satisfaction of impartial men, some reasons why it is eminently right and proper that the Convention should adopt it.

And First: It is a question which underlies all others in the formation of our organic law. It is the decision as to who shall be admitted as partners in the right to govern—who shall be allowed to participate with us as citizens. It is the first question for consideration. And who, sir, so proper, so well qualified to settle this important question as the people themselves? What better method can be devised for its adjustment than that it should be separately submitted as a distinct, isolated question to that people? Certainly, in so doing, we strike out no new or untried path. We would but be following in the footsteps of Constitutional Conventions in other States, composed of as wise and discreet members as this, which have gone before us. In the great Empire State, a majority of the Convention were opposed to an unlimited extension of the right of suffrage to the negro race; but that Convention said to the people, “we submit this question to you. We leave you, the sovereigns here, to decide who you will admit to the rights of citizenship with you.” We would but follow the example of Wisconsin, which has twice submitted the question for decision at the ballot box: We would but follow in the footsteps of Connecticut. We would but adopt the course of Michigan, the State which borders us upon the North, where her Convention has only recently adjourned. We would but coincide with what will be, as I understand, the probable action of Ohio, the great State that borders us on the East. Certainly, sir, we cannot err much in a free State like ours (if it is not out of order to call this a free State) if we follow the examples thus marked out. We do not ask for an incorporation of such a clause in the Constitution. It is merely to submit it separately, apart from all other questions, to a separate, distinct vote of the people. Whom can it harm? Whom will it injure? No one, sir, no one. Many differ with this Convention in regard to this question. But in this way, those who do thus differ have an opportunity to satisfy their convictions of duty, and what they regard as the demands of their conscience.

And Secondly: Mr. President, it seems to me that if we look at the law under which this Convention assembled, we can draw no other inference from it upon this question, but that a separate submission of the suffrage section was intended. It is expressly provided that we should have the power to submit distinct questions to separate votes at the time of the voting upon the new Constitution. And I ask gentlemen to point me to a single State Convention which has separately submitted any distinct proposition to the people, where this matter of negro citizenship was not one of those separate submissions. The Legislature which passed this law knew this fact, and I hold, therefore, that by the adoption of this resolution, we would be acting in exact accordance with the views and expectations of the Representatives of the people, who, in accordance with their vote at the polls, have called us together.

But Thirdly: Mr. President, we should thus submit this question because such a course would almost certainly strengthen the vote upon the adoption of the new Constitution. It is well known that there are, at least, five thousand voters in the State (others rate them as high as ten thousand in number) who are ardently and, I believe, honestly and conscientiously in favor of Universal Suffrage to all classes and condition of men, to be restricted only by a certain term of residence. Vote down such a proposition as this—refuse even to allow of its submission, certain as you profess to be, and are, of its rejection by a decisive majority, and you force these men, nearly all of whom will be in favor of the reforms of the new Constitution to sink all other questions in this, and to exhibit their devotion to a principle they cherish by voting against the adoption of the whole instrument.

As sworn Delegates, sir, I believe it be a solemn duty devolving on us all to adopt such a course, and to take such action, as will the most certainly insure the adoption of the new Constitution that we frame; and to prevent the expectation of its friends from being thwarted, and the heavy expense of this Convention from being worse than wasted by the rejection of the instrument that comes from our hands. And, sir, look what an opposition it is morally certain to encounter, be its details ever so carefully, and judiciously, and impartially arranged and agreed upon. Look at the vote at the polls on the question of calling this Convention. Were there not fifty-two thousand voters who said no?

This large portion of the people have thus avowed that they would rather live under the evils (for all acknowledge that there are some) of the present Constitution than risk the amendments that would be proposed in this age of reform. We know full well—we should not, we cannot, shut our eyes to the fact—that no Constitution can be made acceptable in all respects to a large portion of these opponents of this Convention. And besides, the majority who voted for the convocation of this body, were composed of men who favored every possible shade of principle—of men, some of whom gave it their support because they hoped for the adoption of this provision, and some for another, and so on. Many, very many, of these must be disappointed. The result of our labors cannot please all, even of those who voted for this Convention. And when you consider these things, you must see that the new Constitution is destined inevitably, no matter how wise its provisions may be, to be met with an opposition too considerable to be lightly regarded or needlessly increased. Gentlemen must remember how it was when the New York reformed Constitution—one of the best and wisest that has been framed in this Republic—was submitted to the voters of that State for their decision. The very large vote (I think a majority) cast against it in the city of New York cannot have been forgotten, for when it was announced it astounded the friends of reform. Other counties also voted against it, but happily it was adopted, perhaps because this very question of negro suffrage was separately submitted. And when members know that there is a large portion of the people who will vote against reform in every shape, because they reverence and cling to the past—because they doubt the expediency of changes proposed—because, in a word, they are anti-progressive, I ask them if they do not act unwisely in rejecting this proposition. By so doing they outrage the feelings of those who look upon the question involved in it as one of solemn principle. You say to them who only ask of you an opportunity such as has been afforded in other States, to absolve themselves from an apparent acquiescence in your decision as to who shall have the right of suffrage,—“you shall have no such opportunity. We have the power and we cut you off from it.” And will they not say to you in reply, “we will have none of your work.”

It is needless for me to repeat what I have once before stated in this Hall, that for reasons which seem satisfactory to my mind, I am personally opposed to negro suffrage. This position has not been concealed. I stated it repeatedly during last summer's canvass on the stump, in a printed circular, and to all of all parties with whom I conversed on the subject. But I also stated that, though it was evident to every one that the majority against that extension would be overwhelming, I should vote to submit the question to a separate vote of the people themselves, and thus allow every man to relieve his conscience with respect to it.

Sir, Mr. Jefferson wisely and truthfully declared that “Error ceases to be dangerous, when Truth is left free to combat it.” And, if gentlemen think as they profess, that such an extension is a dangerous heresy and error, and that it might sink the reputation of the State, in the opinion of some of her sisters or neighbors, let them go upon the stump, and warn the people against it.

Mr. President, there are several gentlemen of this body who have stated to me that they voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) to the resolution of the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) because they understood that, by the wording of that resolution, this question could be again and again submitted to a popular vote; and they were opposed, if that was intended, to an agitation and re-agitation of the question after it had once been settled. Now, all we ask in this resolution is that it shall be submitted once, when the New Constitution itself is submitted, so that the people may decide, once for all, who shall be admitted into partnership with them in the civil compact. And, for my life, I cannot see what there is in this so obnoxious and objectionable.

In conclusion, but a word. It has been gratifying—it has been an augury of good—to see the spirit of courtesy which has pervaded this Hall, on every side, during our deliberations. Every member has had an opportunity, if he desired it, to record his name in a direct vote upon the proposition he might present. The only exception I remember was the other day, in refusing to the gentleman from Jay (Mr. Hawkins) that privilege—and by amending his resolution so as to completely destroy its vitality, making it objectionable, even to its friends. The same course may be taken with this resolution. It may be loaded down with amendments, and thus be kicked out of the way. But I can only appeal to the courtesy of membership on this floor not to take this course, but to allow us the privilege of recording our votes directly upon this resolution, unembarrassed with amendments. It is simply a resolution not compulsory in its character, but merely directing the committee to enquire into the expediency of the proposed separate submission of the negro suffrage question to the rightful arbiters—the people themselves, in their primary capacity, at the polls.

MR. COOKERLY. The vote upon the resolution of the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) cannot but be regarded as a full expression of the sense of the Convention; and I was astonished to see the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) come forward so soon afterwards, and offer a resolution upon the same subject, and in almost the same terms, as that which was then voted down. Sir, the gentleman has tried to score us into the support of the resolution by saying, that some five or ten thousand citizens of the State will vote against the new Constitution, unless it shall contain his provision. Sir, I, for one, will vote against his proposition, and if those five or ten thousand will vote against the new Constitution, let them do it. I have no apprehensions upon this subject, sir. If we make a good Constitution for the people, I believe they will accept it; and if we do not make a good one, I will help them to reject it. I am willing, however, to accord to the gentleman a direct vote, by yeas and nays, upon his resolution.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton. This resolution, I understand, proposes to submit the question but once to the people. I voted the other day for the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) to the resolution of the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) because I did not believe in having this matter submitted again and again to the people. But I feel disposed to vote for this resolution, for the reasons given by the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) that is, in order to secure the free soil vote for the new Constitution, and in order to quiet the minds of all parties. I assure the Convention, that I should vote against this proposition at the polls, if it were submitted twenty times to the people. I am sure it would endanger the new Constitution to refuse to submit this question, and I think, also, with the gentleman from St. Joseph, that it would be discourteous to refuse a direct vote upon this proposition—it being nothing more than a mere resolution of inquiry.

Mr. OWEN. I am not sure but that I shall vote in the minority, upon this subject. It seems to me, that the practical results of the motion of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) are simply two. One is, that if we submit this question separately to the people, we shall have a somewhat larger vote in favor of the amended Constitution; and it must be confessed that, so far as this goes, it is a desirable result. With all respect to my friend from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) I must be permitted to say that his manner of putting the question, so far as relates to this proposition, is not a proper one. He says the gentleman from St. Joseph tries to threaten the Convention with the loss of ten thousand votes, which will be cast against the new Constitution if there be no separate submission. I do not think that a fair way of putting the question. If I understood the gentleman from St. Joseph, properly, his object is an excellent one. It is to conciliate the feelings of a minority. This is the second result. And, surely, any policy tending to increase good feeling among the inhabitants of the State, is as desirable as that we should have good will here, amongst ourselves. It strikes me that the proposition embodied in the resolution before us rests upon the same principle as that rule of this body under which a small minority of the Convention can call the yeas and nays. I, for one, am willing to give the yeas and nays to two, or three, or four, if they express an earnest desire to record their votes upon any proposition. And I don't know that I am disposed to deny even to the small minority of the people, asking for it, the right to be heard at the polls upon this question; or if I should do so, it will be for this reason, that if we do submit the question, its tendency may be to increase an unreasonable excitement which it were better to keep down.

No man who knows any thing about public affairs in Indiana, will maintain for a moment, that the proposition to grant to negroes the right of suffrage, can obtain amongst the people more than a very small minority. I do not pretend to decide how small that minority may be; but for one, I believe it would be so inconsiderable that, when positively ascertained, it would tend to make the minority satisfied and quiet. And yet another effect would be produced by such a vote. The consciousness that there is not the slightest disposition in the State to grant to negroes the right of suffrage—that consciousness, it seems to me, under the circumstances, should suffice to show, that it is neither to the interest of the State, nor to the interest of the negro population itself, that they should increase among us. This consciousness governed me in the vote which I gave in the committee, upon the proposition reported this morning to exclude all negroes and mulattoes, hereafter, from the State. They can never obtain political rights here. They can never obtain social rights here. And for these reasons, I think, we ought not to have them amongst us. We ought not to have in our midst a race, daily increasing, who must, of necessity, remain disfranchised; a class of people to be taxed, without being represented; on whom burdens are imposed, and who have no voice in deciding what these burdens shall be. That is my deliberate judgment; but however strongly I may feel in the matter, and however confidently assured of the wisdom and good policy of such a measure, yet I am not at all sure that it would be either unwise or impolitic—even with the certainty of its adoption by an overwhelming majority—separately to submit the question of negro exclusion and negro disfranchisement to the decision of the people.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I deem it due to myself, and to those whom I have the honor to represent, to say a few words upon this subject. I must differ from the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) though upon most questions I have the happiness to agree with him. I cannot view the matter in the light in which he presents it—that we should submit this one proposition, which can arouse nothing but a factious feeling in the State, merely to gratify this faction, which is bound to trouble the State by agitating this question, which we know ninety-nine-hundredths of the people of the State will vote against. But why should we submit this principle alone? Why not submit every proposition in the same way, to gratify the feelings of the minority? Why, sir, the people might as well come in themselves and make a Constitution without the intervention of delegates, as for us to refer every question to their decision at the polls, especially one which we know to be so well settled in the minds of the people as this is. Sir, pass this resolution, and get this question before the people, and what will be the consequence during the summer before coming to the polls for its decision? Why, sir, you would have the State flooded with those lecturers, who would not hesitate to dissolve this Union in order to carry out their principles. I, for one, cannot consent to give them the opportunity; but I am ready to meet the question with that manly firmness, which, as representatives of the people, we are called upon to exercise in the settlement of all questions here.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I rise for the purpose of remarking, that this matter which the gentleman desires to propose to the country, has already been considered by the committee on the elective franchise. I think I understand that this morning they reported back that portion of the bill of rights.

In view of the fact that the committee have reported a proposition denying this class of persons a residence amongst us, if it should be the pleasure of the Convention to submit a proposition of the kind proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, it would be sheer mockery. However, I will remark, that I have no objection to the gentleman's proposition going before the committee as a resolution of inquiry. I think he has a right to have the subject inquired into; and I hope his resolution will be carried without a call for the yeas and nays. Whenever the report of the committee upon this subject shall come up, we may have the yeas and nays upon the final vote.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) has in some degree anticipated me in the remarks which I intended to make. Whenever any proposition is introduced here, I feel disposed to treat it with courtesy; but, in a case like the present, when we know a very large majority of the people and of this body are against the proposition, I feel myself, also, disposed to go against it; and, sir, I will not vote for it, since the report of this morning from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, incorporating into the Constitution a section to exclude negroes and mulattoes from immigrating into this State, and from the right of possessing property here. This proposition, I suppose, will be adopted into the Constitution in some form or other; and, after that, I would not vote for any proposition to place in the Constitution such an inconsistency as that implied in the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph.

Mr. OWEN. I do not know what was the intention of the gentleman from St. Joseph, but I agree entirely with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that, if we submit the question of negro suffrage alone, and do not include the other matters to which he alluded, we shall act in an unadvised manner. I had supposed, and still suppose, that the gentleman from the North, if his proposition succeeds, intends to follow it up by moving a separate submission of the rest of the subject. Certainly, if we refer to the people one branch of the subject only, our action will be very inconsistent.

Mr. DOBSON. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following. I want to settle it right while we are about it:

"That all persons voting for negro suffrage shall themselves be disfranchised: Provided, There shall not be a majority voting for negro suffrage."

Mr. TAYLOR. Although this question is one which does not present itself to me in a very favorable light, yet there is more in it, perhaps, than upon a short reflection one would think there is. Now, sir, it is a matter of deep concern, both to the Convention and to the people, that this question should be settled; and I venture to say, that the Convention would not act wisely by rejecting the only means by which it can be settled. I admit that it is nothing more nor less than the spirit of fanaticism which agitates this question, and that a very large proportion of the State look upon the question as a fanatical one. I also look upon it as fanatical. I am not, however, upon this account, opposed to the resolution, and would not say that I am opposed to allowing colored people to come into the State. At the present time, I confess that I am not prepared to go so far as that; though, if the report had been made last week, I cannot say but that I should have supported it then. Although I am as much opposed to abolitionism, and the right of negroes to vote, as any gentleman, yet, when we come to see that quite a large portion of our citizens are in favor of free soilism—a question to which I have ever been opposed, regarding it as even more mischievous than abolitionism itself—a question which proposes to fix an unfortunate race of people upon our soil, and proposes no relief at all for them, is without any merit in fact; but when we consider that this large portion of our citizens—including some of the ablest men of the State—regard this question in the light in which, it is regarded in the section reported this morning, would it not be unwise and impolitic to take away from negroes and mulattoes the right of immigration and the liberty of holding property? I make these remarks, because I think it would be the wiser course to refer to the committee both the resolution and the section reported this morning by the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, with instructions to report upon the whole. I cannot but think that it would be more wise for the Convention to make a special provision in the Constitution authorizing the people to vote for or against these questions, than for us to take it upon ourselves to decide them. Although the people might decide against negro immigration, I cannot but look upon this as doubtful; for it appeals very strongly to the principles of humanity and justice to say that a man, free in other States, shall not come in amongst us at all. It seems to me that this would be going further than to say, he shall not exercise the elective franchise. I cannot say that I would vote for this proposition; but I should vote, at all times, against negro suffrage. I am in favor of this resolution, believing that the Convention should not, in a spirit of faction, oppose it. I agree with the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) that the friends of negro suffrage, although composing but a very small minority of our constituents, have rights as well as the majority; and they are looking to our proceedings here with as much anxiety as those who are opposed to them. But, because they are in the minority, are they to be disfranchised? I have said that I was opposed to all fanatical questions; but I think there can be no harm in allowing these subjects to go to the committee, and I should be gratified to see them submitted for the decision of the people.

Mr. DOBSON. Having submitted an amendment to the proposition, I will say a word, because, as a legal question, I am disposed to treat the subject fairly—to give it a fair hearing and a fair trial. Two or three papers upon this subject have been referred already, and a similar proposition was offered only the other day by the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) and, by a most decided vote, its character was changed; and this morning the subject has come up again. Now, if we are going to have this question presented, I want to meet it squarely. Sir, whenever you begin to talk about making negroes equal with white men, I begin to think about leaving the country. The substance of my amendment is—and I want it fairly understood—that, if those who are in favor of negro suffrage are in the majority, we will leave the country; and if we are stronger than they, let them leave and we will remain. Let every man be asked this question at the polls, and, as he shall answer, let it be known who he is. The free-soil question does not come up here: that is quite a different thing. But as far as the question of negro suffrage is concerned, if we are to have any more of it, I want to act upon it in this most definite manner. I am satisfied that perhaps three-fourths of the citizens of the State would rather leave, if the negroes were to be allowed to come here and exercise the elective franchise. The negroes and whites are of different races, and ought not to be placed together. No pure negro has wishes and wants like other people. Look at the condition of the negro in his native Africa. What was he, and what is he, there? We have improved the race by making them our servants; and every one who has discovered any merit has come out from that portion of the race which have been brought here. Their condition here is tenfold better than there; for, in Africa, when a great man's wife or sister dies, five hundred heads have to fall to make servants for the departed in the other world. The African in our Southern States is a happy man, in comparison with the African proper. The advantage is all on the side of those who have been stolen, if you please, and brought here as slaves. And now, the spirit of this proposition seems to be, that since the condition of these negroes has been bettered so much, they are sufficiently qualified to come over here amongst us Hoosiers and vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof. I hardly think it worth while, Mr. President, to continue this discussion. I understand the resolution to be merely a resolution of inquiry, and not a resolution instructing the committee to bring in an amendment. I am disposed to treat the gentleman from South Bend (Mr. Colfax) with the same courtesy that I would any other gentleman upon this floor. I am willing that his resolution should go to the committee; and such, I suppose, will be the will of the majority, if the Convention do not pursue the same course which they did on yesterday.

For one, I am willing to allow the proposition before us to go to the committee, and I hope the yeas and nays will be taken in regard to it at some time, so that we may all show our hands. It is well known, sir, that I am opposed to negro suffrage. It was the question in our canvass last summer; and it is also well known that I am opposed to the immigration of negroes: and I am well aware that a large majority here are opposed to it, particularly on account of the very stringent course taken with reference to free negroes by a neighboring State. There is no need of excitement when we come to the consideration of this question, since we have it in so tangible a shape. I shall be prepared to meet it at any time; and I am confident that it is the most prudent course for us not only to prevent the immigration of negroes, but deprive them of any thing like suffrage. The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Taylor) has intimated that he is prepared to vote against negro suffrage, but not so well prepared to vote against negro immigration. But in the name of common sense, I would ask, if negroes are to be deprived of suffrage, why should we want any more of these cattle amongst us? It seems to me there is an inconsistency in this.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise merely to say that we certainly live in an age of progression. I have been very much astonished to hear gentlemen express themselves as they have, in relation to free-soilism, for I am sure that within the last two years some of these gentlemen have been in favor with that party. Gentlemen who would seem now never to have been in favor of free-soilism, and would, doubtless, just as readily denounce the Wilmot Proviso, in less than two years back were ready to laud both to the skies. Two years ago there was not a prominent man in either of the two parties who would have been willing to denounce the Wilmot Proviso as a humbug; yet, in this age of progression, at this day, scarcely a single advocate of this measure can be found in the ranks of either party. Since it is possible, therefore, that the same spirit of progression might bring about the same state of things in the course of two years to come, would it not be better for gentlemen not to tie up their hands nor the hands of the people at home upon that subject? I am disposed to trust the people; I do not wish to tie up their hands. I am willing to trust them, though they may sometimes for the moment err; but, give them time, and they will always come out right.

With respect to the proposition made by the gentleman from St. Joseph, I have to say, that it meets my approbation. I am willing to venture the prediction, that this Convention will make it a Constitutional point to submit every question of a State loan to the people. Then if we are prepared to call out the people to decide upon a single question, such as the expediency of borrowing a few dollars, and to say that the Legislature may submit such a question session after session, why should we not be willing to submit this question, which is not necessary to be submitted every year, but periodically—say once in five or ten years? so that when the time shall come, if ever, in which the people will be willing to admit of negro suffrage they may do so. Gentlemen talk about leaving the State in such an event. Well, sir, I suppose they will not be tied down to remain within our borders, and I have heard of gentlemen leaving their country for their country's good: and wherever, in any country, gentlemen oppose themselves to the popular will, I suppose they have no longer any business there. But, if this proposition were submitted to me to-day, I should be prepared to vote against it, although I am surrounded by those who are of the free-soil party. And, whilst I make this statement, I am willing that every other man should act as he may see proper. If any man's conscience should trouble him in this matter, let us leave this an open question, and, if we can, let us take the stump and convince the public mind that we are right. This, as I think, will certainly be a better course than to tie up the hands of the people at once. Let the truth be free to combat error, and we have nothing to fear. Let this matter go to the committee, and I hope that they will report favorably at the proper time, and that their report will meet the approbation of the Convention. The people of the State of New York, I believe, have not suffered seriously from the success of this proposition there. I believe that some of the best men of that State are still there, not feeling constrained to leave merely because negroes are permitted to come up to the polls and vote; and I should think such a result need not seriously affect the honorable gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson).

Mr. ROBINSON. In the formation of a new Constitution we should endeavor to represent the rights and interests of all the people in the State. I should not have said a word now, sir, but I happen to stand here representing constituents, of whom a very large and respectable portion are free soilers, which party has been referred to in this discussion as a faction. It has been affirmed that those who entertain free soil views, compose a portion in this State. Well, if this be so, I think we ought to have the privilege of saying that they compose a very respectable portion. With regard to that portion of the community, though I believe they have been misled, that their opinions are founded in error, that their zeal upon this subject has generally led them beyond their knowledge; yet there is no party in the State of Indiana which stands higher in point of intelligence, moral honesty, and integrity, than this the old liberty party. They compose a large portion of the pioneers of this country. They were here improving the soil, perhaps, before some gentlemen, who have taken it upon themselves here to denounce them, were located upon it. I am sorry to see an amendment offered to this resolution, which can proceed from nothing else than a disposition to insult the good sense of this party. I say, sir, that I regret this. I regret to see those of our fellow-citizens who have borne the burden, the labor, and perils of the settlement of this country, who are the workmanship of God, and are as justly entitled to the liberty of speech as ourselves, denounced here, because they entertain their sentiments honestly, and told plainly, that for this reason, they ought to be disfranchised and placed in the same condition with the African! I say to you, sir, that I was astonished to see this course taken by the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) because I feel, that we should act here in a spirit of conciliation. I never can, and I never will, vote for negro suffrage, although I expect to stand with the majority of this Convention upon every measure of needful reform. I believe that the action of an adjoining State, has rendered it necessary that the State of Indiana should defend herself from the accumulation of the negro race within her borders. However hard this may seem to operate, even if it exclude certain citizens of other States, American born, I shall vote against their emigration as an act of justice to ourselves. But, with respect to the resolution, I wish to take that course which will tend to reconcile the discordant political elements of the State, as much as possible. I believe, that, to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Owen, would be to throw a fire-brand into the community. I believe that this Convention should not authorize the people to vote upon the settlement of this question. I believe that if the whole people were to come together at the polls to vote upon this subject, it would only tend to widen the breach. I believe it would increase the amount of dissension upon this vexed question, which is already spread abroad in the land. I should not wish to see the day when the people should meet at the polls upon the question of negro suffrage. But while I am not willing to vote for the principle of the resolution, it does seem to me that the party, which it proposes to represent, at least, have a right to be heard here as citizens of the State of Indiana. I believe it is due to them that this subject should be referred to the proper committee; that it should be considered there; and I believe, that upon an examination of the question in committee, it would be found most expedient and advisable to report in opposition to the principle contained in the resolution, accompanying the same with reasonings to satisfy this party that their rights have not been lost sight of.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) has correctly estimated that less than two years ago, instead of denouncing this party as unworthy of the ballot box, because of the principles which they honestly entertain, they were supported by the very gentlemen who have denounced them here, and it was a contest between Whig and Democrat which should be considered the best free soiler. I recollect about that time I went into the field as a candidate with the gentleman from Delaware, thinking that I was as much of a free soil man as any, but I found that my Democratic friend was so far ahead of me, that the result was a most admirable licking sustained by myself. [Laughter.] And now two years have not yet elapsed; the wedding has been consummated; the courtship is at an end; and forsooth, we are told that if the same party shall continue to advocate the same principles they did when we opened our arms and invited them to our embrace, they shall have no right at the polls! Had it not been for this, I should not have said a word upon the subject. My own principles are known at home. It is known there that I am opposed to the principles of free soilism; that I am opposed to negro suffrage, and in favor of excluding the blacks from the right of immigration, because it is impossible for the two races to coalesce as neighbors and fellow-citizens. Yet, I can allow, that the contrary view may be consistent with the character of honest and high-minded men, and I cannot say to such men that because they choose to exercise the principle of christianity and humanity, and have the honesty to show their hands, they shall not enjoy those rights which were bought by the blood of their fathers. I hope the resolution will be referred; and that the committee will make such a report as shall leave the liberty party no right to complain. If we do this much, I think that it will be apparent that we have done our duty.

Mr. BLYTHE. There are one or two reasons that will govern my vote upon this resolution. It is proposed to submit a question to the vote of the people of Indiana, upon which, as I conceive, the people have already expressed their opinion. I think that opinion is clearly indicated in the kind of feeling which evidently prevails upon this subject among the members of this Convention. Every gentleman who has spoken upon this question, even those who appear to take the lead in advocating its reference to the proper committee, tell us that they themselves, when they shall come to the ballot-box, will vote against negro suffrage; and some even go so far as to say, that they will vote for excluding free negroes from the State altogether. Gentlemen make this declaration who represent a Liberty constituency—a constituency whose opinions are most ultra, and unalterably fixed upon this question. Was not this question very generally discussed throughout the State during the late canvass? And have not the people indicated their opinion, very clearly and distinctly, in the result of that canvass? I know that the people in the “pocket,” as it is called, with comparatively few exceptions, favor the exclusion of free negroes, and are against negro suffrage. The opinions of that small minority of our fellow citizens, who think otherwise upon this subject, I respect, and their rights I would be unwilling to violate. But their rights they have exercised, and their opinions they have expressed. So far as the “pocket” is concerned, I appeal to its representatives here, whether, at the late election, they did not express their opinions upon this question? And if this be true, that the voice of the State has been heard, I ask why should it be left an open question any longer, to agitate the public mind?

There is another reason, sir, why I am opposed to this resolution. I think it our duty here, in a manly and independent manner, to take the responsibility of acting decidedly and distinctly. I am for shouldering the responsibility which pertains to the decision of every question which may arise here. Sir, the presumption is, that we have been selected to fill our places here because of our real or supposed ability and integrity—because we are intelligent and honest enough to carry out what we believe to be the wishes of our constituents. For this cause I maintain that we should act in a manly and independent manner. We should take the responsibility of incorporating into the Constitution whatever we may deem proper, and whatever may be in accordance with instructions received from the people. I am unwilling, sir, to submit to the people single propositions, independent of the body of the Constitution; but I insist that we should submit a Constitution complete in all its parts, and let the people take the responsibility of adopting or rejecting it. Gentlemen may call this anti-democratic or anti-republican; but I call it republican and democratic, both. Now, sir, if we submit the proposition contemplated in the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) any other gentleman, with equal propriety, may claim to have his proposition also submitted to the people, and generally with more propriety. For example: there is the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) which was some days ago before us, and debated at great length. There is much more reason why we should submit that proposition than this, for it is admitted by the friends of this resolution that the majority in this body represent the feelings and wishes of the people of Indiana, with the exception of some five or ten thousand; whereas, upon the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe we stand here perhaps equally divided; at all events, neither the friends nor the opponents of Grand Juries can claim any thing like a large and decided majority, and can any one tell which-way the people of Indiana would decide if the question were submitted to them! Some tell us the people would reject Grand Juries; but, sir, this is very doubtful; I believe they would adhere to the present system. And because this is a doubtful question, it might be referred to the people with more reason than the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph. But I am opposed to submitting any single proposition; for if we submit one, why not submit all? I will take this occasion to remark, however, that if this proposition had been submitted in an earlier period of the session, in all probability it would have found more favor than at present, but now, since the very committee to which it is addressed have reported upon the question—

Mr. COLFAX. (interposing.) It is the committee on rights and privileges which have reported. This resolution is addressed to the committee on the elective franchise.

Mr. BLYTHE (continuing). I was mistaken about that then. However, we have a report upon another branch of this same question, upon which there seems to be manifested a very great unanimity of opinion. I agree with the gentleman upon my left, that it would be acting inconsistently to refer this matter of the resolution to the people, and retain in the Constitution—as we surely will—the matter contained in the report from the committee on rights and privileges. For these reasons I shall oppose this resolution.

Mr. HAWKINS said, that he thought gentlemen over the way were getting very considerate in reference to the interests of the people; particularly as to the manner in which the Constitution shall be constructed, and submitted to their constituents. They were remarkably anxious to do up the whole work themselves. Willing to take the entire responsibility upon their own shoulders, of deciding, absolutely, all questions appertaining to the welfare of Indiana; leaving no question for separate submission. And they justify this course, (a violation of all humane precedent,) by telling us, in the discussion, that a large portion of the people of the State had decided already on this great question of human rights. The gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe) stated, in the course of his remarks, that this question had been decided by the people of every portion of Indiana. All over the State of Indiana, says the gentleman, this question has been discussed, and, for proof thereto, announces, in a very triumphant manner—we have discussed this question in the county of Vanderburgh,—that is to say, we are the State. Now, he ventured to say that the question, as presented by this resolution, was not decided against by any large portion of the people. He was the fortunate or unfortunate individual that first introduced a resolution somewhat similar to the one under consideration; reserving to the people the right to decide, by their vote, the question of universal suffrage. And, he desired briefly to inform the Convention of the discussion that took place in the district he had the honor to represent. Although he knew, as well as any gentleman on this floor, that, if a question of this kind was submitted to the people of Indiana, they would, by a triumphant majority, refuse to give the right of suffrage to the negro population. Yet, he had an opponent, a very worthy and distinguished democrat, who was in favor of submitting this question to the arbitrament of the people. He was a man who, being actuated by the best of motives, and alive to human sympathy, also knew well how to strengthen himself in the estimation of a peculiar portion of the people of Indiana. Long before he (Mr. H.) had opened the canvass, there had been promulgated, and accepted by all parties over that district, the very principle contained in the resolution he presented to the Convention a few days since. Looking upon it as a principle right and proper, he (Mr. H.) had adopted it. He stood pledged to the principle, and was ready to advocate it here or elsewhere, now and forever. And he should have presented the resolution if he had met with expulsion from his seat in this body. On the same principle, he was in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax.) He was not afraid to trust the people of Indiana, at all times, upon important questions of this character. He was in no wise fearful of the result. Knowing, as all must, that the people would give a triumphant vote against "negro suffrage," he could not see any good cause for so much sensitiveness. It was the legitimate province of a free people to decide all questions of importance to themselves; and this, above all others, being a great question of human rights, should be retained by them, for their action upon it at any time. If the question was submitted to the decision of the people now, he should vote against granting the right of suffrage to that unfortunate people. If he were of those who were willing to confer all the rights of citizens, in the broadest sense of the term, upon that population, he would not, under the state of feeling that now exists, extend to them the right of suffrage: they would not be permitted to enjoy it. But, for the credit of Indiana, and as a matter of right and justice, he would leave it an open question, so that, if the time should ever be, that the people willed them the exercise of this great right, they might do so without any Constitutional barrier. Gentlemen talk about fanaticism and a fanatical spirit! Tell him of the fanaticism that actuated those who favored the principle of universal suffrage. If their desire to extend and perpetuate universal freedom and equal rights to all, be called fanaticism, what term, I ask, is properly applicable to those in the majority, for refusing to permit that portion of the citizens of Indiana who favor this principle, the opportunity and privilege of declaring their honest sentiments through the ballot box. It is, to say the least, arbitrary; but I cannot but call it fanaticism—the offspring of a fanatical spirit!

Gentlemen were not willing to give any countenance to this proposition, because, say they, it will produce excitement and agitation, furnishing a hobby upon which men could ride into office.

He thought that any endeavors to stifle a declaration of principle upon this subject at the ballot box, as desired, would tend to increase anew the agitation and excitement upon which certain politicians had already rode, and again desired to ride into office.

He desired, for one, to take these fertile topics for political excitement and agitation out of the hands of the politician, and place them where they belong—in the hands of the people. He doubted not but that all these questions would be settled by them satisfactorily.

Gentlemen of the majority had seen proper to introduce a proposition prohibiting the immigration of negroes and mulattoes into this State, and from acquiring or holding property. When the appropriate time comes, it will be discussed; it is out of place now. He would say, however, that he looked upon a proposition of that kind, to prohibit the immigration of any portion of God's rational human beings, born on American soil, and under the protection of the stars and stripes, as a greater outrage upon all the principles of our boasted institutions than any other yet presented, with all due deference, not even excepting the resolution now under discussion. The one proposes that a majority may declare in favor of the exercise by all of an inherent and inestimable right; the other proposes to expatriate and exile from the land of their birth the American negroes, the only home they can claim upon earth, not of their own free will, but by force. Adopt the one, and free principles triumph: adopt the other, and a stain is fixed upon the fair fame of Indiana that time cannot wipe out.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford, said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) because it is a direct insult to a very respectable portion of the citizens of Indiana—law-abiding, tax-paying citizens. I also oppose the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) because it is calculated to keep in agitation those sectional feelings growing out of the slavery question, from which the country has already suffered much, and which every citizen in Indiana should feel a desire to see finally settled.

It may be, sir, that a few men could be found in this State favoring negro suffrage; and so you might find a few men in favor of a thousand other equally absurd notions, and who would wish those views engrafted in the laws of the State, but would this be a sufficient reason for this Convention to submit each man's proposition, as a proposed amendment to the Constitution, merely that he could have the peculiar gratification of voting his sentiments?

I think not. No man favors freedom of conscience more than I, but as all laws should be general and operate on all alike they must necessarily, under our form of government, reflect the will of the majority; and whilst no man will go farther to protect and favor the rights of the minority than myself, I am, at the same time, utterly opposed to pandering to the prejudices of political factions—factions whose motto is "rule or ruin."

Sir, the more this negro question is agitated and kept before the public mind by leading men and politicians, the more importance attaches to it, and greater will have to be the exertions of the moderate men to counteract those influences. For the truth of which I have only to appeal to the past history of the country.

No State, perhaps, is more under the influence of sectional abolitionism than our sister Ohio; there this faction holds the balance of power and rules the political interests of that great State, operating with one party to-day, and with the other party to-morrow—always corrupting where it can. They have kept the Legislature of that State from organizing for weeks, thereby defeating legislation and virtually clogging the wheels of government—inflaming the public mind, and unsettling to some extent, the business pursuits of life.

They have attained this position not from the merits of their cause, but from the fact that men join their ranks for power, knowing that one or the other of the great parties is bound to have their support to succeed, and in making the trade they always provide for their own household.

I hope Indiana never will be cursed with such influences.

I go against the resolution on other grounds. I am opposed to submitting distinct propositions—the Constitution in parts.

We have been sent here to alter, amend, or change the organic law of the State, with the understanding that that instrument when thus altered or amended, should, as a whole, be submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection. Let us submit nothing but what we first approve—let us not shuffle responsibility from our own shoulders. For one, I am willing to meet all questions and settle them here first, and then submit them to the people for their action.

But, if we allow the gentleman from St. Joseph, for whom I have the highest respect, to submit a distinct proposition, we might with the same propriety allow every delegate on this floor to submit his favorite proposition. The result might be the whole instrument, however good in the main, would be rejected.

For the purpose of settling this question of submitting distinct propositions I have drawn up a resolution which I will offer at the right time, for the consideration of the Convention, which is as follows:

Resolved, That no separate and distinct proposition shall be submitted by this Convention as proposed amendments to the Constitution to be voted upon by the legal voters of the State; but the amended Constitution, as a whole, shall be submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection.

Mr. DOBSON said, he would give briefly the reasons that had induced him to offer the amendment which had called forth so much criticism from members. He had thrown it out merely to show how a minority could be annoyed as well as the majority. Gentlemen had declared that we had met this question at the very threshold with insult, and had treated its friends uncourteously. The various propositions in relation to negro suffrage and their emigration into the State had been discussed and referred to appropriate committees, and reported upon to the Convention, and he considered if there was any insult offered, it was to the majority in bringing forward these propositions again and again that had already been acted upon, merely for the purpose of making political capital. He had offered his resolution then, merely to show the minority that there were means for annoying them as well as the majority. He apprehended that there was not a member on that floor in favor of negro suffrage, and if he was mistaken he would like to be corrected. Will any member rise in his place and declare that he will vote for negro suffrage?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No one—no one.

Mr. DOBSON. There is no one here in favor of giving negroes the right of suffrage. What was all this discussion about then? It was already evident that the present discussion upon these subjects was kept up for political purposes. Certain members (alluding to Robinson and Kilgore) had charged leading democrats with billing and cooing with the abolitionists, alleging that they formerly dare not denounce the Wilmot Proviso, but were now coming forward and disavowing ever having favored that clique.

Without admitting the justice of the charge, Mr. DOBSON said, the question here presented and that of the Wilmot Proviso was wholly different; one had no connection with the other. He was opposed to slavery; opposed to extending it over our newly acquired territory; but, at the same time, he was opposed to making our State the receptacle for all the free negroes in the Union, and of all the broke down and worthless slaves in the South, that might be turned loose upon us, by holding out the idea to them that we would give them all the privileges of the white citizen—making them our equals in every particular.

If gentlemen have no desire to give negroes the privilege of voting, why continue to press the question one, two, three, and perhaps more times.

The gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) was very good to this same abolition party—he proposes to let them vote once—why not keep the subject open to agitation, and let them vote at every August election? If sincere, such is the step he should take, and not after one trial block the game against them for all time to come.

He had only to say that if the minority were desirous of making political capital out of these questions, there was another side to the question, and that was that the same course could be pursued by the majority, and perhaps with greater success. Nevertheless, he had no idea that such a plan would be resorted to. Resolutions and petitions of the character, like that now presented, had been referred to the appropriate committee, and by that committee been reported upon, and he doubted not it would be settled in a manner satisfactory. It was granted, or appeared to be granted, on all hands, that the Convention, as well as the people, were almost unanimously opposed to negro suffrage—if this were so, and they all knew the fact, of what use was it to consume their time in useless and worse than useless discussion on the subject? The subject had been discussed throughout the State, and the people of the State had instructed their delegates here to vote upon the question and all that remained for them to do was to insert in the Constitution that was to be submitted to the people, an article prohibiting the right of negroes to vote at the polls. Any further discussion of the question now or on the passage of a proposition to give it to the people in a distinct form for their vote—was unnecessary.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) in regard to the idea of gentlemen leaving the State rather than to live on an equality with negroes, he did not know that the State would suffer a very serious loss if both of them were to leave—the State probably, could get along very well without either of them [laughter and cries of "consent."] He had asked leave of absence for fifty-six hours from the Convention for the gentleman from Delaware, and he could not but think if he had asked it in sober verity, to the end of the session, that it would have been granted, and that he could have been very well spared during the remainder of the session.

To speak seriously in regard to a portion of this matter at issue, he must object to this idea of submitting separate propositions in connection with the Constitution, for the people to vote upon. The people had sent them there to form a new Constitution entire—a Constitution better than the old one, and all that it was their duty to do, was to enact such a Constitution, and submit it to the people for adoption or rejection.

He could get up forty propositions to submit in a distinct form to the people, if they were to allow the principle in this instance. Every gentleman knew that the people would vote down the principle of negro suffrage, then why submit it in a distinct form at the polls? He would now withdraw his proposition, or amendment, for fear that some gentleman might think seriously of it; he had merely offered it to let gentlemen know that if they were disposed to annoy or give provocation in regard to any subject they could be paid back in their own coin. The negroes had his sympathy—he was sorry for them, but he could not consent to place them on an equality with the whites; we should hold out no inducements to bring them here—but rather hold out inducements for those that are here to leave in a reasonable time, induce them to go back to Africa—they will take with them the Bible, and a knowledge of our Institutions—they will ultimately occupy all that country and become a prosperous and happy people.

Mr. BERRY offered the following amendment:

Strike out from the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following, viz: "That the committee on the elective franchise, &c., be instructed to report a provision for the new Constitution, providing that negroes and mulattoes shall be voters at all elections in this State."

Mr. B. said, that having offered the amendment which he had, he deemed it but justice to his constituents, his colleagues, and himself, to say that they were all opposed to the extension of the right of suffrage to any portion of the colored population, and his only object in offering the amendment was to enable gentlemen to vote on the question, in so tangible a manner, that their constituents could properly understand them, and determine the necessity and propriety of referring the resolution. When the question should be taken upon the adoption of his amendment he should demand the yeas and nays, and vote no.

Mr. MAGUIRE observed, that he desired to make a brief explanation in regard to the course he had pursued a few days ago, in reference to this question, when a resolution of similar import was proposed by the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) in order that the motives which influenced him might not be misunderstood. It will be recollected, said he, that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey,) offered an amendment to that resolution, which, if adopted, would defeat the object contemplated by the mover of the resolution, and he had voted in favor of laying the amendment on the table, for the purpose of enabling the mover to have a direct vote on his own proposition.

He wished to say that he had always voted for resolutions which contemplated simply an inquiry into the expediency of proposed measures, and this he thought he should still do, provided the resolutions are respectful in their character. This he thought was due, as a matter of courtesy, to gentlemen who offer propositions, and in no wise committed him to the support of measures embraced in the resolutions. The inquiry could do no harm, and if deemed inexpedient by the committee to which it may be referred they will report against it, and that is generally the end of the matter. Sometimes gentlemen feel bound to introduce matters for the consideration of the Convention, when they are satisfied that a majority of the members are opposed to the object of the inquiry, and sometimes indeed when they may themselves be opposed to it. The resolution of the gentleman from Jay was respectful in its terms, and he had a right to introduce it; and if the Convention chose to refuse the liberty to have the matter inquired into, it was still due to him that the vote should be taken upon his own proposition, and not compel him, by an amendment which destroyed its object, to vote against his own resolution. Besides, he thought it was better to permit it to be adopted without opposition, and if the committee should have made a report which did not meet the views of the Convention, action could then have been taken and a fair opportunity presented for a test vote, without involving the question of courtesy. The demand of the yeas and nays never determines the sense of a deliberative body, as to the merits of a measure when the proposition is in the shape of an inquiry, and hence the call of them in such cases is calculated to embarrass members, and subject them to misapprehension. My constituents, said Mr. M., are opposed to extending the right of suffrage to colored persons, and they knew he concurred with them in opinion. Whilst he was utterly opposed to the further extension of slavery, and was far from wishing to oppress the colored man, he did not think that any purpose of usefulness or humanity would be answered by conferring upon them, in the present state of public sentiment, the right of suffrage.

Having said thus much in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Jay, he would briefly allude to the resolution now under consideration. If this were an original proposition he should feel constrained, for the reasons previously stated, to vote in favor of its adoption. He must say, however, that he regretted its introduction again, and he would be glad if the gentleman could, consistently with his sense of duty, and his obligations to his constituents, withdraw it. The question had already been settled by a decisive vote that an inquiry into the subject matter of the resolution was no deemed expedient. It must be apparent that it operates as a fire-brand, producing unpleasant excitement and disturbing that harmony and tranquility which it would be desirable always to see prevail in the discharge of the important and responsible duties with which this Convention is charged. The re-introduction of the same matter already decided against, could not, as he could perceive, be productive of any beneficial consequences. The resolution, it is true, proposes only an inquiry into the expediency of the measure, and that measure proposes only the submission of a question to the people for their consideration and determination. If this Convention were, by consent, to determine that that question should be separately submitted to the people to be voted upon by them, that would by no means subject the members to the charge of being in favor of negro suffrage. It would only manifest a deference to the will of the people, and a confidence in their judgment and capacity for self-government, which we all profess to entertain. That the people, with their present feelings on the subject, would vote down the proposition by an immense majority, is not at all doubtful.

If the Convention should insert in the Constitution a general clause by which the Legislature might be permitted, under wholesome restrictions, to propose to the people propositions for such amendments as in the progress of things may seem to be demanded, (and he thought it would be proper to do so,) that would afford an opportunity, if at any time it should be deemed advisable, to submit this or any other question to the people.

He concluded by saying, that while he disliked very much to vote against a resolution of inquiry, couched as this one is in respectful language, and introduced by a gentleman for whom he had much respect, he could but feel regret that so exciting a subject should be a second time brought before the Convention, after it had been determined by so large a majority that it was not a proper matter for consideration.

Mr. COLFAX remarked that, so far as imputations of unworthy motives were thrown out by one or two gentlemen who had spoken upon this subject, he should not attempt, as he did not desire, to answer them. Members, of course, had the right to suspect the motives which prompted acts of others. They had a right, perhaps, to suppose that they were governed by any thing else but duty. But, said Mr. C., when such remarks are indulged in, I shall not attempt to refute or to reply to them. Conceding to every gentleman in this Hall that his course is prompted by honorable aims and by clear convictions of duty, I shall not assail or impugn their motives, however widely I may differ from them. And it is for them to decide whether they will treat others who differ with them, twith the same respect.

I need not repeat the reasons for the introduction of this resolution. They were given but an hour or two since. It has been presented, not because those who favor it are themselves friendly to negro suffrage, but because they believe the adoption of the course suggested by it would give more general satisfaction to those in favor of that extension, and would strengthen the vote upon the adoption of the reforms in the main instrument which this Convention will doubtless approve and present to the people. But if the Convention did not see fit to allow the reference of this simple inquiry, there was of course no remedy. The minority would not reply in a similar manner; for, believing as was wisely said a few days since by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) that there were perhaps ten questions worthy of examination and inquiry, to every one that was worthy of adoption, they would make no resistance to the fullest inquiry on all subjects, even though they might differ in the widest degree from the views of their movers.

Mr. President, there has been some complaint by gentlemen on the other side, in regard to the time occupied in the discussion of this question. Who, sir, is responsible for this? If the resolution under discussion had been an imperative one, in which the principle itself was to be decided by a test vote, the charge might more properly have been made. But, sir, it has been gentlemen on the other side, who have led this debate into the channel where it now is. They had debated the motion almost as if it were an article of the Constitution, reported by the committee, and this question, now to be taken, was upon its final passage. And they had also endeavored to make its adoption a test question, as it should not be. I endeavored, in presenting it, to avoid a line of argument which would provoke a long discussion or inflame prejudice; briefly stating the reasons which prompted the resolution of inquiry. And I stated then, as I state again, that we do not wish to weary this body with a discussion of this question that seems to them so unpalatable. But we do desire, and we do demand, the privilege of placing ourselves upon the record as being favorable to a proposed distinct vote of the people upon this question. True, gentlemen who seem specially to dislike any allusion to the colored race, except it is from their own stand-point of hostility, complain that this same proposition has been made two, three, four times already, and that the Convention is thus weary of it. I take issue with them or this, for the very reverse is the case. The proposition, the only other one at all akin to this, of my friend from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) differed materially from mine. It, as must be remembered, proposed that the question might be taken whenever the Legislature might direct, and, by inference, as often as they might direct. Whereas the one under discussion, following the precedents of other States, only contemplates one submission of the question, to be at the very time when the new Constitution itself is voted upon. And, sir, this is the first, the very first, resolution of this kind which has been presented.

How, Mr. President, has it been met? At the very threshold it encountered the strongest, most determined, and, I might almost say, bitter opposition. Every appeal has been made by its opponents that could tend to its rejection. No argument has been left unused that would excite prejudice against it or its supporters. And the free-soil party who, though small in numerical strength, number in their ranks as high-minded and honorable men as any upon this floor, and who have the right, as American citizens, to have their course considered as based upon what they believe to be their duty, have been dragged in here to be abused and denounced.

And what great boon did we ask? We asked the bare privilege of recording our votes upon this proposition, unembarrassed by amendments and provisos, which would vary it from its original language and intent. This privilege had been extended to all other members, upon all other questions, when they desired it. It may be refused now. Some two or three amendments have been proposed or suggested to prevent the attainment of this object. All appeals to the courtesy or magnanimity of gentlemen upon the other side may be fruitless. But, if they are, it will only be another proof of the fact which history and experience teach us, that majorities, not always just, are often tyrannical.

Let us pause, gentlemen, and look back at the course pursued by those who differ with you.

Resolution after resolution was introduced, either expressly advocating or looking to the prevention of the immigration of free blacks into the State. How were they treated? Was there a solitary word of objection raised against their being received and referred to an appropriate committee? Was there an attempt made to prevent or to hinder the fullest investigation of that great question, which involves vital interests of humanity? No, sir, no. All opposition was reserved till the friends of that measure had had time to mature their views, and present them, in an article, to the Convention. This is what we deemed courtesy required, nay, demanded. But a different measure of it has been meted out by gentlemen on the other side. No sooner was the proposition of the gentleman from Jay before the House, than an amendment was proposed to it, and subsequently adopted, which destroyed all its vitality. And no sooner was this resolution introduced than it is met by amendments, in spite of all appeals to the contrary, and those who dare to defend it have their course sneered at, and their motives impugned.

Sir, if men are to regulate their course by the amount of favor and laudation with which their propositions are received, there would be little progress in the world, and less reform. How was the proposition for taking the election of Judges from the corrupt system of legislative elections and giving it to the people, at first received? Only with sneers and hisses. Its author was a mere demagogue, of course, endeavoring to flatter the people for their votes—so the argument ran—and the plan that he proposed was unsafe, and dangerous to the independence of the judiciary. But he knew that sneers were not arguments, and he persisted. And where is that reform now? Where stands the man in this hall who dare raise his voice against it? And what does experience, that wise teacher, tell us of the result of that experiment in the States which have tried it. Look, sir, also, at the manner in which that wise reform of the freedom of the public lands to actual settlers was received, when first presented for public consideration. Its advocates were denounced—branded as agrarians—their principles derided, and they themselves held up to contempt and scorn. But, I rejoice to say, they faltered not. And where is that principle now? Borne on the rising, swelling tide of public approval, it is destined in a few short months, or years at farthest, to become the permanent and established policy of our country. From such lessons as these, I have learned to follow wherever duty leads, regardless of what may be the temporary verdict upon the question, and I shall not shrink here or now from any responsibility I have assumed.

It has been triumphantly declared by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson) that there was no member upon this floor who dared to rise and avow himself personally, in favor of negro suffrage. He had asked, and re-echoed the question, "where is the man—let him show himself!" Unfortunately, for what was doubtless intended as the remainder of the gentleman's argument, no one replied. And he went on to argue therefore, that, as there was no one here in favor of that extension, it was ridiculous to submit it to the people. But, sir, is it indeed true, as appears to be assumed, that we are the people; and that if none of us favor a proposition, its advocates among the masses are too inconsiderable to be counted or noticed? Do one hundred and fifty men, sitting within the bar of this Hall, constitute the People of Indiana, or at least, that portion only entitled to respect or regard? Why, sir, each one of us, with few exceptions, but barely represents the majority of his immediate constituents. They were voted for only by that majority—their views differ, perhaps widely, from large, and respectable and intelligent minorities. We can only claim, therefore, to be the mouth-pieces—the chosen delegates, of these majorities; for the minorities had no part or lot in our selection; and we come here really against their will. Thus, sir, these minorities are unheard upon this floor. But have they no rights? Even though they may have no man to speak for them here, are they not part and parcel of the whole people of the State of Indiana, for whose interests we should labor, and whose rights we should endeavor to protect, and not to trample upon. Even though there may be no man here who is in favor of universal suffrage, is it not well known that there are thousands of respectable citizens in the State who are in favor of it? And they are not confined either to the Free Soil party. I found while canvassing, prominent citizens, not belonging to the third party, who warmly advocated it, one, in particular, now in my mind, who is confessedly one of the most influential members of the Democratic party, who had held office, and had been a popular candidate, too, on that side of the question but very recently, who told me, and had spoken of it too, openly, that, if the question was submitted to the people, he should unquestionably vote in its favor. There were several thousands, undoubtedly, outside of the Free Soil party who were advocates of this principle.

It is needless to occupy the attention of this Convention longer. From all the indications, it has been prejudged that this matter should not go to a committee, and I do not wish to weary the patience of those who have at least, given me an attentive hearing. I have been gratified at the exhibitions of real courtesy that have so frequently been witnessed in this Hall, since the commencement of the session. And notwithstanding the fate that probably awaits my motion, which will be aided too, by gentlemen who, though disposed perhaps, to give it a reference, feel that they have the strong feelings of a constituency to represent and carry out, I shall myself, so far as my action is concerned, endeavor to cultivate and to assist in increasing that spirit of courtesy, which so essentially aids in producing harmony and kindly feelings amongst the Delegates in this Hall.

Pending the question, on motion,
The Convention adjourned until 9 o'clock on Monday.

MONDAY, Oct. 28, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BABB.

Mr. BORDEN presented the petition of certain persons of color residing in Allen county, in this State. He felt bound, he said, to state the fact that the petition was from colored persons, that the House might not be deceived; as he believed it was the first petition of the kind that had been received from a class of persons who were not legal voters.

He also presented a petition from certain inhabitants of Steuben county, on behalf of the colored race.

The petitions were read by the Secretary.

Mr. KELSO said, he supposed a final disposition might as well be made of this matter at once. It might as well be at once determined whether they would have any thing to do with petitions of this character or not. He would move that the petitions be not received.

Mr. PETTIT said, he should not vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) to reject the petition. I shall not, said Mr. Pettit, vote to reject or refuse to receive any petition that is sent here by any persons or by any individual who can either sign a petition for himself or get anybody to do it for him. At the same time, I certainly shall be as far from granting the prayer of these petitions as any one can be.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, he would suggest to the gentleman from Switzerland that these petitions had better lie on the table. Unless the gentleman desired to make some remarks, he would move that they be laid upon the table.

Mr. KELSO said, he had no particular solicitude on the subject. His only purpose in making the motion was to settle the matter at once, and to let it be clearly understood that the Convention was not disposed to receive petitions of this character; but there was another question which would necessarily arise, and that was, whether the emigration of blacks into the State could be prevented. And the decision of that question would turn upon the question whether they were citizens or not. If they were not citizens, they had no right to petition; the provision of the Constitution of the United States respecting the right to petition, was applicable only to citizens, who were authorized by it to assemble together in a peaceable manner and petition Congress or the Legislature for a redress of grievances, and if they were citizens, he apprehended the Constitution of the United States would nevertheless be found to interpose obstacles to the admission of petitions from that class of people. He made these suggestions from the desire he felt that this question should be disposed of; but as he did not desire that the free action of the Convention should be impeded, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the petitions be laid upon the table. At the request of Mr. Borden, however, he withdrew the motion for the present.

Mr. BORDEN said, he had another petition of the same character to present, and it was his intention to submit a motion or resolution for the reference of all of them, with definite instructions, to a committee. Such a resolution, being imperative, the matter would lie over one day. In the event, however, that the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph should be adopted, he intended to move that the petitions be referred to the same committee to which that gentleman proposed to refer the subject.

Several MEMBERS. Let the subject lie over until the other question is disposed of.

Mr. BORDEN. Very well. I have no objection that it should lie upon the table for the present. If the Convention will extend to me the courtesy to take the subject from the table when the other matter shall have been disposed of, I will consent that the petitions shall lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON renewed the motion that the petitions be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN then presented another petition, and it having been read by the Secretary, he moved that it also be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Scott requested the gentleman from Allen to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable him to submit a remark.

Mr. BORDEN withdrew the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Scott said, he desired simply to remark that it seemed to him that it would be perfectly useless for the Convention to receive petitions of this character. They could take no action upon them. It occurred to him that they were in violation of the Constitution of the United States. A petition of a similar character, said Mr. S., was presented here a few days ago, purporting to be from the denomination of Christians called Baptists. I have as much sympathy for them as for any other denomination of Christians; but when I see them presenting petitions here in open violation of the Constitution of the United States, I must withhold my assent to the reception of such petitions. I have no sympathy with any such measure as they ask for. If the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) would consent, I should like to see a motion made to reject the petitions.

Mr. DOBSON said, he thought they should at least admonish those who were sending these petitions here, that it was not proper that they should continue to send them. He would make no motion on the subject, however. The petitions that he referred to were those which were gotten up and signed by religious sects, and forwarded to this body as expressing the wishes of such religious sects or societies. The people of the State, said Mr. D., have a right to petition in their capacity as citizens; but when churches or religious denominations, in a body, sign petitions and send them up here, I think they are going counter to the spirit and genius of our institutions; it is altogether wrong. They are not recognized as such societies by our laws, and institutions. I did not rise, sir, to make any motion, nor to make an objection to the course proposed to be taken, but merely to offer the suggestion that I have made in reference to this class of petitions.

Mr. BORDEN. I think my friend is mistaken, when he says that our laws and institutions do not recognize religious societies. I believe that the law provides how they are to associate themselves together for religious purposes. The law does recognize different sects of religion.

Mr. DOBSON. But it does not recognize them as associated bodies for any political purposes, although it does recognize the individuals of which such denominations or sects are composed, as citizens.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, sir, petitions have been received from religious societies by the Congress of the United States. Such petitions were received soon after the Constitution of the United States was adopted. Petitions were received from the Society of Friends, at their yearly meeting in Philadelphia, on the subject of slavery and the slave trade. At various times this has been done. I do not know whether it is not right, when people are assembled in their religious associations, and on other occasions of assembling together, that they should be at liberty to sign petitions, as well as at political meetings. I cannot see the impropriety of sending up petitions signed in this manner, merely because they happen to be assembled in an association for religious purposes.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. This, sir, is a subject which I regard as one of very considerable importance. I do not object to religious denominations presenting petitions here. They are not disfranchised. They have the same political rights as others. But I do not think the Convention is taking the right course in regard to this matter. I think if we were to refer these petitions to a committee, and let them make a report on the subject, stating that it is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and giving such other reasons as they deem necessary and proper to be given, why it is inexpedient to receive petitions of this kind, we should stop the mouths of those claiming the right. For these reasons, I should like to see these petitions referred to a committee, and an argumentative report made on the subject.

A MEMBER. A standing committee cannot report argumentatively.

Mr. MORRISON. A select committee may. The laying of the petitions on the table, or rejecting them, is, I think, an aggravation of the case; it tends to irritate and to induce them to show their strength; but if we close their mouths by giving them an answer to their petitions, we shall have done our duty.

Mr. BORDEN. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT. There is no motion pending.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I renew my motion to lay the petition on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT announced the unfinished business to be the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) to which an amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry).

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise be instructed to inquire into the expediency of separately submitting the question of negro suffrage to the people."

To this resolution,

Mr. BERRY has offered the following amendment: strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

"That the committee on the elective franchise, &c., be instructed to report a provision for the new Constitution, providing that negroes and mulattoes shall be voters at all elections in this state."

Mr. MAY moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Berry,) by adding the following words: "Under such restrictions and qualifications, however, as they may deem necessary."

Mr. COLFAX inquired whether the amendment must not necessarily lie over one day. The amendment, he said, was imperative in its terms—the resolution was not.

The PRESIDENT. There is a rule requiring imperative resolutions to lie over one day, but, when a proposition, whether it be imperative or otherwise, is taken up and acted upon by the Convention, the rule ceases to apply.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. MAY said, that he regretted that the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) had thought proper to introduce the original resolution, which, together with the amendment, had now so long detained the Convention. I, sir, said he, fully concur with those gentlemen who are opposed to submitting this question of negro suffrage as a separate and distinct question to the people. We are sent here for a specific purpose. That specific purpose, as it seems to me, is the formation of a Constitution.

Now, sir, it is not to be supposed that gentlemen who come up here from all parts of the State, entertain the same views of the many questions which are to be submitted to them. On the other hand, it is to be expected that they will entertain very different views of these various questions. But, because there is a difference of opinion amongst ourselves, are we, therefore, to come to no decision? Why, sir, we have come here, as I understand the matter, for the express purpose of making known, interchanging, and, if possible, reconciling these different views. If we find we cannot reconcile them, what then is to be done? Evidently, we are to ascertain the views of the majority, and, having ascertained them, we embody those views in a Constitution, and then send it forth to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Now, there have come up before this Convention, other questions, quite as important, it seems to me, as this question of negro suffrage. At any rate, questions, and important ones too, have come before us, upon which this Convention is more equally divided. Take, for instance, the question introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) in regard to the abolition of the Grand Jury system. There is not a member on this floor who does not know that the Convention is nearly equally divided on that question. Now, if we may, with propriety, refer to the people one question, why may we not, with equal propriety, refer another? And, sir, with how much greater propriety may we refer those questions, concerning which we know there is a great diversity of opinion, as well here as amongst the people. I conceive, Mr. President, that the duty which we have to perform is a very plain one. It is to frame a Constitution to the best of our ability, and then submit it to the people. This, it appears to me, is all which we have to do. I conceive it is no part of our duty to evade the decision, amongst ourselves, of any question. We are sent here to decide these very questions, and it is not incumbent on us to submit with the Constitution, a string of questions, to be also separately voted upon by the people.

I suppose, Mr. President, that our new Constitution will contain some provision for its future amendment, at such times and as often as the people desire to amend it, and that too without the expense and labor of a Convention, expressly assembled for that purpose. If such be the case—if such a provision be ingrafted upon it, then, sir, I will say that I hardly believe it possible that this Convention will frame a Constitution which the people will vote to reject.

They will see in that one provision, as I clearly see it, a germ from which will spring sufficient good to finally overpower and destroy so much of evil as the Constitution may elsewhere contain. For these reasons, I shall vote against submitting any separate and distinct questions to the people.

But, Mr. President, another question, entirely distinct from this, has been sprung upon us by the amendment which the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry) has seen fit to offer, and that is the question of negro suffrage—the right of the negro to vote at all. Upon this question, I suppose, from what I both see and hear, that I differ toto celo from a large majority of the members of this Convention. I differ, at any rate, with every man who has thus far spoken on the question. Every man who has thus far spoken has been careful to announce that he would not vote to give to the negro the right of suffrage in this State. I, sir, however, think it is the duty of this Convention, so far as it can do so—certainly the duty of the people collectively—to give to the negro this right of suffrage under such restrictions as may, after a careful view of the subject, seem most wise and for the best.

I know very well, Mr. President, that I am broaching doctrine unpopular in this house. I do not forget, sir, that no longer ago than yesterday, upon the floor of this chamber, it was repeatedly by one gentleman demanded, in a tone rather more triumphant than I like to hear in such a deliberative body as this, “is there a delegate in this Convention who dare avow himself in favor of negro suffrage?” And from the fact that no member then rose to his feet in response, the gentleman may really have supposed that no member dared to avow that he held sentiments presumed to be so unpopular. But, Mr. President, let me ask—and, sir, I do it in a spirit of courtesy, not wishing to give offence—permit me to ask, I say, of the gentleman propounding that singular inquiry, “who constituted him the catechizer of this Convention? By what rule does he thus rise in his place, and in such a peculiar manner order the yeas and nays of this body, that he may ascertain the sentiments of its members?” Sir, I desire to say in this place, and say it distinctly, too, that I am neither his nor any other gentleman’s catechumen, neither here nor elsewhere. And, sir, I deny that either he or any other gentleman has the right thus to propound questions and to infer from my silence what are my views upon any subject within the range of the discussions of this Convention.

I have said, sir, that under certain restrictions, with certain qualifications, I would give the colored man the right to vote. I am not now prepared to say what these restrictions should be. I do not desire now to tell this Convention under what circumstances the negro shall be allowed to vote. It would be but labor lost, for it is only too clearly to be seen that this Convention have already determined that the negro shall never vote in the State of Indiana. To that decision I of course submit; but, sir, I hesitate not to say, that it does not accord with my notions of right.

Mr. President, I hold to this doctrine—I believe this to be true: Either the negro is a man constituted like ourselves by nature, or else he is only an animal—a mere brute. If the negro be but the mere brute, then, sir, let us treat him as one in all respects. Let us treat him as men treat him in the slave-holding States. There we know men both class and treat him as other brutes. There the laws designate him as a chattel—as mere personal property. Let us also efface the divine stamp of immortality and the evidences of manhood from his features, and write, yes, brand the word, “chattel” upon his brow. Let us at least be consistent. Let us declare him subject to our control, and divest him by force, if need be, of every human right, deny to him all right of liberty and property, and finish the task by trampling to the dust his social as well as his political rights.

But if we decide that the negro is a man—that he has the attributes of humanity—then let us for our own sake, if not for his, for consistency’s sake, ever recognize him as a man and treat him as a man.

Now, sir, it does not follow that because we recognize the African as a man, as belonging to the human species, that therefore we must at once bestow upon him all the privileges, social and political, which we bestow upon other men. We recognize all those foreigners from the old world, who are thronging to our shores, as men. We acknowledge the German, the Swede, and others as component parts of the same human family to which we belong. We do not, however, make them inmates of our families, nor at once bestow upon them the elective franchise as soon as they touch our soil. But we do give them a cordial welcome to this land of freedom. We then say to them, “acquire a knowledge of our language, our laws and our institutions—satisfy us that you appreciate the political blessings that we enjoy—that you will be safe depositories of the elective franchise—and then you shall enjoy all the political rights we possess.”

And so, sir, say I in regard to the negro race. I contend that it is due to the African and to ourselves, to declare under what circumstances, and coupled with what restrictions, they shall enjoy the rights and privileges of men.

My own knowledge of the negro race is not great, I confess; though, be it great or small, it has been acquired by a residence as well in a slaveholding as in a non-slaveholding State. But were it even greater than it is, I have too humble an estimate of my own abilities—I think too little of my own political discernment, to willingly say what qualifications should be prescribed, and what restrictions imposed upon this class of our population, to which they must submit before they can be recognized as citizens with political rights and franchises. But I know that in one State of this Union, one standing, too, among the foremost, if she is not herself the first, I know that there the negro has had the elective franchise conferred upon him under a property qualification. I confess, that, for my own part, I think very little of such a qualification, and I do not instance it to recommend its adoption. I have instanced the example of New York in order to show gentlemen that there that has been done which I say should be done elsewhere. I have done it to call the attention of gentlemen whose observation seems never to have extended beyond the assumed fact that negro suffrage is unpopular in Indiana, to the fact that other and abler men than myself—men recognized by all as statesmen—have held the opinions which I have advanced, and that other, and perhaps greater and more far-seeing States than Indiana, have deemed it the part of wisdom as well as of justice, under certain restrictions, to enfranchise the negro.

And, sir, in thus restricting the exercise of the elective franchise, we are guilty of no inconsistency. We not only refuse at once to enfranchise the foreigner when he lands from the emigrant ship, but we have thrown about our own selves certain restrictions, and have imposed certain qualifications. We say, for example, that no man shall exercise the right of suffrage until he has attained the age of twenty-one years. This is all right and proper. Now, I do not profess to thoroughly know the capacities of the negro race. I know but little of their mental or social development. Therefore, I will not say that at the age of twenty-one years the black man can be made sufficiently well informed of the laws and institutions of this country, and of the responsibilities and duties of the citizen to make him a safe repository of this trust. But I say, that if the black man has not intelligence and discretion enough at the age of twenty-one, to make him worthy the exercise of the elective franchise, then extend the prescribed age to thirty-one, or forty-one, or, if need be, to ninety-one. (Much laughter.) Draw the line somewhere. Let it be at the most suitable and proper age, whether it be fixed early or late in life.

There are other qualifications which may be mentioned in this connection. As, for example, literary or educational attainments. Gentlemen tell us that the negro race is a degraded and inferior one. I admit that this is true. I acknowledge that, as a people, they are far below the Anglo-Saxon race, both in point of intelligence and social refinement. Then, sir, let us prove our superiority by assisting, or rather our magnanimity by allowing, the negro to rise above his present degraded sphere. We already allow him the privilege of supporting our government by paying his taxes with the rest. Gentlemen see no danger in that. Then let us grant him the right to vote, and thus participate in the government which he assists to support. Confer upon him the elective franchise—first surrounding it with all necessary restrictions; insist on a property qualification if you please—require attainment to a mature age; insist that he shall know how to read and write; add other qualifications if you deem them necessary, but still, if you would make him other than that degraded being which you say he is, under some circumstances or other, put within his reach this great privilege.

I do not know, Mr. President, but that I shall be misunderstood in these few remarks. I certainly do not wish to be. I am not, where I am known, deemed an abolitionist, as that term has come to be understood. Neither, sir, am I a free-soiler, at least I am not enough of one to have ever received many free-soil votes; and I have frequently encountered active opposition from the free-soil party. But, sir, though this be the case, still I shall never shrink from uttering my conviction that there is much truth in the principles of the free-soil party, and, sir, I know that many members of that party conscientiously adhere to them. It seems to me that I should be recreant to the cause of humanity were I to sit silently in my seat and allow such sentiments as have been promulgated upon this floor to go unanswered and uncontradicted. Sir, when the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) introduced his resolution, I did hope that it would have been received in the same spirit in which it was offered. But it was not so received. The dignified and proper spirit in which the resolution was presented was not reciprocated. A very different spirit was at once displayed. I regret to see that there exists here a very decided disposition to crush every expression of sympathy for the negro race, and I have sometimes fancied I saw a disposition in this Hall to crush to the ground every man who ventured to give utterance to such sympathy. I hope I am mistaken. But against all manifestations of such a feeling I have risen to protest, and I do it none the less earnestly because I seem to stand alone.

Mr. READ of Clark said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have listened with much interest to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Steuben, (Mr. May,) and have a few remarks to offer in reply.

I also have a great sympathy for the negro race, and I am disposed to exercise every degree of courtesy and attention to every subject and to every proposition for the amelioration of their social condition. But, sir, representing a constituency which has a stronger feeling, perhaps, than any other in the State against the enfranchisement or even the immigration into the State, of negroes, I cannot be silent until I have briefly given the reason why I shall vote against conferring upon the colored population of the State the right of suffrage.

Self-defence, sir, is the first law of our nature. Every instinct of our being demands that this adage should be recognized. What is our situation in the State of Indiana? We are surrounded by slave States and consequently have, and are always liable to have a constant immigration from those States both of fugitive slaves and of free persons of color. Slaveholders are always anxious to get rid of their old, decrepit, and superannuated slaves, and they are also anxious to be freed from the presence of the free blacks. Hence it is natural that both these classes should cross the Ohio River from Kentucky, and settle in this State as well as in Ohio.

What has Kentucky done, sir? The Constitutional Convention which was held in that State last fall provided that if any free negro should emigrate to that State he should be liable to be tried for felony, and the punishment provided is confinement at hard labor in the penitentiary.

It is also provided that if any slave shall be emancipated, and he does not immediately thereafter leave the State, he is liable to be treated as a felon and to be confined in the State Prison.

It is well known that, in slaveholding States, all the old, unserviceable, and superannuated negroes are set free, that their masters may not have to support them when they have ceased to be any longer serviceable or productive. The laws being stringent against their remaining in those States, as a matter of course they flock here. Now what I say is, that we should stand upon the natural right of self-defence—we should, in order to protect ourselves, enact stringent laws, or insert a clause in the new Constitution prohibiting the future emigration of blacks into this State.

It appears to me, sir, that there are but three courses left open for the people of Indiana to pursue with regard to the negro population of the State.

The first is, amalgamation—aye, sir, I repeat it, amalgamation.

The second is, to give up the State to the possession and rule of the black population.

The third is, to prohibit the immigration of negroes to the State, to give no encouragement to those that are here that they can ever enjoy equal social or political privileges, and keep the State for ourselves and our descendants.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that I am for the latter course as a choice of the three. [Consent, consent!] There should be no feeling about this matter; we should be courteous and forbearing towards those who differ from us on this question, although they may be in a very small minority. But while I respect the feelings of other gentlemen and of their constituents, I must be allowed the same freedom to express my own and to represent the views and feelings of the people whom I have the honor to represent here. I do not know how it would suit the people of some of the northern counties of the State to have negro suffrage granted, but I tell gentlemen that my constituents would feel themselves very much degraded and grossly insulted to be asked to electioneer among negroes at their polls.

Not to detain the Convention with any lengthened remarks, I will conclude by saying that, viewing the matter as I do, I shall support a proposition prohibiting negroes from emigrating into the State; and shall oppose any proposition to bestow upon them the right of suffrage.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. PRESIDENT: As this debate is upon a subject upon which every citizen in the State is interested, and the result is watched for with anxiety in all parts of Indiana, I wish to occupy the time of the Convention a few minutes, while I shall very briefly give my reasons for the vote I should cast upon a proposition to prohibit all persons of color from emigrating into the State hereafter, and also prohibiting any future Legislature from bestowing upon the negroes the elective franchise.

I am willing to acknowledge, sir, that the white race are under some obligations to the black race in this country. They occupy an inferior social condition; they are much degraded; it is the duty of a wise and humane people to work for the elevation of such a race. The people of the United States can have no interest in degrading and sinking lower in the scale of being, the black race; but the question is, can they be elevated so much as to be on an equality with the white race, politically as well as socially? Have they the natural capacity for such an elevation, and is it compatible with the best interests of the white race that the negro should live in its midst upon such terms? For one, Mr. President, I frankly confess I do not believe in the possibility of such an elevation being compatible with the safety and best interests of the Anglo-Saxon race.

There is a marked, an apparent, and an unmistakable inferiority, both as to physical and mental qualities in the African race. Now I contend if it is once conceded that you can never elevate the negro to an exact equality with the whites in this country—an equality which shall extend to all social, and to all political privileges—the right to hold an office as well as the right to vote, you will never be able to do the negro any real good in this country. The result of this conclusion, to which I believe that all must arrive, is, that the only remedy left open for this greatest evil in our midst, is to be found in colonizing the negroes in their native Africa. This is not only the exclusive remedy, it is not only the last resort of a people seeking to relieve themselves of a low and degraded black population, but it is eminently practical and the very best thing that can be done for their good, as well as our own. Colonize them in Africa, where they are surrounded only by their equals, governed by a man of their own color and race, and allowed a free participation in all the institutions and privileges of society and government.

Look, sir, for a single moment at the condition of that most unfortunate people in this country. You will, after a careful view, be convinced, not only of their physical and mental inferiority but the impossibility of the two races commingling and living together on terms of equality. The careful observer must also be convinced that if the good of the black race, as well as the white, is to be consulted, the former should be colonized.

I maintain that it is highly impolitic for a refined and superior class to keep in their midst an uncultivated, a degraded, and inferior race. Because the natural tendency has been proven by experience, not to be elevation of the degraded, but the deterioration, the lowering, of the better class, towards the standard of the inferior class. The past has shown us that as the blacks increase in number, the disturbance between them and their white neighbors increase. As the blacks feel their strength, whether in numbers or in the grant of greater privileges, they are disposed to abuse them instead of being discreet and modest, and making use of those privileges to make themselves more intelligent and refined, and thus more agreeable to the dominant race.

This being the case, the doctrine which I maintain and am prepared with all my humble powers to prove, is, that the people of Indiana should hold out no inducements, whatever, to the negroes to settle and remain in the State, by granting privileges and franchises, or in encouraging them that they ever will be allowed any more, if indeed they are allowed the exercise of as many rights as they now have. Yes, Mr. President, the language that the representatives of the people of Indiana should hold to the black race is, emigrate, emigrate to your native country. They should all be sent to Liberia, or some other part of Africa. I believe that they have intelligence enough to build up a successful community on the shores of their native Continent, and to govern themselves. I believe that they would not only be happy and prosperous there, but that such a settlement would be a grand beginning for the Christianizing and civilizing the now benighted and barbarous continent of Africa.

I look upon the black race with sincere feelings of pity, and I have no feeling or antipathy against those who advocate the propriety of bestowing upon them the elective franchise. I believe that gentlemen who propose to give the negro the right of suffrage, are actuated by the noblest feelings of our nature—I respect such exalted sentiments of justice and humanity. But at the same time I look upon the subject in an entirely different light, and conceive that those gentlemen do not sufficiently take into consideration the really practical part of the subject, and do not sufficiently weigh the facts I have presented. Notwithstanding all you can do for them, the blacks are still a degraded and inferior race. The single distinction of color must of itself alone keep up an eternal distinction between the two races.

I am well aware that the blacks of this country are almost universally opposed to leaving this country, and emigrating to Liberia, but it is because they are ignorant of their real interests. They are not capable of taking a comprehensive and practical view of their degraded position in this country, and measuring the vast advantage of colonizing in a land, whose climate and position is naturally suited to them, and where they can live upon terms of perfect equality with all around them; that there they may lay the foundations of a nation of their own, and, unobstructed by the presence of a powerful and superior race, improve their social and mental condition, and elevate themselves to a respectable, if not an equal place among the nations of the world.

To the institution of slavery I am opposed, in every light in which it can be viewed, and I have been opposed to it ever since I first began to think of it. And I would be foremost in efforts to help and assist them to elevate themselves in this country, but I have been for a long time convinced that they are, and always must be, unhappy whilst living in the midst of the whites. They are despised in their social relations, and cheated in their business transactions. They have not the intellect to protect themselves from the white people, and, in fact, they are but little better off here than in slavery.

I ask gentlemen to look around this city of Indianapolis, and examine the character and situation of the black population here, where they have an opportunity of making property if they will, and then tell me if the very best thing that can be done with them, and for them, is not to send them to Liberia. And to have the proper effect upon the colored population, they should be told from this chamber, by the voices of the people assembled, in the persons of their delegates, that they must emigrate to Liberia, and that they need hope for no extension of political privileges, and no amelioration of their present condition in Indiana. But, sir, so long as delusive hopes are cherished of their being favored, so long as efforts are made by a certain class in their behalf, so long will the negroes look upon this as their home, and clamor for protection and political privileges.

My own experience teaches me that they have been but very little, if at all benefitted, by being freed from slavery. Indeed, you will confer no real and lasting favor upon this class of our population until you provide for their emigration to their native Africa, where they can all live upon terms of equality—one negro with another. But send them from among the white race, because so long as they are with them, they can never prosper.

They should never be allowed to amalgamate with the white race, and no statesman should ever favor any measure, the indirect result of which will be amalgamation between the races. Any encouragement given them to remain here, either by allowing them free emigration into the State, or conferring upon them additional political privileges will have this effect, because if the blacks stay in this country, there will always be amalgamation. I want none of this; I want Indiana and this country peopled, possessed, and governed by a pure white race. It is degrading to the feelings of every American, and I confess I am pained to see in the streets, the evidences of amalgamation which every where meet the eye.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I will repeat what I have before said—let us in this Convention, pursue such a policy and adopt such measures as will have the effect to induce the negro not to remain in this country, but to emigrate back to his native Africa. There they can live and prosper—they can introduce civilization and perhaps do for Africa what the Anglo Saxon race has done for America.

These are the considerations which will induce me to vote against the resolution introduced by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax.) In voting against that resolution, and in carrying out the policy I have advocated, I believe I am acting for the best interests of the black race as well as the white race.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warwick. I intended, on Saturday, to make a few remarks upon this subject, and I feel myself disposed this morning, to carry out that intention. The resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) proposes to direct the committee on elective franchise to enquire into the propriety of submitting the question to the people of Indiana, whether they will enfranchise the negroes. To this resolution an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Berry,) instructing the committee to report a proposition extending to negroes the privilege of voting. Another committee had already reported a proposition, forbidding negro immigration and the right of negroes to hold real estate. Now, if both of these propositions should be adopted by the Convention it would be doing and undoing at the same time. I do not deny that the Convention has the power to submit this question, but I do think it would be impolitic to do so, where there can be no doubt as to how the question would be decided by the people. Where there is such a decided majority against the proposition, as in this case, I can see no necessity for submitting the question. I know that it is urged by some, that a submission of the question to the people would be calculated to allay excitement. But I think differently. I think it would be calculated to keep up excitement. I believe, sir, that amongst all who have appeared here as the advocates of this resolution, not one of them has avowed himself willing to vote for negro suffrage at the polls. Even the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Hawkins,) after a most elaborate defense of the resolution, in the conclusion of his remarks gave us to understand, that, at the polls, he would vote against it. After all the argument which he made to show why this question should be submitted, it seemed to be comprehended in this—to grant to him the pleasure of voting against it. It is true, that, if this question should not be separately presented, it might induce opposition to the new Constitution, on the part of all those ten thousand voters, to which allusion has been made, because they could not have the privilege of voting for negro suffrage. But I cannot think that would be the case; because they would not better themselves by falling back upon the old Constitution.

I should think, sir, that the friends of free-soilism here should vote for a provision in the Constitution prohibiting negroes from settling in the State, for it is the manifest policy of the State not to encourage their immigration; and besides, the negro race never can be elevated to an equality with the white race, either socially or politically. If they might be elevated politically, they could not be so morally and socially. Sir, I desire that the State of Indiana should be a free-soil State, emphatically—that every one of her citizens may enjoy equal rights and privileges; and if we do not take this course of exclusion, as fast as the negroes shall be worn out in the service of Southern masters, they will be run into this State, not to enjoy equal privileges as our citizens, but to remain as paupers. There are some negroes here already, and if we should incorporate into our organic law no prohibitory provision of this kind, it would be an inducement for more to immigrate. The State of Ohio has already begun to feel the effects of the policy which they have been pursuing with reference to this very subject, and I have no doubt that their new Constitution will show this, by a clause prohibiting negro immigration.

It seems to be the policy of the gentleman on my right (Mr. Stevenson) to take back this unfortunate race to the country from whence they came, which may be well enough as far as it may be found practicable. But nature has made a broad distinction between the white and the black races, which could not be overcome. And if we cannot understand the reason for this distinction, should we, therefore, attempt to counteract or destroy it? These were some of the reasons why he should vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Franklin, and against every proposition for the encouragement of negro immigration, or for the establishment of negro suffrage.

Mr. CRUMBACKER—

MR. PRESIDENT: It does seem to me that gentlemen are expending much thunder prematurely upon this matter. The question is, purely, whether the resolution shall be submitted to the committee authorizing them to make inquiry into the propriety of submitting the question of negro suffrage to the people. Such should be the limit of this whole argument; but, this morning, gentlemen have gone on to argue the propriety of entirely prohibiting the blacks from settling and holding property in the State. That question, also, will be met in proper time, but it is most clearly irrelevant now. Moreover, is it the province of this Convention to discuss the question where the black race can flourish best, and under what form of government they could most enjoy the rights of freemen? I might be ready and willing to discuss these questions, but I cannot conceive that it is either the province or the business of this Convention to continue a discussion which involves nothing more than an inquiry into the benefits and blessing of the Colonization Society, and the advantages which ought to be set before the Africans in this country, to induce them to colonize.

The gentleman who was last upon the floor, if I mistake not, made an error in reference to the committee which reported last Saturday, by confounding that committee with the committee to which the gentleman from St. Joseph has directed his resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM (interposed here and explaining) said, he referred merely to the inconsistency of sending this imperative resolution to the committee on the elective franchise, with the reported proposition prohibiting negro immigration.

Mr. CRUMBACKER (continuing). The gentleman from St. Joseph has directed his resolution to the committee on the elective franchise. With regard to the merits of this resolution I have but very little to say. I do not think this the proper time to discuss the question of negro suffrage. The question is simply, shall the resolution be referred? The gentleman asks for this, and appeals to the magnanimity of the Convention, and I hope his appeal will not be made in vain. My reason for expressing this hope is simply this: from the knowledge I have of a great portion of the liberty party in this State, I am satisfied that this course will be the best which can be adopted to allay the existing excitement upon this question, especially in the counties which I represent. I speak with the certainty of knowledge when I say that if this proposition were to be reported and acted upon here with some degree of forbearance, it would have a sure tendency to allay excitement amongst the abolitionists of the North, however ultra they may be. And, on the contrary, if we should reject every thing which may be presented by those who would represent their wishes, such a course on the part of this body would raise such a storm of excitement as would pass all over the State, and perhaps result in the defeat of the new Constitution. Hence, I contend that it is expedient for us all, who would seek to save the new Constitution from rejection, to treat with forbearance and respect the opinions of that portion of our fellow-citizens who believe in the doctrine of universal suffrage. Gentlemen may be assured that if they spurn the opinions of this portion of our citizens, they will raise a feeling of excitement in the bosom of every man of them, which will burn, not only against our action in this matter, but prejudice their minds materially against every thing which we may do.

I desire to make a few remarks with reference to certain language which was applied to this party on Saturday, by some gentleman upon this floor. Not having been in my seat very long, it is impossible for me to know either the counties or the names of members; but the denunciation or the assertion to which I refer, attracted my attention, and although I cannot recollect who gave out the expression, I recollect its language very well. It was a denunciation of the free-soil party as a poor, miserable faction, which deserved only to be greeted with sneers and contempt.

Mr. DOBSON (interposing). If the gentleman refers to my language, I made no allusion to the free-soil party; my allusion was to the abolition party, if he will note the difference.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation; but I am still constrained to say that the language, when applied to the old abolition or liberty party, must still be both offensive and unjust, for, from my own knowledge of a great many persons belonging to that party, I can testify for them to their respectability and sterling worth. They are an honor to their country; they are devoted to our institutions and to the Union; and they are not so ultra in their views as to wish to dissolve the Union, merely to carry out their principles. No, sir, but they will hold on to that government which approximates nearest their idea of universal suffrage and universal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They are not so factious in their nature as that it should be thought of them they would destroy the fundamental principles of government; but, on the contrary, they are men of benevolence, truthfulness, and patriotism. And it is not unfrequently the case that those who denounce them the loudest at some times, at other times will pay the highest compliment to them, whenever the faction happens to be strong, and wherever their votes can be thereby secured. But not to occupy time, I will conclude by expressing again the hope that the resolution will be referred to the committee; that this appeal to the courtesy and magnanimity of the Convention may not be in vain, so that it may be manifest to free-soilers and abolitionists throughout the State, that the Convention, as a body, is not disposed to spurn their opinions with contempt.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I had not intended to say any thing, and should not, but for the charge that the majority here have not acted upon this question with proper courtesy. But so far from this being the case, I shall endeavor to show that the lack of courtesy upon this question rests chiefly upon the part of the minority. It will be recollected that early in the session petitions and memorials upon this subject were received, appropriately referred, and reported upon; the judgment of the Convention being recorded that it was inexpedient for them to act upon the question. Sir, if gentlemen who advocate this resolution were desirous only of making an issue upon the question, that was the time for them to have made it, and to have recorded their votes in opposition to the report of the committee. But not a word was said. A few days ago, a resolution was offered similar to that upon your table; and an amendment being proposed, completely nullifying the object of the proposition, the yeas and nays were demanded and accorded to them upon the adoption of the amendment, which was carried by a very decided majority. Was this acting discourteous on the part of the majority? Certainly not. But then, after this, they come in and contend that if their ten thousand voters are not conciliated they will go against the amended Constitution; but this threat has no terrors for me, so long as the alternative is that I shall agree to submit to the people the question of placing a buck negro upon an equality with a white man! Sir, I ask, in all candor, whether it is courteous for these eight or ten thousand to continue to harass the majority, from year to year, and from day to day, upon this subject, and then to ask for the adoption of conciliatory measures for the purpose of procuring their votes upon some important question? I trust, sir, that this is not the course that will be pursued here.

It has been charged that the adherents of this party, in the State, have been called a faction. Well, sir, I confess that I can look upon them in no other light. Look at the course pursued by them in the organization of the last House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Did not their course there evince a resolution that they must rule or ruin—that they would sink the government or carry their points? Is it reasonable that this small minority should rule the government of the United States? Or should not such conduct be condemned and despised? Yet they come up here and ask that the negro race shall be placed upon an equal footing with the citizen, and call themselves respectable? I affirm that there is nothing respectable about such a course. I envy not the respectability of such a party. If it could be shown that, by any action of this Convention, the moral and social condition of the black race could be elevated to an equality with that of the white race, then I could accord some degree of respect to the course pursued by this party. But the distinction between these races has been made by the God of Nature. The black race has been marked and condemned to servility, by the decree of Omnipotence; and should feeble man claim to erase from them the leprosy which God has placed upon them? I am speaking of facts; I shall not attempt to look after causes; but every man must admit that if you guarantee equal rights with yourselves to the black race, that condition cannot long continue. Either you must surrender to them or they must surrender to you—they must rule or you must rule—such is their nature.

That I was glad the gentleman from Franklin had offered his amendment, as it would bring gentlemen to a distinct vote, and we would see how many were in favor of negro suffrage; for my part, I envy not the respectability of any man who is willing to throw himself in the scale and balance of Government with a buck negro.

I trust, then, to hear no more complaints about being treated with discourtesy, on the part of gentlemen who have only wanted the opportunity to vote. I trust, also, that the whole subject will be voted down, and the question put to rest; and that no fire-brand will hereafter be cast in here for the purpose of securing votes for the acceptance of the new Constitution. I do not impugn the motives of gentlemen, for I trust that every member is actuated by a higher principle than that. I would resign my seat before I would pander to any such factious influence. Let all the adherents of faction return to the fold from whence they strayed, for so long as our deliberative bodies, our Conventions, and our Legislatures, shall continue to foster and consider their pretensions, and gratify their demands, for the sake of votes, so long our Government will be distracted and convulsed from one end of the land to the other.

Mr. KILGORE. As I understand the question, the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry) proposes, so to amend the resolution, as to make it the duty of the committee to report a section extending to the negroes the right of suffrage; and the gentleman from Steuben (Mr. May) proposes to modify this amendment by adding these words: "with such restrictions or qualifications as they may see proper." Gentlemen who are favorable to the amendment of the member from Franklin, could certainly have no objection to this modification, unless they would allow to the negro the right of suffrage without qualification: gentlemen, also, who are opposed to the whole principle of the resolution, should it be adopted, could not object to the last amendment. Those, also, who are in favor of the right of negro suffrage, could not object that the Legislature should have the power of adding to the extension of this right to the negroes, such qualifications as they may see proper.

This is the question to which I shall direct attention. I shall not travel out of the way for the purpose of attacking either minorities or majorities. The last gentleman up, spoke of a minority, without indicating clearly to what minority he alluded. Surely, the gentleman could not have addressed himself to a whig minority, for I find some whig members over the way, advocating the same doctrine with the gentleman from Dubois.

Mr. EDMONSTON (interposing). I alluded to the advocates of the right of negro suffrage.

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). This question would not have been agitated, but for the other—that embraced in the report of the committee on rights and privileges. Those members who are surrounded at home by factious abolitionists, as they are termed by the gentleman, were disposed to let the Constitutional provision remain as it now stands; and gentlemen of the majority have shown themselves to be the agitators. They were unwilling to let the Constitutional provision remain as it is. They introduced the proposition, excluding negroes from coming into the civil compact, and tying up the hands of the Legislature, so that they shall, at no time, have the power to ameliorate the civil condition of this unfortunate race. Who, then, appears to be against excitement and agitation? There is nothing in the present Constitution, to prevent the negroes from enjoying the right of suffrage. The Legislature has always had the power to extend this right, either with or without qualification.

Mr. EDMONSTON (interposing). The reason I advocate the report, to which the gentleman refers, is, that the question may be settled at once; in order that the Legislature may not continue to be harassed with petitions upon the subject.

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). Yes, sir. But I do not know that there has been any agitation upon the subject of abolitionism, for the Legislature to encounter, for several years past. I believe there has not been a single application to the Legislature for negro suffrage. There has been an application or two, by way of petition, for negroes to be permitted to testify in courts of justice, which hardly passed from the hands of the Clerk, before they were laid permanently upon the table. But, sir, the people have a right to agitate this, as well as any other question. They have a right to discuss any question they please. Although gentlemen here may deny to negroes the right of petition, white men may agitate and petition as much as they please. But these are a set of factionists, (in the language of my friend from Dubois,) who are entitled to no sympathies here and should ask for none, because, they are willing to place themselves upon an equality with negroes. I will ask that gentleman, if he was not himself once an advocate for the right of petition on the part of negroes?

Mr. EDMONSTON. That was before Mr. Van Buren had fallen from grace.

Mr. KILGORE. Aye, sir, the gentleman was once in favor of giving to the negroes not only the right of suffrage and all the rights of citizenship, but he was, at one time, one of the most ardent supporters of the pretensions of a free soil man to the highest office in this Union. The free soil party was just following in the wake of the New York politicians of 1848; and from this the gentleman, perhaps, may draw a distinction between the free soil party and abolitionism. The free soil party were mere followers after the doctrine which was long before understood in New York. Mr. Van Buren was denounced because he allowed himself to be nominated by the free soil party for the Presidency, as though he had changed his principles; yet, the principles of the Buffalo Platform were those by which he had been governed all his life. But then it was that many of the Democratic party, for the first time, were heard to denounce him.

But at this time there was a strife between the two great parties, dividing the State, which should be the most ultra upon the subject of free soilism. Both parties came together in convention, the two conventions met successively in this building, and they were both charged with having stolen all the thunder of the Buffalo convention. But as soon as the election was over the charm had passed away, and it was a time for parties to change ground, and for the gentleman from Dubois to dissolve the bands of matrimony into which he had entered; but I suppose it was not because he could charge the free soil party with having failed to carry out any of the terms of the compact. Sir, I object to any divorce in a case where the union has been so cordially formed.

But I merely refer to this for the purpose of showing that some gentlemen, who have no sympathies with the negro, seem to have forgotten their former acts and associations.

I suppose no gentleman would desire to place himself upon an equality with the negro; nor is it assumed by any that the negro race is not inferior. But, sir, I object to the intimation that the negro race is inferior by nature. Give them the proper training, and, my word for it, they will exhibit as much talent and enterprise as any class of beings upon God's footstool.

Gentlemen contend that the condition of the African race has been bettered by placing them in bondage; and if that be true, how much more could we do for them by holding out inducements to them to acquire property and cultivate their minds? This, sir, will be one of the great reasons, which, (if it ever ought to be done,) will be most likely to prevail, for extending to them the elective franchise, and this, also, should be one of the reasons by which I myself might be induced, perhaps, to be in favor of a property qualification and a good English education, to constitute a voter, for we have this race amongst us, and we know not how to get rid of them.

I desire to be distinctly understood, that I am not in favor of negro suffrage myself, but I am willing to leave the question open to the people, where the old Constitution left it, so that, if, at any subsequent day, they shall find it to their interest so to do, the people shall have the right to extend the suffrage to the negro, with such restrictions as the case should suggest and require. And one of them, as I think, should connect this right, indissolubly on their part, with the acquisition of property.

There is no man here, I presume, who desires to place himself upon an equality with the negro; but what shall we do? If we find them illiterate, should that be an excuse for us to turn our backs upon them? We could easily find thousands of white men in our country equally degraded and equally ignorant. Why not turn our backs upon them, instead of admitting them to vote and hold office, after a residence in the State for a single year, regardless of any claim to a good name? Let me ask you, sir, if there were a hundred negroes in this State, and ninety of the number were better calculated to give a righteous vote upon any subject, than one out of a thousand of the foreigners who have been in the State for two years, would you not as soon admit to the polls these ninety negroes, as the foreigners? [Several voices—"no! no!"] Yet it would be an outrage upon republicanism to say that these foreigners should not vote until they had acquired the power to read and write. A man then who has no feeling in common with us, who never felt the pulse of liberty till he set foot upon our soil, such a man is to enjoy the opportunity and the right to vote and to hold office amongst us, whilst these rights are to be denied to the unfortunate black man, who has ten times more intelligence, and who has lived in the State of Indiana from his birth! I don't mean to be understood as saying that I would vote against the suffrage of foreigners, after they had been here a sufficient length of time. But I am only looking at the inconsistency of this course.

Permit me, sir, to refer to another fact. Looking over the State at large, I find that there are not proportionally so many black men confined in the Penitentiary; and of the few blacks which have been so imprisoned, they have been instigated to commit the crime for which they were condemned, in four cases out of five, by designing white men. I have a little experience in judicial proceedings, which enables me to say that out of six or seven hundred blacks in my county, there never has been a single instance of crime among them, which has been punished by imprisonment in the State Prison. Still, this circumstance would not be a sufficient reason to induce me to vote for giving them the right of suffrage; and this may be a matter of prejudice upon my part, and time may cure it. Therefore, I am desirous of leaving this an open question, so that if my mind shall undergo a change, with the minds of others, I may vote to extend this right. And I will say to my friend over the way, (Mr. Edmonston,) that he, too, may find it convenient to look over this question again, in one or two years, when there will probably come round another scramble for abolition votes. All I ask of this body is to leave this question open to the people, and let us have a fair field fight for the result, whensoever the time should come for the contest.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin is to be adopted, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben will be adopted also; if the former is to be adopted into the Constitution, I desire the latter to go with it; and I should vote against the former without the latter. If the right of suffrage is to be allowed to the negro, I want that the Legislature should prescribe restrictions and qualifications.

Mr. KENT said, it must appear evident to this Convention that this question has taken a wide range of discussion; much wider than the resolution and pending amendments, under the enforcement of strict parliamentary law, would warrant. And believing that each member of the Convention has made up his mind upon the question under discussion, and for the purpose of facilitating the business of this body, I call the previous question.

And there was a second.

The PRESIDENT said, the first question was upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben, (Mr. May,) adding the words "under such restrictions and qualifications, however, as they may deem necessary."

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I wish to state briefly the reasons which shall govern my vote.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot have that privilege however much he may desire it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and was rejected without a division.

The question recurring upon Mr. Berry's amendment, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered. They were taken, and the Secretary reported, yeas 1, nays 122, as follows:

YEAS.—Mr. May.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry,

Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—122.

So the amendment was rejected.

And the question then being upon the adoption of the original resolution, offered by Mr. Colfax, the yeas and nays were again demanded and ordered.

Mr. PETTIT asked for the reading of the resolution. He said he believed this was a resolution of inquiry, and he was willing to allow every such resolution to be referred, as a matter of courtesy.

SEVERAL VOICES. Read, read, read.

The resolution having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. PETTIT continued: There could be no resolution of inquiry, he said, although the same thing might be offered over and over again, for which he would not vote as a matter of courtesy, merely. He had only to say that he would not vote for this resolution, as a distinct proposition; but he would not treat the mover with the discourtesy of refusing to order the reference of a mere resolution of inquiry.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result, yeas 60, nays 62:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Work, and Mr. President—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Butler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Helmer, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—62.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Lockhart offered the following:

Resolved, That the Warden of the State Prison be requested to furnish this Convention with a list of the number of persons confined in the State Prison since the organization of the State government, the crime for which each was committed, the number of years each prisoner was sentenced to confinement in said prison, the length of time each prisoner remained in prison, whether any such prisoner was pardoned, and if so, how soon after his or her term of servitude commenced, and the age of each convict.

Mr. KELSO. A resolution similar to that has been before adopted, and I think that the information, which is of a more comprehensive character than that called for by the resolution just read, has been collected.

Mr. LOCKHART. The resolution referred to extends over a period of but twelve years, while this of mine goes back to the organization of the State government.

Mr. KELSO. What is the object of such a resolution?

Mr. LOCKHART. It is to obtain information to be laid before the Convention, of the age and sex, and other statistics of criminals, in order that we may judge of the necessity for another species of prison, an institution intermediate from the county jail and the State's Prison—something like a House of Refuge.

Mr. REED of Clark. I presume the Warden of the Penitentiary could furnish the information desired, and I move to amend the resolution so as to call upon that officer for the information sought.

Mr. LOCKHART accepted the amendment, and then the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR offered a resolution instructing the committee on State officers other than executive and judicial, to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in the new Constitution providing that the Governor of the State should appoint the secretaries, sergeant-at-arms, and doorkeeper to each legislature.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend the resolution by adding in the proper place, "and the county commissioners appoint the members of the legislature." (Much laughter.)

Mr. BARBOUR. My object in offering the resolution is this: It is well known that these officers are annually elected by the legislature, after it meets here, at a great expense of time and money. A great number of persons from all parts of the State come up here every year for the purpose of getting some one of these offices, either as assistants or principals. I suppose that from fifty to one hundred assemble here at the opening of every session. The aggregate expense of all this is considerable—perhaps not less than two thousand dollars—which would be saved to the people of the State if the Governor had the appointment of these officers. It is also to be presumed that the Governor would be better acquainted with the merits of the candidates than members of the legislature, most of whom are always unacquainted with these candidates. It is well understood that the Governor is fond of pleasing the legislature; but to provide against every contingency, the legislature would have the power of removal. I throw this thing out more in the shape of a mere suggestion than as a formal proposal.

Mr. KELSO. I must oppose the proposition for two reasons:

First and foremost, the Governor of the State is not presumed to be acquainted with the claims and qualifications of all the people of Indiana for these offices, any more than other men. Were a proposition like this to be adopted, it would be a fair presumption that the clerk, sergeant-at-arms, &c., &c., would be selected in and about the city of Indianapolis, because it is here that his Excellency resides while holding office. This is manifestly unfair, and not to be thought of for a moment. The representatives come up here from every section of the State, and are severally intimately acquainted with the persons asking these offices at their hands. They are, then, as well and much better qualified than the Governor to select these officers and servants of the legislature, for they would know how to make a fair distribution to the different parts of the State.

Again, sir: suppose the legislature to be democratic and the Governor whig; or suppose the Governor to be a democrat and a majority of the representatives and senators whigs: the Governor would appoint his political friends; the legislature would demur, and would there not be furnished the cause and material for a regular political cat fight. [Laughter.]

It is much better that we should leave this matter where it has always been, with the legislature. Let them select their own officers and servants.

As to the expense of the election of these officers, the legislature can take no step without incurring expense. I remember that the legislature once undertook to be very economical, and concluded to dispense with the services of an enrolling clerk, and made it the duty of the Secretary of State to perform the duties of that office. It was thus done somewhat cheaper, but the work was so badly done that the scheme was abandoned. No good came of it, and none would come of this.

Mr. BASCOM offered an amendment providing that the Governor should, at the same time, appoint the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The amendments and the original resolution were severally disagreed to.

Mr. KILGORE offered a resolution proposing to dispense with the further services of a sergeant-at-arms to this Convention.

Mr. K. remarked that the contested election case having been disposed of, he thought there was no further need for the services of a sergeant-at-arms. He meant no disrespect to the gentleman who now held that office.

The resolution was laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. EDMONDSTON, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock tomorrow morning.

TUESDAY, OCT. 29, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MEYERS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. OWEN, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, made the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, to whom were referred certain resolutions on the subject of homestead exemption, and of the rights of property to married women, have had these subjects under consideration, and have instructed me to report three sections to be incorporated in the bill of rights of the amended Constitution.

They have also instructed me to report back the resolutions referred to them in regard to the rights to property of married women, and to recommend that they lie on the table. Also, to report back a resolution in favor of securing by a declaration in the bill of rights to the head of each family in the State of Indiana a homestead exemption, for such action thereon as the Convention may see proper.

And they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of these subjects.

Mr. MURRAY moved that the resolution on the subject of homestead exemption be referred to a select committee.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order.

Mr. COLFAX remarked that the resolution had been reported back with the view that it should be referred to another committee.

Mr. OWEN said, that the committee had reported back the resolution for such action as the Convention might see proper to take in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has concurred in the report and discharged the committee from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. COLFAX. Yes sir, that leaves it open for the action of the Convention, and the resolution may now be referred to another committee, or the Convention may act upon it at once and either adopt or reject it as they see fit.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the motion of the gentleman from Huntington to be to refer the resolution to a select committee. Of how many members shall the committee consist?

Mr. MURRAY. Of five members.

Mr. PRATHER moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Huntington so as to make the committee consist of one from each Congressional district.

The amendment was agreed to, and the question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Huntington as amended, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the committee on the elective franchise, to whom had been referred a resolution directing them to inquire into the propriety of inserting in the Constitution a clause prohibiting the immigration of negroes into the State, made a report upon that subject, concluding with a recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The report was concurred in, and the subject was laid upon the table.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley, from the committee on county and township organization, made a report which was read a first time and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

Mr. GOOTEE, from the same committee, presented a minority report assigning reasons why the report of the majority should not be concurred in.

He desired that the report of the minority should be read.

Mr. PETTIT rose to a question of order. The rule, he said, required that all reports should be made without argument.

The PRESIDENT. This is the report or protest of a minority.

Mr. PETTIT. It is a report from a committee, and it contains an argument. It is all right that it should contain argument or reasons. It ought to be so, and the rule that prohibits argument in a report of a committee is all wrong. That is my view of it; but as you have adopted such a rule, it is necessary to adhere to it.

Mr. MORRISON. At the time that rule was adopted, it was intended that all reports of committees should be made without argument; but the Chair has decided, and I believe the Convention has acquiesced in that decision, that reasons may be given in the protest, or counter report.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that according to all Parliamentary rules of which he has any knowledge, it is the privilege of the minority to set forth the reasons why they dissent from the decision of the majority. Upon that ground, the Chair has decided as he has, and he will adhere to that decision until it is reversed by the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT asked for the reading of the rule.

Mr. MAGUIRE. It will be recollected that, when that rule was under consideration, I moved to strike out the words "without argument," so as to permit all reports to be accompanied by the reasons which governed the committee.

Mr. KELSO. It seems to me that the decision made by the Chair is correct. A majority report is the report of the committee—a minority report is not. It has been decided by the Chair, and I think correctly, that when the majority of a committee report a provision for the action of the Convention, in the shape of an amendment to the Constitution, the minority may, in a report or protest, set forth their reasons for dissenting from the conclusion of the majority. It appears to me that this decision is correct, for the minority certainly ought to have the right to submit their objections in some shape or other.

Mr. PETTIT. The point of order that I make, is that the rule that has been adopted by this Convention, declares that all reports shall be made without argument. Although I consider that rule to be an improper one, yet the Convention having adopted the rule, it ought to be observed—otherwise you will put it in the power of the minority to write down the majority; the majority not being at liberty to assign their reasons on paper, the minority may bring in a long written report and write them down. Now you see the absurdity of the position. I give notice that on to-morrow I will move to strike out from the rules the words "without argument."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that the report of the majority is the report of the committee, and the rule applies only to such report.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that he would call the attention of the President, and of the Convention, to this point: any ten members might call the yeas and nays, provided it were done before the question was put, but every member had the right to enter a protest on the journal, without argument. But there seemed to be some difficulty about the interpretation of this rule.

Mr. BORDEN (interposing) desired to know if it was in order to discuss the question of order—no appeal having been taken from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair considers it proper to discuss the point of order. The gentleman from Ripley will proceed.

Mr. SMITH. My object in rising was only to call the attention of the President and of the Convention to this rule, and to say that there appears to be some difficulty in ascertaining the limits and bounds of a protest, or minority report. I know that protests are required to be short, and respectfully worded, in all bodies where they are at all admitted. I do not entirely agree with my friend over the way, (Mr. Pettit,) that there should be no limitation. I do think that an argumentative report should not be made. I think it is sufficient for a committee to report without argument. But at the same time I think it is right that a member, who is in the minority, should have the privilege of coming in and showing his reasons—and they should be as brief as possible—why he does not agree with the majority of the committee.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the exact reading of this rule. It is as follows :

"That the standing committees shall be the following, to whom shall be referred all such matters touching the Constitution as properly belong to each, and that they report without argument, the provisions, alterations, and amendments required."

I think that this clearly applies to standing committees only. Under the circumstances, I consider the decision which the Chair has made, a proper one. The rule simply prohibits the committee proper—that is, a majority of the committee—from accompanying their report of sections and articles with an argument setting forth the reasons for the report. It does not compel the minority to make an argument, but they are not prohibited from doing so.

Mr. READ of Monroe. The minority of a committee, may not, under the rules adopted by this Convention, embody their views in the shape of articles and sections, in the spirit and form in which they would wish incorporated in the new Constitution, but they are privileged to give their reasons for dissenting from the articles and sections reported by the majority of the committee.

But, sir, it seems to me that the minority should not, of right, have this very decided advantage over the majority, who are debarred from giving the reasons which induced them to report in a particular manner. I am decidedly of the opinion that the minority should, when they dissent from the views of the majority, be allowed to report articles and sections in due form, which shall embody their views and opinions, and that if one party on a committee be prohibited from accompanying their reports with arguments, both should. This is the course that was adopted in the Ohio Constitutional Convention, and in all the recent Conventions of this character whose proceedings I have noticed. The majority have their report of sections and articles printed, and the same courtesy is extended to a dissenting minority, and thus the Convention have both reports side by side, and can the better judge of their relative merits. It seems to me that such should be the course of procedure here.

On yesterday I gave notice of the introduction of a resolution amending the rules in this regard, and allowing the minority to bring in a report of articles and sections.

Mr. PETTIT. I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, in order that the practice under the rule may be settled.

The PRESIDENT. Does any gentleman second the appeal from the decision of the Chair taken by the gentleman from Tippecanoe?

Mr. BORDEN. I will second the appeal, out of courtesy to the gentleman.

The question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I suppose that under the rules, the report will be printed.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has fixed the number of copies to be printed of each report at three hundred.

The report of the majority only will be printed.

The resolution proposing to dispense with the services of a Sergeant-at-arms was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. In offering the resolution on yesterday, no disrespect was intended to the worthy gentleman who now fills that post. But I thought, from the beginning, that after the Convention disposed of the contested election case, we should be able to dispense with the services of a Sergeant-at-arms, and thereby save to the State a considerable expense. There are no processes to be served, and no duties for this officer to perform.

An amendment was offered by Mr. BERRY, proposing to dispense with the services of a Stenographer.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not know that I should object to such an amendment to my resolution.

Mr. DOBSON. I do not know that I clearly understand the object of the gentleman (Mr. Kilgore) who offered this resolution, when he says that there is no further need of the Sergeant-at-arms because there will be no processes to be served. Perhaps this is an adroit movement on the part of that gentleman to get rid of that very useful officer, who might feel it his duty to take him (Mr. Kilgore) into custody for some disturbance during the session.

If the gentleman knew the effect of some speeches in this Convention, he might also vote to dispense with a Stenographer. [A laugh.]

Mr. KILGORE. As to any quarrel which I might get into with the gentleman (Mr. Dobson) over the way, I am sure any of the door-keepers could secure me, and if the gentleman should prove too belligerent, and refuse to surrender, I am sure the door-keeper and myself could secure him. [A laugh.]

As to the speeches that are made here, I will only remark, in reply to the gentleman, (Mr. Dobson,)

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as ithers see us."

Mr. KENT moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was agreed to.

The resolution proposing to amend the rules was taken up, and the mover,

Mr. READ of Monroe, said, that the object was, so to amend the rules as to allow the minority of a committee to report sections and articles in the same way that the majority now do, neither being accompanied with written arguments, but both to be printed and laid simultaneously before the Convention. We should then have the views of all the members of the committee, and could compare them one with another. I hope, sir, said Mr. READ, that the resolution will prevail, and that the rules will be amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio offered the following:

Resolved, That the Auditor of State be requested to inform this Convention of the quantity, situation, condition, and uses to which they are applied, of any unsold lots and lands included in the original donation by Congress for the establishment of a seat of government for this State.

Mr. PEPPER. I presume no objection will be made to our obtaining the information alluded to. I will, in a word, state the object:

The design is to ascertain, as nearly as possible, the quantity of land included in, and still belonging to, the "Donation" granted by Congress to the State for public purposes. My object in offering the resolution is to secure the preservation of these lots for the use and pleasure of the people of the State, as well as the citizens of Indianapolis, as public grounds. In all the large cities of our country it has become an object of great interest to secure squares and open plats of ground in their midst, to be ornamented with trees and shrubbery, and to serve the double purpose of public use and public gratification. While it is yet possible to secure such lots here, I wish to see it done.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that a flood of resolutions were pouring in upon the Convention every day, and unless means were adopted to bring the reports on sections and articles of the Constitution before the body, business would scarcely be forwarded for weeks to come. It was his opinion that these reports had better be made the special order for a certain day and a certain hour, several days or a week or more in advance, so that all would know when a given subject was coming up, and be prepared to debate it and vote upon it.

Mr. OWEN then offered the following:

Resolved, That, in all cases, the sections of the amended Constitution, reported by the minority of a standing committee, be printed along with the sections reported by the majority of the same committee.

Mr. BORDEN desired to make a suggestion. If, said he, we take up these various reports in Convention, will not the various amendments which will be offered, encumber the journal entirely too much! and would it not be better to go into committee of the whole upon these reports, where no journal will be kept of the multitude of amendments and motions!

Mr. OWEN said, he thought the better way would be to postpone to a day and an hour, previously named, at which time, a certain proposition or report might be taken up and discussed until disposed of.

As to the suggestion of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) he thought that this Convention had better not adopt the plan of frequently going into committee of the whole. My experience, said Mr. O., teaches me that it is better, as much as possible, to avoid going into committee of the whole.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. With all due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) to whose suggestions and opinions I am always inclined to yield my own, I must differ with him in this matter. I appeal to gentlemen of experience here, if the consequence of making "special orders" of reports and propositions does not lead to the consumption of most of the time of legislative sessions. I know that the propositions to which the gentleman from Posey has called the attention of the Convention, are very important ones, and ones in which all take a very deep interest. The day for which the proposition is made the special order, is some time distant, and, by the time it comes round, I presume that gentlemen will be provided with elaborate arguments and lengthy speeches, on both sides of the question. I have no doubt these gentlemen would be very much disappointed should they be deprived of an opportunity of fully discussing the question. But at this rate, the Convention will not have time to take up many other subjects equally important, and bestow upon them the attention they deserve. Look at the time consumed in the discussion of the single question involved in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, relative to the abolition of the Grand Jury system! One week has already been consumed in debating that subject, and I presume at least another week or ten days will be required to finish it. Make all your important propositions "special orders," and we shall consume the winter, and then be far enough from the completion of the labor we were sent here to perform—the formation of a simple organic law for the State.

As I before remarked, I generally yield to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) because I have much confidence in his judgment and believe he entertains a disposition to proceed in the public business with all proper dispatch. But in this case I deem his position an untenable one. I think that all the reports from standing committees and important propositions should be referred to a committee of the whole Convention, and taken up from day to day until they are ready for final action, which can then be had without debate. Why is it that we see such a flood of resolutions poured in upon us here from day to day? Simply, sir, because we have nothing else to do. We assemble here in the morning—there is no special order to take up—we have not previously resolved to go into committee of the whole upon any subject, and our time is consumed by the offering of this multitude of resolutions, which, as is well known, must all go upon the Journal. But if we had portions of the Constitution referred to the committee of the whole, gentlemen would exhaust their propositions which are now offered in the shape of resolutions, in amendments to the sections and articles before the committee, and they would not encumber the Journal as they now do. Are not gentlemen aware that all these resolutions or the most of them, will come up again when the reports of committees are under consideration? I suggest, then, that the better way would be to have a standing order for every day, and immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, which will be consumed by the reading of the Journal, petitions, reports, &c., let the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole, then all these resolutions can be offered in the shape of amendments and the Journal will not be encumbered with them. After the consideration of the various subjects in committee of the whole, unnecessary debate would be cut short in the Convention by the call for the "previous question," and our work would soon be finished and we would be ready to return to our several homes. Every gentleman who listens to me knows that what I say is true.

But I do fear, if all the favorite propositions of gentlemen, are to be made the special order for a day fixed long in advance, as for example, the Grand Jury question, gentlemen will have time to pump up all their thunder, and we may never get through.

I hope the gentleman from Posey will review his position; he knows very well the eternal duration of discussion where there are no restrictions, and no bounds, and where important questions are made the special order for a distant day. I dislike the special orders, because they afford such ample time for the preparation of speeches. When a man has got all his implements of war, his uniform, accoutrements, provisions, and all his preparations made for a march and a battle, if not a siege and campaign, it will be very difficult to restrain him and cool his patriotic ardor. [Laughter.] When gentlemen have got their speeches all prepared, their arguments ready, and their authorities at hand, it is but courteous to hear them through, because others have spoken and they must have the same privilege. Why, sir, I had no idea at all of speaking upon this question of the abolition of the Grand Jury; and here is my friend from Decatur, who at first thought the idea so novel that it was unworthy of his attention, but now, if you could see his elaborate and formidable preparations for the inflictions [much merriment all over the chamber] he designs to bestow upon us, you might be alarmed. But we shall have to hear him, sir, and after he has finished, I may have to make a speech myself [renewed merriment] in reply, although I never thought of speaking upon the subject. In this way we shall be kept here until mid-summer.

Instead of this, we should refer reports and propositions to a committee of the whole. If you would discharge your present committees, burn your journals, and go back where you started from a month since, take up the old Constitution in committee of the whole, and go over it section by section, article by article, and, if need be, line by line, like sensible men, [renewed laughter,] and as was talked of before we came here, we should shorten the session very considerably. We should be able to perform all the work required of us, before the distinguished gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) gets his proposition concerning married women's rights [laughter] discussed and disposed of to his satisfaction; and before the gentlemen from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) shall have fully discussed the abolition of the Grand Jury, and before the venerable—I don't like to use that term much, because it may be applied to me—gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Raridan) gets the Banks and Banking system of the State fixed to his mind. For the propositions of that gentleman (Mr. Raridan) have got to be made a "special order" also, and such a "special order" as they are subjects for! A proposition to extend the charter of the State bank, with all the petty banks hung around her in order; I suppose, that the greater may destroy the lesser. And then, Mr. President, I had almost forgotten that great and prolific source of discussion—the negro question! "Our negroes" we shall soon be calling them, as you hear some members of Congress, ranting about their negroes.

I do hope, sir, that my friend from Posey will reconsider his motion to make his proposition the special order for a distant day.

Mr. OWEN. I have the greatest respect for the judgment and good sense of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith). I have had occasion to know him well whilst serving with him in another deliberative body than this: but I must be permitted to say, that his present remarks, as I think, do not show his usual good sense in as favorable a light as I have observed it heretofore. What is the objection he urges? It is, that, if we make a special order, gentlemen will come here too well prepared to debate the questions before them. In truth, the especial object which I had in view in proposing a special order, is, that gentlemen may come here fully prepared. Too well prepared they cannot come. Nor do I doubt that it may tend to shorten, instead of prolonging, the time of debate, if we always came prepared as we should be. The apology was a good one, made by a gentleman to his friend, when sending him a long letter: "I write you a long letter, because I have not time to prepare a shorter one." So it will be with us. If we condense our thoughts, we shall shorten debate. But if we come here without preparation, we shall be tedious and diffuse. Subjects will come up, and must be considered and debated, whether we have prepared ourselves or not. Other gentlemen may be able to debate great measures of State policy, without deliberation. I freely confess that I never willingly engage in such debate without long preparation. I consider it due to myself, to my fellow-members, and to the subject, to bestow upon it the best powers I possess. Therefore I desire to know, beforehand, the day and hour when any important matter is to come under discussion, so that I may not be taken at unawares. The subjects to be presented to us are so multifarious, that, without such notice as this, we have little chance to be prepared as to their various details. There are the subjects of banking, of corporations generally, and many other questions scarcely less vital. Ought we not have notice on what day and hour any one of these is to be presented to the Convention, so that those who favor, and those who disfavor, the proposition to be considered, may have full opportunity to prepare, arrange, and condense, their respective reasons. Nor, even if debate should happen to be prolonged, are we to reckon here so much upon time. We are not acting here for a day, nor for a year, nor for ten years. We are acting, in all human probability, for a quarter of a century; it may be, for half a century. Shall we, with such a responsibility before us, overhurry debate? Shall we stand justified, before the people of the State, in doing so?

But, again, if at any time the Convention weary of debate, we can, according to parliamentary rule, bring it to a close, by a call of the previous question; a thing, however, which I, myself, shall be slow to do, so long as any gentleman desires to be heard. It is far better, by proceeding slowly, to lose a day or two; than to make a wrong decision which might be hard to reverse. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Convention to adopt the resolution fixing the day and hour for the consideration of the subject indicated, so that it can be sprung upon none of us unawares.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KENDALL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that hereafter all property sold on execution shall bring at least two-thirds of its appraised value.

Mr. MCLELLAND moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word "two-thirds," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "full," which was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend by striking out the word "property" and inserting "real estate."

The motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he would prefer that it should be left to those coming after us to adopt their own rules of commerce. He did not see any propriety, however just and proper it might be in a legislative point of view, in adopting this as a part of the Constitution. The object of such a proceeding, as he understood it, must grow out of the apprehension that all wisdom, justice, humanity, and true policy, would die with the dissolution of this Convention; and if those who are to come after us should be left to pursue their own course in the regulation of matters which belong peculiarly to themselves, they would be sure to go wrong. He confessed that he could not see the propriety of adopting any such thing in the new Constitution; therefore, he should vote against any reference.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick, moved to change the reference to the committee on law and law reform.

Mr. BORDEN said, it seemed to him, that the duty of the committee on law and law reform was misapprehended. He supposed if that committee should report a single section for the appointment of commissioners to report upon this subject to some future Legislature, that their work would be accomplished; for it could not be expected that they were to report even so much as a plan for the sale of real estate under execution: it would be impossible for them to set out these matters in the Constitution. It would make a book larger than the statutes.

The question being taken on Mr. GRAHAM'S motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN proposed to amend, by changing the reference to the committee on miscellaneous provisions; but before the question was taken—

On motion, by Mr. MILLER of Gibson, it was Ordered, That the resolution and amendment lie upon the table.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the organization of courts of justice be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing in the Constitution that the judicial power of this State shall be vested in

1. A Supreme Court.
2. Circuit Courts.
3. Justices of the Peace.

Provided, The Legislature may also vest such civil and criminal jurisdiction in the mayors of the incorporated cities of this State, as may be deemed necessary and proper, but such criminal jurisdiction shall not extend to capital offenses, or crimes punished by confinement in the State Prison.

The Supreme Court shall be composed of five judges who shall be chosen by the electors of the State, and shall serve for — years. The State shall be divided into five judicial districts of contiguous territory, in each of which districts one of said judges shall reside. Provision shall be made by law for designating one of the number as Chief Justice, and for so classifying said judges that one of them shall be elected every year.

The State shall be divided from time to time as the exigencies of the same may require, into judicial circuits, of contiguous territory. One judge shall be elected in each circuit by the qualified electors therein, to serve for six years. At least three terms of the circuit court shall be held in each county annually.

The qualified voters in the several townships shall, at their annual spring elections, elect justices of the peace, whose term of office shall be for three years. There shall be three in number in each township, and shall be so classified that one of them shall go out of office each year.

Mr. PETTIT proposed to amend by striking out the clause of reference and inserting a declaration that the proposition be inserted as so much of the Constitution.

Mr. WOLFE suggested, that the proposition contained no provision for probate business.

Mr. BORDEN said, that the proposition contemplated that the powers of a probate judge should be vested in a circuit judge. With reference to the motion to make this proposition so much of the Constitution, he had to say that he did not object. He submitted it, however, as a mere matter of inquiry. It contained nothing but a statement of his own views upon the organization of the courts. He supposed the gentleman from Tippecanoe could not be insulted by a motion to direct such a proposition to the committee over which he presided.

Mr. PETTIT. Not in the least; but I must insist upon my amendment—adopting the proposition as a part of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman send up his amendment in writing?

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). If any gentleman can send me a pen I will prepare it.

Mr. BASCOM. I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). Consent!

But the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. PETTIT then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CHAPMAN proposed the following for the original resolution, stating that he did so at the request of one of the ablest lawyers in the State:

“That the committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the Supreme Court shall consist of four judges, to be elected by the people by districts, to hold their offices for the term of five years, to have appellate jurisdiction, and that it shall require the concurrence of three of these judges to reverse the judgment of the court below.”

Mr. PETTIT said, he desired to state to the Convention that there were now referred to the committee on the organization of courts of justice, some dozen or fifteen resolutions—resolutions suggesting no other idea than what every practicing lawyer upon the committee must have resolved in his own mind. They consisted of directions to inquire into what must necessarily be inquired into by the committee, in order to the establishment of any judicial system. These resolutions imposed no obligation upon the committee, and they were all perfectly useless. Some half dozen of them, and perhaps a larger bundle, had been prepared with reference to abolishing the office of associate judge; a half dozen more had reference to a reporter for the supreme court; and there were two or three for abolishing the present Supreme Court and establishing a better in its stead. Of all these things it was the duty of the committee to consider, without being specially instructed. Then why encumber them with an hundred resolutions of inquiry? The committee had been called together, and it was understood and agreed upon that they would take no definite action upon these resolutions; but that they would report their propositions, merely, since they were not at liberty to report argument. They considered there was no necessity for encumbering the journal by bringing up the matter half a dozen times. It necessarily became the duty of the committee to consider whether the present Constitution had organized a proper and sufficient judiciary system for the State; and if not, they were to consult and see wherein amendments should be applied, what particular matter should be stricken out, and what added. If it were not improper to make the statement, (and he supposed it would not be so considered,) he would say, that, by order of the committee, each member had taken it upon himself to present a plan or draft of his own, embracing his plan for the organization of the courts; and it was proposed to put them all together, and consider and adopt the best one, and report that to the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN said, he had great confidence in the committee, and he believed there was no doubt that any member of that committee was well qualified to prepare a plan which would be worthy of consideration, and perhaps greatly facilitate the business of the courts. But he submitted, whether it was not proper for every member of the Convention to submit his views with reference to the organization of the judiciary? And whether any member of the committee ought to think it an intrusion for such suggestions to be proposed and directed to them. There might have been some proposition, similar to his own, heretofore suggested and referred to the committee; but he had embodied his own ideas, and he would be glad if the Convention would order their reference.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Chapman's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the original resolution,

Mr. RARIDEN said, he could have no objection to the reference of these resolutions of inquiry upon every subject; but, from the manner in which they had come to be presented and adopted, they could not indicate to the various committees the concentrated opinion of the Convention. Since it had become a mere matter of courtesy to adopt these resolutions, they had ceased to have that tendency. It had become a matter of courtesy now to adopt the suggestion of any gentleman in the form of an inquiry, and send it to a committee. The committees could no longer receive them as an expression of the mind of the Convention. He saw neither good nor harm which the reference of this resolution could possibly do. He entertained the view of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) upon this subject. If the resolution could have the effect of indicating to the committee what was the feeling of the Convention in the matter, then it would be very proper to refer it; but it was manifest that it could have no such effect.

Mr. BORDEN said, he did not know that his proposition did not indicate the feeling of the Convention upon the subject. He had submitted it to several members of the bar, and it had received their approbation. If the Convention should think his suggestion contained nothing worthy of the consideration of the committee, he hoped they would not order its reference. Although he had not himself voted against the reference of any resolution of inquiry, he hoped the Convention, unless it should be considered worthy of approbation by the majority, would reject it.

The resolution was adopted;

And then, after the consideration of matters involving no debate,

On motion,

The Convention adjourned until 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, Oct. 30, 1850.

The Convention met.

Prayer by the delegate from Putnam (Mr. FARROW).

THE LEGISLATURE.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, (Mr. WALPOLE in the chair,) and took up for consideration the resolution of Mr. Pepper of Crawford, and the pending amendments thereto, which had been made the special order for this day. The resolution and amendments were read by the Secretary, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution, that the number of representatives in the Legislature shall never exceed one hundred; and the number of senators shall never exceed fifty—leaving the Legislature with power to reduce said number at any time, if said reduction shall become necessary.

Mr. COOKERLY had proposed to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, be instructed so to amend the Constitution that the House of Representatives shall consist of seventy-five members, and the Senate shall consist of thirty-five."

Mr. RARIDEN had moved to amend the amendment, as follows: strike out all after the word "Constitution," and insert—

"That the basis of representation shall be one representative for every twenty-five hundred inhabitants; and one senator for every five thousand inhabitants, until otherwise directed by the Legislature."

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson suggested, that the committee on the legislative department had considered the subject embraced in this resolution, and the pending amendments, and would be ready to report to-morrow, and, therefore, in order that the committee of the whole might have the benefit of this report, he moved that the subject be laid upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN said, such a motion was not in order in committee of the whole.

Mr. MILLER then moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN suggested that, according to his recollection, the several standing committees had been discharged from the consideration of this subject; and that this was done at the time when the subject was referred to the committee of the whole, and made the special order for this day.

Mr. COOKERLY. What committee does the gentleman from Gibson refer to?

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. The committee on the legislative department.

Mr. PETTIT called for the reading of the journal of October 25th, with reference to this subject.

And the passage referred to was accordingly read by the Secretary.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said, he understood that, upon the motion of the delegate now in the chair, the Convention had discharged the standing committees having this subject before them, from its further consideration, and that it was referred to the committee of the whole, and made the especial order for this day. Notwithstanding this action of the Convention, the committee on the legislative department had proceeded to consider the subject, and would be ready to report to-morrow. The committee on the elective franchise, according to order, had not made out any report, preferring that the Convention should take what course they pleased. He trusted that the committee would not rise without giving some expression of opinion as to the prospective number of senators and representatives.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson said, he did not understand when this business was taken out of the hands of the committee on the elective franchise, that it was also taken away from the other committee.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. Does not the journal read "all committees?"

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). "The committees."

Mr. COOKERLY said, he hoped the committee would not rise. It was important that this question should be settled as soon as possible; in order that the committee on apportionment might go to work.

The question was now taken on the motion to rise, and it was lost.

The CHAIRMAN again stated the question to be upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) to the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly).

Mr. PETTIT said, he would like to have some ready writer or figurer cypher it out, and tell us how many senators and representatives we would have under the ratio of apportionment proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, provided there were a million of voters in the State?

Mr. DOBSON said, that if his figures were right, and he believed they were, there would be thirty-six senators and seventy-two representatives.

Mr. PETTIT inquired whether the rule applied to polls or citizens?

Mr. DOBSON. To polls.

A VOICE. "Voters."

The question being taken upon the amendment to the amendment, it was rejected; and the question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. Cookerly,

Mr. COOKERLY said: Mr. CHAIRMAN—I do not desire to trouble the committee any further than to say, that it does not seem to me that the Convention ought to reduce the number of senators and representatives. I think this is a reform which the people look for. I know they do in our section. We have too many senators, in my opinion; and too many representatives also: and we ought to reduce their number, if for no other purpose than that of economy. I would ask why, in the name of reason, seventy representatives and thirty senators cannot legislate just as well for the freemen of Indiana, as one hundred representatives and fifty senators? This is an old and familiar question in this State. It has been agitated in this Hall before; and, I trust the Convention, before it decides not to reduce the present number of senators and representatives, will, at least, stop and reflect seriously upon the subject. The great reason why the people voted for the call of this Convention, was embraced in the hope of being able to economize the public expenses; and are the people to be deceived in regard to this matter? I hold this to be a rule by which we should always be guided, that every man who is a representative of the people, should vote for every measure to economize the public expenditures without detriment to the public interest. I should like, now, to hear from the other side, the reasons why the number of senators and representatives should not be reduced.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo:

"That the whole number of members composing the General Assembly, shall consist of 120; of which number 30 shall constitute the Senate, and 90 the House of Representatives."

Mr. EDMONSTON. I have but a few words to say in regard to the number of Senators and Representatives. I think, sir, if gentlemen will reflect a little, they cannot but come to the conclusion that, since we have adopted biennial sessions of the Legislature, every portion of the State will be anxious for a fair representation. Every gentleman upon this floor is not situated in this respect like the gentleman from Vigo, who comes from a large and populous county, which is always sure to be entitled to a full representation. His condition is very unlike those coming from the smaller and sparsely settled counties, where you have to tie up four or five of them to make a representative district. The representative of one of these large and thinly settled districts cannot look so well to the wants and interests of the people of any county in his district in which he does not himself reside. I would be willing to diminish the present number of Senators, but not of the Representatives. It is also my opinion, that if you diminish the number of Representatives, you ought to increase the per diem, for no competent man would be found willing to traverse such a vast extent of territory as his canvassing might require of him, for the per diem now allowed.

The vote was then taken on Mr. FOSTER'S amendment, and it was rejected; and the question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. Cookerly—

Mr. BASCOM proposed the following amendment, which was read by the Secretary:

"That there shall be one Senator for every three thousand voters, and one Representative for every one thousand voters."

Mr. BASCOM. I am sure, sir, that no person representing two counties can do that justice to the interests of both, which its position requires of him. It is impossible. I know it is the case in my part of the State, where two or three counties are included in one representative district, that there is not the same interest felt for each of these counties in the legislature which every county should be entitled to. The Representative can not act for all so well as for the county in which he may happen to reside. He might find himself acting for the advancement of the interests of his own county, and to the detriment of important interests of other counties in his district at the same time. With respect to the economy of the argument, gentlemen might as well say, that we will take a select counsel of ten, to do up the business of our legislation, or give it all to your Governor—allow him to make the laws—and so save all the expense of legislation. I agree fully with the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) that every part of the State should have a full representation. There are the old counties of Dearborn, Wayne, Marion, and Vigo—they will be here, and their voice will be heard, under any ratio which can be devised; but the voice of a sparsely settled northern county will hardly ever be heard in these halls. Sir, we ask for a scale of apportionment by which the voice of every county shall be heard. There is great humbug in the pretension that a few men can better transact business, in a deliberative body, than a larger number. A few wise men, it is proposed, shall assemble here—the Representatives of a few large counties—and very patronizingly they would agree to take a kind of supervisory care over all the smaller counties of the State. The larger counties will take the smaller counties under their wings and arrogate to themselves, and swallow up the whole of, the business of legislation. Sir, we have, every man, an interest in his own county, and we want to have every county represented. We, who live in the newly settled portions of the State, are unwilling to be deprived of our right to a representation here. We, also, claim that our voice shall be heard in making the laws. I care not for the reduction of the Senate, but I do think the larger branch of the Legislature should come as near to the people as possible; and I think that upon the ratio which I have suggested, in a very few years every county would be entitled to at least one Representative.

Mr. NAVE said: Mr. Chairman, I regard this as one of the most important propositions that can come before this Convention. It carries with it, and it involves deeply, the interests of the people of Indiana. It proposes to lessen the expense of legislation. Looking over the past history of the legislation of Indiana, we can come to no other conclusion than this: that the vast amount of legislation which has been imposed upon the people, under the present organization of the House of Representatives of one hundred, and of a Senate of fifty members, has proved a curse rather than a blessing. If the people of Indiana could now go back to the session of 1831, and dispense with all the legislation that has taken place since, it would be better for them—they would be better off without it than they are in the present condition of their public affairs, resulting from the legislation since that time. All, or nearly all, of our State legislation since that time, has only increased the difficulty in the minds of men of common understanding, about the administration of the law. Therefore, it becomes important for the Convention to inquire into this question and ascertain what has induced such a vast amount of legislation, without any good effect upon the interests of the people. If they find that it is in consequence of too large a number of Senators and Representatives, it is important that we should reduce their numbers so that, in future, we may have judicious and righteous laws, applicable to a straight-forward common sense administration of justice.

The proposition of the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) would give us nearly two hundred Representatives. He says that it is important that we should have every county in the State represented. Let us look at his argument. In my opinion, it has no force whatever. For, if two or three counties are taken together to form one representative district, I ask you, sir, if, upon looking over all this large territory for a man qualified properly to represent them, the people would not be more apt to get a proper man—honest, and capable, and faithful—to whose hands they might entrust the interests of the entire district, with the prospect of being better represented than if they were confined to a single county, in making their selection? This argument, then, falls to the ground.

Another argument for this reduction, is to be found in the fact, that if we have a smaller number of Representatives they will be able to do more business in less time. My opinion is that if there were but seventy delegates in this Convention, we could do the business before us in half the time that will now be required, with a hundred and fifty. Men's opinions are different upon different subjects, and whilst each man, respectively, contends for the interests of his constituents, if anything is done amongst such a complication of interests, it must be the result of a compromise, which is not often adjusted upon the most desirable foundations.

And the argument for this reduction is to be found in the fact that the larger the number of Representatives the greater will be the amount of legislation imposed upon the people, and the number of the laws being increased they, of course, become more difficult of understanding and administration among the measures of the people. I hope, sir, that our Legislature will be restricted to the passage of few laws, and those of a general character. I hope that we shall be able to dispense wholly with special legislation, and if so, then one man certainly, can much more satisfactorily represent a larger district.

Sir, I have some acquaintance with the people of Indiana, and there is no county of which I have any knowledge, but what is desirous that the number of our Senators and Representatives should be diminished. I am of the opinion of the gentleman from Vigo (Mr. COOKERLY) that seventy Representatives and thirty Senators would be altogether sufficient to answer the wants of the people for all time to come.

My friend on the left (Mr. Edmonston) has said that we could not find candidates willing to go to the trouble of canvassing a large district. Sir, there are too many men in our State who desire office, and it would be better to restrain this desire, than to offer inducements which would increase the number of candidates. But the gentleman says, if we decrease the number of Representatives it should be followed by an increase of their per diem. But I see no necessity, at all, for that, in order to fill these Halls with Representatives. I have never yet seen any lack of willingness to come up here as the people's Representative. Then this argument, also, falls to the ground.

There is nothing, sir, in the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, that we should not adopt as a feature of the new Constitution. The people would rejoice to see such a feature in the Constitution which is to be submitted for their approval. Then it seems to me that we should give this expression now, while we are in committee of the whole, so that the committees which may be affected by such an opinion here, may have this guide before them in preparing their propositions. In making these suggestions, I intend to offer no discourtesy to the mover of the resolution, (Mr. Pepper of Crawford,) nor to the gentleman on my right, (Mr. Bascom,) but rather to urge the importance of settling this question now, by giving an expression to the feeling of the majority in relation to it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said, Mr. CHAIRMAN:—The gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly) has called upon those who are opposed to his proposition, to come forward and give their reasons for refusing to vote for it. But I believe that, whenever a man proposes a change of established usages, it is incumbent upon him first to show his reasons for the change, instead of calling for reasons from those who may be opposed to it.

The gentleman from Vigo has affirmed that the principal object in calling this Convention was the consideration that we might economize and retrench the future expenses of the government, as though the people had not any such object in view as good government. But I understand the reasons for the call to have been placed upon quite a different ground. It was, that we might incorporate in the new Constitution the changes that time, experience and progress in the science of government, have demonstrated to be absolutely necessary to the future growth and prosperity of our State, and to secure to each of her citizens the full enjoyment and unrestrained exercise of his "natural, inherent, and unalienable rights." This, sir, was the principle; economy the incident.

The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) affirms, that the people of the State have been long cursed with too many Representatives and Senators, and that they will hail with joy any provision for the reduction of their number. We have thus the bare unsupported assertion of the gentleman, and he intimates that it was the work of too many Representatives which plunged the State into debt. But how stands the fact? Was it really under the legislative hand of one hundred Representatives that the people have been plunged into debt; or was it not under the legislative supervision of seventy-five Representatives and thirty-six Senators? The latter appears to be the fact. Then the interests of the people seem not to have been so well guarded in this instance, with a smaller number of Representatives, as they might have been with a larger number. It is my opinion, if the larger number of Representatives had been in this Hall at that time, the bill which plunged the State into debt, never would have been passed in the shape it was. But in this I may be mistaken.

Sir, do you seriously believe now, when our people are increasing in numbers daily, that we should set about decreasing the number of our Representatives? Sir, it would be making a retrograde movement. This is the only proposition for reform which has been presented here for which we are without a precedent in the action of other State Conventions. There is no constitution that has been recently adopted in which they have incorporated this kind of a reform with reference to the popular branch of the Legislature. Sir, this branch of the legislative power should be brought as near to the people as practicable, and whenever we can get it so near that it will most completely reflect the popular will, then we shall be no more affected by those fluctuations and changes in the law of which the gentleman speaks.

Sir, I affirm that the number of Representatives can have nothing to do with either the power or the disposition to pass either special or general laws. The change from seventy-five Representatives and thirty-three or thirty-four Senators, to the present number in the two branches of the Legislature was made, if I recollect aright, during the session of 1835-6. The power to change again has, of course, ever since resided in the same body; but it is a little remarkable that no petition from the people has ever yet been received by any member of all the Legislatures, since that time, to decrease the present number, and I take this fact as a sure indication that the people do not desire any diminution of the present number of Senators and Representatives.

With reference to this cry of economy, I have heard it often, and I know its potency with many; but for myself, and with respect to our duties here, I do not look with an eye single to expense; I look to results, and I would say, let all the results of the action of this body be as beneficial as possible, and whatever the necessary expense is, let us cheerfully pay it.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. If the amendment of the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) should prevail, one of the first duties that will devolve upon the Legislature, will be to provide for the erection of a new State House. The report of the Auditor of State shows that we have about one hundred and eighty-six thousand voters, which would give us, according to the gentleman's amendment, one hundred and eighty-six representatives and sixty-two Senators. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the interests of the State, instead of requiring an increase, require a considerable reduction of the number of members of each branch of the General Assembly. One argument urged in favor of a numerous representation is that thereby the popular will can be more surely ascertained and expressed. There would be more plausibility in this argument, if a provision was made for dividing counties into representative districts, so that every representative would have a separate constituency. Under the present apportionment many counties have two or three members of the House of Representatives, and the county of Wayne sometimes has four. These representatives, elected by the same constituency, almost invariably agree and vote alike upon all questions of importance. Why, then, could not one representative as well express the wishes of the people of his county as two, three, or four representatives? It is true that by reducing the ratio of representation it will be necessary in the more sparsely settled parts of the State, to unite two or more counties in the formation of representative districts. This is the case now in the northern part of the State. But that part of the State is rapidly increasing in population. Northern Indiana will soon control the legislation of the State, and I care not how soon, provided she obtains that control by the increase of her population.

Our representation must be based upon population, and not upon territory, and we should cheerfully submit to a temporary inconvenience for the sake of a permanent good. It is to be hoped that this Convention will devise some means of preventing, in the future, so much local legislation as we have heretofore had. Yet under any provision we may adopt, that does not unreasonably restrain the popular will, we will have much local legislation if we retain a very numerous body of legislators. Unite a larger number of interests in a representative district, and your legislation will become more general in its character. Of course there must be a reasonable limit to the reduction of the ratio of representation. The representation should be large enough to unite in the General Assembly, a knowledge of the wants, the grievances, and the interests of the people in every part of the State, and it ought to be no larger than is necessary for this purpose. It appears to me that the representation proposed by the gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly) is amply sufficient for this purpose. One hundred men, judiciously selected, from every part of the State, will certainly possess information of every want of the people that should be supplied by legislation, of every grievance that should be redressed, and of every interest that should be protected.

Moreover, if we reduce the number of our legislators, the responsibility devolved upon each legislator will be, to the same extent, increased. This increased responsibility will, at least, have two good effects—it will cause the people to be more careful whom they select as their law-makers, and it will cause the law-makers to be more careful and deliberate in their enactments. With a reduced representation, both houses will, hereafter, be deliberative assemblies, and not what they have heretofore sometimes been, but little better than excited mobs. I believe, sir, that this Convention, if, instead of being composed of one hundred and fifty members, had but fifty, that we would much sooner accomplish the duty assigned to us, and that we would be able to present to the people, a Constitution more worthy of their acceptance than any we shall be able to agree upon, constituted as we are.

Mr. HARBOLT said, this question has interested me as much as any other, that has been before this body. I have the honor to represent as large a district as any in the State; and I shall vote against reducing the number of representatives. I think the present number small enough. I admit the fact just alleged, that the smaller the number of members, the less legislation. For, in such a case, the majority can much more easily and efficiently organize; and, having the power, they will just legislate for themselves and go home—and the minority must look out for themselves.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It ought to be recollected that we have a larger Senate than any other State in the Union. If you go to New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio, you will find their Senates are all smaller than ours. New York has 32 senators; Pennsylvania has 36; and Ohio has 36. I have observed also, that, by the amended Constitution of Illinois, their Senate is made to consist of only 25 members. I believe we ought to have a smaller number of senators and representatives in this State: and I rather incline to the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) which proposes that the Senate shall consist of 30 members. With reference to the House of Representatives, whenever the power of local legislation shall be restrained, there will be no need for small districts, and a larger number of representatives. For, if the number should remain so large, then there would be but a small personal responsibility resting upon each member, where the number of representatives consists of two, or three, or four hundred, as in some of the Eastern States, the amount of the personal responsibility of each member must be very small. But, when you reduce the number to 60 or 70, as the gentleman from Vigo proposes, the personal responsibility will be much greater. We should not allow the number of the members of our legislative bodies to be reduced so low as to be exposed to that peculiar influence which might control a small number of men. But thirty is so large a number, that this peculiar influence would not be likely to sway them more than a larger body. I am in favor of reducing the number of senators from 36 to 28, and the number of representatives from 80 to 60.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford said, having offered the original resolution, I deem it proper to say a few words on the question now before the committee. I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wells, because that would make the representation altogether too large. I shall also oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) because that would reduce the number of Senators and Representatives below a proper medium.

The number proposed in the original resolution I think about right.

The argument of economy, so eloquently used by gentlemen on this floor, which I admit should be strictly observed at all times, has no great weight upon my mind, as they attempt to apply it to this question.

By a most decisive vote of the Convention it has been determined that the General Assembly shall be regularly convened but once in two years, giving the Governor power to call an extra session in cases of emergency. It is now further pretty generally understood that all local and special legislation, in this State, is to be prohibited by a constitutional provision; and that hereafter general laws only will be devised for the charter and regulation of all incorporated companies which heretofore have taken up much of the time of the Legislature and at great expense to the State.

Thus the abuses and much expense of legislation will be avoided without the necessity of restricting the representative principle.

But it was very correctly remarked by the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham,) that economy is not the only thing to be regarded in legislation—that it is not a primary, but only an incidental consideration, and far below that of a fair and full expression of the popular will when the whole people desire a voice in saying who shall make the laws that are to protect their lives, liberty, and property.

Another view has been taken of this subject, to which I attach some importance.

The people, who have at all times had the power to reduce the number of our Senators and Representatives, have never yet demanded such reduction; and members, coming up every year fresh from the people, have never yet considered it necessary.

Why, then, I ask, should we feel called upon at this time, when the State is increasing rapidly in wealth and population, to reduce the number of our representation below the standard which has been deliberately fixed by the people, and acquiesced in for so long a time? The original resolution proposes, also, that the representation of the popular branch of the Legislature shall never exceed one hundred members, and the Senate shall never exceed fifty members, leaving the right with the people at any time to reduce those numbers below that limit when it shall be thought necessary. This was the ground I took before my constituents; my opponent went for a reduction of representation, and in favor of fixing the number in the Constitution.

I would warn gentlemen against stifling the voice of small counties. It may be, the new Constitution will want all the votes it will be able to get and if thinly settled districts are to be virtually deprived from having any voice in the councils of the State, it may be the cause of rejecting it. I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to adopt the resolution.

Mr. TAGUE. I shall favor the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, for several reasons. First, because, in my opinion, this is one of the modes by which the public expenses are to be reduced, and the public burthens lightened. It will be found a very material annual reduction of State expenses to reduce the number of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, as proposed. It is true that Representatives come up here annually, and that men are always found who are willing to come. And so, if the number was five hundred, there would always be found enough to come up here and serve the State. But the question for the consideration of the Convention is, "Is it good policy to have a large representation?" For one, sir, I think it is not. If it is in order, I have an amendment which I should like to offer.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to move an amendment at this time, but the gentleman has a right to read it for information, if he chooses.

Mr. TAGUE. Then I will read it for the information of the Convention. Of course it will not suit the views of delegates from the strong and populous counties. I propose to amend so as to allow one Representative from each county in the State, and thirty Senators from the whole State. [Cries of "consent," "consent."] Now, if we make a good Constitution, it will remain the organic law of the State for many years—as the gentleman from Posey remarked yesterday, for a quarter or a half century. My object in offering the amendment, is in view of the fact, that in the course of eight or ten years those counties which are now the weak ones of the State, those which are now thinly populated, may be as strong and as populous as those which are regarded as the strong counties now. Then there would be still less objection to an apportionment of one Representative from each county in the State, and all must see the great advantages of such a system.

At the proper time I shall offer the amendment which I have just read.

Mr. SHERROD. Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not rise at this time for the purpose of making a speech. I simply desire, in a few words, to set myself right, as to my position with regard to the question now before the Convention, before the people of the State.

I am in favor of, and shall support, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vigo. I advocated that proposition before I came here, before the people of the district which I have the honor to represent.

Now, sir, let us inquire what is the great object for which this Convention was called? I do not —

The CHAIRMAN observed that the door-keepers were distributing documents, which created considerable "noise and confusion" in the chamber. It was against the rules, and he should enforce them by ordering the door-keeper to desist until gentlemen had finished debating.

Mr. SHERROD. I was asking what were the objects for the assembling of this Convention? I have never understood the object of the people in calling this body together, merely to economize, although it should have considerable weight. No, sir, we are sent here to frame the organic law of the State. To frame a Constitution for the people of the State, in accordance with the advanced and still progressive spirit of the age; in accordance with the well known wishes of the people; a Constitution that will be approved and ratified by the people; a Constitution, sir, which will enable Indiana, unfettered by unpopular restrictions, to rise in her strength and beauty, and take her place among the constellation of United States as a star of the first magnitude. [Applause.]

"History is philosophy teaching by example," and I ask, what has the past history of Indiana taught us? What are its significant lessons, that should now be examples to her delegates in Constitutional Convention assembled? Sir, if there ever was a State under the canopy of Heaven, cursed by too much legislation, it is the State of Indiana. [Cries of "consent, consent,"] This being an admitted fact, we must look carefully and earnestly about us for a remedy of the tendency to excessive legislation.

To be brief, as I do not desire to make a speech, I contend that the proposition now before the Convention to reduce the number of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, will not only greatly reduce the aggregate amount of annual State expenses, but it will have the effect to give tone and character to our legislative bodies. It will have the effect to bring up here the best men and the best talent in the State. The people would have, what they greatly desire, more stability, and less change and vacillating in their legislation.

There is a disposition among the people to cut off special legislation, and encourage only that which is general in its character.

Without extending my remarks, I will simply observe again, that I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, believing that it will have the beneficial effects I have alluded to.

Mr. SHOUP asked, what would be the effect of calling for the previous question.

The CHAIRMAN remarked, that the previous question could not be demanded while the Convention was in committee of the whole.

Mr. SHOUP. My object is to bring this unnecessary discussion to a close. I would be glad to see this question settled and disposed of, for it is evident that no good can grow out of this discussion. Our minds are all made up, and it is not probable that a week's argument would change the action of a single member, relative to the present proposition. I would be the last man to suppress discussion or cut off debate, where it had a reasonable prospect of doing any good. But, sir, much time has been consumed already, and if the Convention proceeds to discuss at length every simple proposition thrown in here, and if every member must take up the time of the body for the avowed purpose of setting himself right and defining his position, we shall have so voluminous a journal that it will require a cart and yoke of oxen to transport it over the State. There is another way for gentlemen to set themselves right without consuming time. There are a large number here who are as anxious as other gentlemen, to have their position, upon important questions, correctly understood at home, but they are unwilling to take up time in making speeches, and they will not do it. They refrain from speaking because, in their modest opinion of themselves, they can do no good; but, sir, they will show their position by their votes.

I agree in opinion with the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith). I am opposed to this practice of preparing speeches by hunting up books, newspapers, &c. &c. The people, sir, are prepared for action; they knew what they wanted done here before the election of delegates, and the delegates themselves know very well the wishes of their constituents upon all the changes desired in the old Constitution; they are few and simple. The people contemplated a change as to the frequency of legislative sessions—some wished triennial sessions. but the majority were in favor of biennial sessions. Some change was required with regard to the management of the school fund, and a change with regard to the position of the State toward banking institutions. All this it would be easy to settle in a few weeks, if not in a few days, provided there was less debating and more working.

As to the question now before the Convention, my own opinion is, that thirty Senators and sixty Representatives, or near that number, would better subserve the interests of the State than any other. The House might be made larger without very serious detriment, perhaps, to the character of the body. I would be willing to compromise the matter with those who differ with me, so that there should be one Representative from each county in the State, and thirty Senators from the whole State. But a small number will suit the people of the State, because they wish to economize the public expenditures, and a difference of two hundred dollars per day, or of but one hundred dollars per day in the cost of legislation, would amount, in the course of years, to a vast aggregate. If we cut off local legislation and confine the Legislature to the passing of bills of a general character, there will still be less need of a large number of members of the House of Representatives.

But, sir, I do not desire to discuss the question, and I find I am running into the very habit which I have condemned.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Like the gentlemen who have preceded me, Mr. Chairman, "I do not rise to make a speech, but merely to set myself right." [A laugh.] The gentleman who addressed us last, thought it strange that this Convention was in a position where it could neither take the previous question, call the ayes and noes, or adjourn. Now, sir, I wish to inform gentlemen who do not seem to reflect upon the effect of the Convention resolving itself into a committee of the whole, that for the first time since our organization we are in the very position where all that is done and said, all the various propositions and amendments that are made, do not go upon the Journal. In my opinion we are now in the best position to get along with business. We are not building up an unwieldy journal, and although there may be considerable debate, it will be more apt to be to the point, and the sense of the Convention will be understood upon whatever comes up.

To the gentleman last on the floor, I wish to remark that the question now before us is one of the most important that we shall discuss during the session. And why? It is important to the people of Indiana that we should find and declare a just proportion between the number of Representatives and the represented body.

There seems to be a great variety of opinion among gentlemen, as to the proper number of members of either branch of the Legislature. Some consider that seventy members of the popular branch, and thirty members of the Senate, to be the proper and just proportion; others for larger combinations. For my own part, and I have reflected considerably on the subject, I think that one hundred members of the House of Representatives, and fifty Senators, is the best number we can devise—the number which we now have under the old Constitution. I think there are neither too many nor too few, but that a due proportion exists between the number of Representatives and the great body of the represented. The counties of the State are all very nearly of the same size, and where there are inequalities of population, emigration will very soon equalize the difference between the greater and the lesser. If we continue the present apportionment we shall have, in the course of twenty-five or thirty years, a Representative from nearly every county in the State, and all know how much this is to be desired. But should the idea of the gentleman from Jefferson prevail, to reduce the number of members of the Legislature at least one-third, we might have better qualified and more talented men sent up here—the Legislature might, perhaps, be more dignified and able—but, sir, it would follow that all portions of the State, the whole people, would not be so well represented as now. I grant that the ability and talent of this Convention might be concentrated in the heads of a few men, instead of this respectable body of one hundred and fifty members; but, though the few might possess the talent and constitute a very brilliant body, they would not so accurately represent the views, and feelings, and wishes of the whole people of Indiana, as does this large and truly respectable body.

A single remark as to the opinion that large bodies of men have a tendency to protract Legislative or Convention sessions. I say that the reverse is true. I tell you that the very numbers and weight of this body will, if our labors are ever brought to a close, be the means of terminating the session. There are at least seventy Delegates on this floor, sir, who, if they had the disposition, could talk eternally. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, eternally! for I have had my conception of the power of endurance of speakers wonderfully enlarged since I came here. [Renewed laughter.] I say there are seventy men who could thus occupy the time of the Convention in making speeches, but they will not do it; who, knowing the wishes and will of the people, and knowing how little any debate here will change the final result, will content themselves by voting. These men, sir, will throw their weight upon you by and by, when they think you have talked enough. They will force the talking man into action by the demand for the previous question.

One gentleman has referred us to the Legislature of Massachusetts, where the Lower House has some five or six hundred members. But, sir, these men are only allowed two and three minute speeches—that length is all that is tolerated—and there is as much expedition in legislation as where the number of legislators is much smaller.

But the idea to be kept in view is this: there should be a fair proportion maintained between the constituent body and the number of Representatives. The Representatives should be diffused over all parts of the State. I believe that the proper mean is now established, and that it is best to adopt the number of one hundred for the House and fifty for the Senate. You might dispense with the Senate altogether if you thought proper. Greater men than I am have proposed but a single legislative branch. Benjamin Franklin was opposed to having any such body as a Senate in the legislative department of the Federal Government.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words upon the question now pending; but I shall endeavor to be brief, not only to save gentlemen from annoyance, but because my business is not that of speech-making. I should not have said a word, but for an allusion to the county of Marion, which I, in part, represent. It has been supposed, sir, that the county of Marion, as well as other large counties, would probably be in favor of limited representation. This is a mistaken notion, I am sure. I think I am safe in saying that the people of Marion county will raise no objection to your sending up as many members of the General Assembly as you please. [Laughter.] This may possibly be regarded as a matter of interest, rather than principle, by some; but, for one, I do not thus contemplate it. As one citizen of Marion, and as a republican, I declare I am opposed to a small representation upon principle.

The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) has enumerated some of the advantages of a liberal representation; but, in my opinion, he failed to mention the chief of those advantages. I refer to the quality denominated HONESTY—yes, sir, HONESTY—a commodity, I am sorry to say, not as plentiful among politicians as it should be.

I agree generally, sir, with the gentleman from Warrick (Mr. Graham). If I correctly apprehended him, he maintained the old radical republican doctrines upon this important subject. I have, therefore, less to say in my own behalf than I might otherwise consider necessary. I will merely add my testimony to his, that I also believe that this State would not now be groaning under the present enormous debt—the people would not have been cursed with so many acts of improvident and corrupt “log-rolling” legislation, if the people had been represented in the General Assembly by twice the number which they could legally send.

I am the more opposed to the fixing of a small representative ratio in the Constitution, inasmuch as the Convention has already, by a sort of informal but imperative vote, decided to reduce the power of the people over the State Government at least one half, by declaring in favor of biennial sessions of the General Assembly. Sir, I cannot help expressing my utter astonishment, even now, at the tremendous vote by which that question was carried. Nor have I been much less astonished, at hearing many members of this honorable body, in conversation outside of the bar, admit freely, that in voting thus to razee the popular power, they had voted not only against their own convictions, but against the original principles of republicanism, and had no other excuse to offer than the fact that they voted in accordance with the wishes of their constituents, who desired to rid themselves of the evils of bad legislation.

No man is more conscious of those evils than myself; no man is more anxious to remove and eradicate them. But I can assure your people, sir, as I declared to mine, during the canvass, that biennial sessions are not only impotent as a remedy, but will rather tend to increase the evil which we would avoid, by putting bad legislation beyond the reach of immediate correction.

The honorable and learned gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) has referred to the Senatorial bodies of Massachusetts and other eastern States, as an exemplar in favor of limited representation. But it appears to me that he overlooked some important features in their system. In Massachusetts, particularly, the Senatorial qualification is based upon property. I refer you, sir, not only to the Constitution of that State for confirmation of this fact, but to the speeches of Daniel Webster, who was a member of its last Constitutional Convention, and who labored successfully to perpetuate the property basis of the Senatorial body. But when you look to the constitution of the House of Representatives, the aspect of the subject is entirely changed. In no State are the people more fully represented—the popular branch being perhaps the largest in the world, comparatively, every town being entitled to a Representative for each two hundred and fifty polls, and being subject to a fine at the pleasure of the Legislature, if it fails to send up a Representation accordingly. In no State of the Union are the people better governed; in no State are the people better satisfied with their system of government.

Another thing, almost equally important, was also overlooked. All the eastern States maintain annual sessions. The people there, imbued as they are with those "pilgrim-father" principles which were the germ of our present political system, would revolt at a proposition to curtail their control over the laws, either by abrogating annual sessions, or by any great reduction in the number of their Representatives. They never yet have forgotten, that "in a multitude of council there is safety."

Another gentleman (Mr. Dunn of Jefferson) has argued, that if we make the number of Representatives small, the people will seek out and send up men of greater talents and ability. This may possibly be true, Mr. Chairman, but it strikes at the very vitals of republican government! Talk about the ability of a few men to legislate for the State; tell me that by having twenty-five men in one branch of the General Assembly and fifty in the other, we shall command the best talent and political ability in the State! Then why not institute a "Council of Ten"* at once, with the Governor at its head?

I, sir, have seen enough, even in my short political experience, to convince me that the smaller the number of any legislative body, the easier is it to be controlled and managed by sinister influences. I have seen the political and the financial affairs of the body politic controlled by a few men of undoubted personal ability. Perhaps a class of the same men would now desire to obtain a controlling influence over the vast commercial interests of the State! These gentlemen may well be in favor of a small representation, because they may thus the more easily direct its action in their own favor.

Sir, the people themselves are in error in this matter, and I, for one, will tell them so. I have known reputed "great men" who, no doubt, the people would have at one time trusted implicitly, and in whom I myself had great confidence. But did the people know their true character as well as I now do, they would agree with me, that such men would do more appropriate service in other than a legislative hall; they would be more fitly employed in the southern region of the State—in the hall at—— [laughter, and cries of "consent."] Talent and ability is one thing—integrity and honesty of purpose and design, is quite a different one.

Mr. Chairman, the philosophy of this matter may be reduced almost to a single sentence. Legislation is either a good or an evil, in the abstract. If it be an absolute evil, we had better abrogate the power to legislate altogether. Even if the evil predominates over the good, perhaps we should be justified in abrogating the legislative department. But I have no doubt that the good has far exceeded the bad, improvident and reckless as our legislation has undoubtedly been in times past.

It is not mere law-making that should be considered in settling this question. There are other things besides the absolute and direct good of legislation which are achieved by the assembling here of the Representatives of the people. Upon this point I refer gentlemen to some observations made by Grimke, in his book upon Free Institutions, who expresses my ideas better than I shall attempt to do for myself, though I am not indebted to him for my opinions.

Sir, political considerations are not alone involved in these assemblages of the people's Representatives. We are profited by the acquisition of additional knowledge, and the general interchange of sentiment, upon all subjects of public and private interest. Members of the General Assembly come up from all quarters of the State; they are improved by contact and consultation, and return to diffuse among their constituents, the stock of knowledge thus attained. This consideration alone, sir, is almost enough to determine the question, for this is, in the most enlarged sense, an assembly of the people, and touches all their material interests. The professional classes well appreciate advantages of this character. The clergy have their annual convocations, the medical profession their conventions and societies, and the lawyers are continually commingling together in their respective circuits. Thus are they strengthened by the intercommunication of ideas and the results of experimental and practical knowledge. But the great laboring mass of men have no such re-unions, and the nearest approximation to them is the General Assembly, against which almost the entire weight of this Convention seems to be unrelentingly directed.

Sir, I confess that I have been utterly astounded at some of the expressions which have been directed against this popular department of the government. One gentleman has even declared that "to increase the number of Representatives would be FATAL to the prosperity of the State!" Sir, a doctrine so monstrous as this declaration implies, might well be preached in enslaved Hungary by the butcher Haynau, but I confess my inexpressible astonishment to hear it uttered in such a body, at such an era, and in such a country as our own. If that doctrine be true, sir, we should be ready to say with Pope:

"For forms of government let fools contest,
That which is best administered is best."

Mr. Chairman, so important, fundamentally, do I regard these retrograde movements in reference to full and frequent representation of the people, and of their control over the laws, and through those laws the control of their officers, so anti-republican do these movements seem to me, in every aspect in which they can be viewed, that I assure you if we should do nothing worse than this, I should feel doubtful about giving my sanction, as an individual voter, to the new Constitution which we propose to submit to the people. My hope is that we shall introduce one redeeming feature, permitting the people speedily to amend any error which we may commit, and which experience may demonstrate to them.

Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore found it so difficult to get the floor that I feel inclined to keep it a few moments longer, while I briefly define my position upon the subject of legislation. We have heard a great deal of complaint about local legislation, and these complaints have brought us to most erroneous conclusions. But local legislation, or legislation for localities, is not the positive evil which it is generally supposed to be. Under our present system it is absolutely necessary, in order to promote the interest and answer the rightful demands of the people. I admit that this system is one of general inconvenience, but a remedy cannot be found for this comparative evil by divesting the people of the right to exercise the power, nor by refusing to pass such laws as they have a right to demand, for the promotion of their various interests. For instance, sir, a bridge is wanted across White River, in this county; our people are not alone interested, though they are chiefly so. Under your present system of legislation they must apply to the General Assembly to be allowed to build that bridge. Would it not be a denial of the exercise of their just rights to refuse to pass a local act to grant them permission to build such a bridge with their own money? The time consumed by the General Assembly in passing such an act might be a comparative evil; but the refusal to pass it would inflict a positive evil upon the people interested.

According to my classification, sir, there are at least four distinct kinds of legislation, which have generally been confounded. I specify them thus: general legislation, local legislation, special legislation, and bad legislation. You cannot eradicate the evil principle in any of these, either by biennial sessions, or by the reduction of the representative ratio; but you may increase the evil, and render it more burdensome. You must apply a very different remedy from that which proposes a denial of the just rights of any portion of the people. It is comparatively easy to check bad and special legislation, by adopting Constitutional rules of restraint. But if you would retain the good now effected by local legislation, and which I say the people of every locality have a right to demand, something more than mere restriction, and something different, is absolutely necessary.

Sir, you must re-organize your county governments, and give the people the power to do their own local legislation! You must take away the necessity of local legislation by the General Assembly. You must do away with your present boards of three county commissioners, and make the local legislatures respectable and responsible; giving to each township at least one Representative in the county Legislature, and permitting the county board thus constituted to legislate upon all matters of local interest, under the control of general laws, which should apply to every county alike. Let the same relations exist between the counties and the State which exists between the State and the General Government; and so regulate your general statutes that they will operate upon these local bodies as the Constitution of the State regulates the action of the General Assembly.

I repeat, sir, again and again, that you cannot eradicate the evils of legislation by curtailing the power of the people to make their own laws, but by the institution of biennial sessions, nor by the reduction of Representatives. To arrive at a remedy, we must reform our system, as I have suggested; and in favor of it I have high authority to back my own judgment. Mr. Jefferson, as long ago as 1816, in his letter to Kercheval, urged a reform very similar, and I refer gentlemen to that letter for better information. If this Convention should only adopt the reforms there indicated, I should be well satisfied with the result of its labors. He proposed, as I propose, to leave all matters of local interest to the immediate action of the people of the several counties, thro' their county legislatures. Thus may you easily adjust your school system, your license question, by which we are annoyed even here, and thus may the people of every county settle all questions of local interest to themselves, as they may see fit, and we shall be spared the evil of having questions of police and morals made the subject of partizan squabbles. Thus, and thus only, can you relieve the General Assembly from the necessity of legislating for localities, as well as for the general interests of the State.

Bad and special legislation require different remedies, as I have already said. I have been trying for several days, to introduce certain Constitutional rules upon this subject, but sitting so far back as I do [Mr. Chapman's seat is at the farthest point from the Speaker's chair.—Reporter.] I have not been able to catch the eye of the president for that purpose.

In support of my position, and as one evidence of the utility of annual instead of biennial sessions, I would refer to two bills which were hung up by the meeting of the last General Assembly, and in which, it is supposed, the State was interested to the amount of near forty thousand dollars. I mean the McGinley bill, the claim under which, I am told, the Supreme Court, eight years ago, decided to be of no validity either in law or equity, and of the Georgia land bill, under which three hundred thousand acres of land were sold for $1,000. The present Governor saw fit to interpose against these acts, which he could hardly have done but for the action in regard to them at the last session; and they remain for the investigation and consideration of the next General Assembly. Similar instances might be easily multiplied, but I will not tire your patience.

I am aware, sir, that biennial sessions are urged upon us, by the example of several Southern States, which have adopted them. They may answer comparatively well for them, because their's is a stand-still position, compared with the free States, whose interests are constantly changing and progressing rapidly. I will submit testimony from one State in either section, to show that the system in question does not afford a remedy for the evils which you hope to derive from the adoption of the system in Indiana. I refer, for instance, to the action of the last session of the Alabama Legislature, whose sessions are biennial, and you will observe that they complain of evils precisely similar to those of which we complain. The Montgomery (Alabama) Gazette, commenting upon the action of the last session, says:

"ALABAMA LEGISLATURE.—It is the longest session of the Legislature on record—having lasted three months and one day. Upwards of four hundred acts have been passed, and out of this number there are only some dozen or two of a general nature, among the latter are the revenue law; the free banking law, an act incorporating the Southern bank at Mobile, an act allowing the bank at Mobile to issue three dollars in paper for one in specie on hand, an act appropriating sixty thousand dollars to re-build the capitol, an act re-organizing the county courts, making them simply courts of probate, and abolishing the common law jurisdiction, and merging the office of Judge and Clerk into one, an act appropriating one half of the two per cent fund to the Selma and Tennessee railroad. Among the former are plank road and rail road charters innumerable, divorces, relief &c. &c.; about twenty thousand miles of plank road have been chartered. We trust this will not be the last of them.

The immense amount of local legislation will strike every one as a crying evil, that should be remedied. A great amount of money is spent in this way, that could be saved to the treasury, and applied to the payment of our public debt. All these local matters could, by some law, be left to the courts in the different counties with much more convenience to the public, than by the direct action of the Legislature.

The entire business of the session should be accomplished in four or five weeks at the furthest; but instead of this, over a fourth of a year is spent, mainly in legislating upon private matters, in which the great public can have no interest."

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to read another extract from a letter, written by a former citizen of this State, now residing in Iowa.

MOUNT VERNON, LINN CO. IOWA.
March 14, 1850. }

MESSRS. EDITORS:

As a native of Indiana, who though exiled for a season, yet hopes to end his days within her borders, I naturally feel interested in the discussions precedent to the formation of a new State Constitution.

Among other supposed reforms, already in controversy, I notice a proposition for biennial sessions, instead of annual sessions of the Legislature. There is in Indiana a popular prejudice in favor of a change of this sort, which I shared when I came here, but which I now think is not founded in considerations of propriety. The practical results of this system in the Constitution of Iowa, have not, as far as I have heard an expression of opinion, answered the expectations of its advocates. Take a few facts: I came here early in 1846, just in time to vote for the adoption of a new Constitution. Since then we have had a session every winter until last, and we narrowly escaped having one then, it having been found necessary to have a called session at one of the two constitutional intervals which have since occurred. With their present experience on the subject, I have no doubt the people of Iowa would decide, if the matter was before them for decision, in favor of short annual sessions of the Legislature, in preference to their present Constitutional provision for biennial sessions."

I have simply to add, sir, that having determined in favor of biennial sessions, I trust we shall not go further, and in another direction reduce, in a still greater degree, the power of the people in the State Government, by reducing the number of members composing the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have a few words to say on this question, and but very few. I am in favor of reducing the number of senators and representatives, and I wish to answer one argument that has been made here, and which has been repeated again and again; but which, in my opinion, is entirely without force. Allusion has been made, both by the gentleman from Warrick, and the gentleman from Monroe, to the system of internal improvement, and it has been argued that if, at the time that system was adopted, we had had a large rather than a small representative body, we would not have been cursed with that system. So far from that being the case, I think that if we had had a true apportionment, it would have made no difference in regard to that system, whether the representative body had been large or small. The internal improvement spirit was not a spirit which prevailed throughout the State, but was confined to a few counties, and I feel convinced that if we had had a representation in the Legislature, based upon numbers at the polls, that system would never have been carried into operation. Suppose that the Legislature, previous to that system being commenced, had been increased to double the number; what would have been the effect? Would you not have had as many, in proportion, in favor of the system as you had before? Unquestionably you would; and the argument, therefore, derived from this internal improvement system, in favor of enlarging the legislative body, it appears to me amounts to absolutely nothing at all.

Then, sir, it appears to me that the great question now to be disposed of, is, whether legislation can be done as well by a small body, consisting of from 70 to 75 members, as it can be by a body consisting of 100. That is the question. If we can ascertain that legislation can be as well done by the smaller number, every gentleman will undoubtedly be ready to reduce the number, on the score of economy. My own opinion on this subject is, that, so far as the interests of the State are concerned, they will be affected but very little either way, whether the House of Representatives shall consist of 75 members or 100 members, and still less do I consider that the interests of the State will be affected by the difference between the number of 70 and that of 75. I believe that you will have as good legislation from the number of 100 representatives, as you will from 75, and as good from the latter number as from the former; and, if that proposition be true, the whole question resolves itself into one of economy. Sir, the rights, the liberties, the interests of the people of Indiana, do not depend upon the question of whether we shall have in our legislative hall, 75 or 100 representatives. They depend more upon the ballot box and upon the question of universal suffrage, and single representative districts, than upon the number of representatives. It depends upon universal suffrage; and, if all men are allowed to go to the ballot box, no matter whether the House of Representatives consists of 100 members or of 70, all men will be equally represented. We shall have nothing to fear, in that case, in regard to numbers. I do think that 75 would be a convenient number for this Hall—that they will do the business just as well as a larger number, and, I further think that this is a question which should be settled by the Convention, and settled now. It is a question, I admit, of some importance to the smaller counties, and it has been well alluded to by the gentleman from Jefferson. The difference in the size of the counties is not a great deal, and the difference between the relative numbers of their population will soon be very little. If, therefore, any inconvenience may be experienced, as the gentleman from Jefferson has said, it will only be temporary, and that the time will soon come when the southern counties will not have a greater population than the northern counties. There is more enterprise in the north than there is in the south, or than there is in the central, part of the State. Their enterprise, and their fertile soil, must soon place them, so far as numbers are concerned, upon an equality with other counties.

So far as this question is concerned, I should be governed considerably by the amount which will be saved to the State by a reduction of the number of senators and representatives.

In relation to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wells, I would simply remark, that it is impossible to foresee how large a body of Senators and Representatives we should have in a short time, owing to the probability of our having a large increase of population. If we are to make a fixed number of inhabitants or voters the basis of representation, who can see to what extent that basis may be enlarged in a very short time? I repeat, that if the Convention is to take action on this question, I should be decidedly in favor of the number of seventy-five; and if the number is to be still further diminished, I would rather diminish it in the Senate than in the House of Representatives; and I believe this course would better suit the small counties. Were I to offer any amendment, I would prefer to have seventy-five members in the House of Representatives, and twenty-five in the Senate. I, however, am not particular; but, looking to the interests of the State, I believe that all the purposes of legislation can be accomplished fully as well by seventy as by a hundred Representatives. I trust that the committee will settle this question; and I see no reason why it may not be as well settled now as at any other time. We have already spent much time in this debate, and I think, with the view of settling this question at once, we had better, if need be, occupy the day in the discussion of it than to take it up again.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. As I have not occupied much of the time of the Convention thus far, in the discussion of the questions which have been under consideration, I will now ask permission to trespass upon the attention of the committee for a few moments, while I offer a very few remarks on the subject under debate. This is a question of great importance, and one in which the whole people of the State are interested. I think, therefore, that it is one on which it is very desirable to have a full expression of opinion on the part of the members of the Convention. Different positions have been taken by delegates on this floor; and it seems to me, from the remarks that have been made by some of the gentlemen here, that they have looked, perhaps, rather to the mere object of gratifying their immediate constituents, than to the general interests of the State. I know it is too apt to be the case, that when a man presents himself before the people as a candidate for public favor, he will promise his constituents everything which may suit their wishes; and it appears to me that the idea of curtailing the expenses of the Legislature has, in some measure, had its origin in that feeling. "Economy" has, in many parts of the State, been made a great cry, in order to succeed in elections. I cannot but think, that when we come to the discussion of a great question like this, we should come to the very principle on which the general government is sustained. If we are to be governed by the principle of legislation, then we should come to that question, and to that alone. I do not suppose that there are many gentlemen here who would contend for the opinion that we should have a representation based upon extent of territory rather than upon numerical strength; but if we are to have a representative from each county, I do not know that that would be going too far. The true principle, however, on which representation should be based, is the numerical strength of the people—that every Representative should represent a certain number. If that were made the basis of apportionment, I think a Legislature so constituted would, more nearly than by any other mode, arrive at and represent the minds and wishes of the people. For what are legislators sent here? It is that they may represent the interests and wishes of the people, and not that a Representative should represent so much territory. The territory of the State will doubtless be properly attended to if the wishes of the people are represented.

Now, we have heard it remarked, that, on principles of economy, we should have large election districts. Precedents have been presented to us here; and my learned friend from Monroe has adduced the State of Massachusetts, with a Representative body of over five hundred members and a Senate not exceeding forty.

And what is the principle of which that is an illustration? It is that the interests of the people in the popular branch of the Legislature should be fully represented; and that, I think, is the principle that should govern us here. As to the Senatorial branch, I cannot see any necessity for making that very extensive; but the popular branch of the Legislature, in which the will of the people is to be expressed, it seems to me, should be so large as fairly to represent the will of the people, that that will may become the law of the land.

Now in regard to what should be the actual number of the House of Representatives, the only question is, whether a correct expression could be given to the will of the people, as well through the medium of seventy-five members as through that of a hundred. On that question, I give it as my opinion, that it could not; and, that I think the number of one hundred members is small enough—as small a number as the people of the State could well rely upon.

Reference has been made to the distress which the State has suffered in consequence of former legislation, but certainly no argument can be deducible from that to show that we ought to diminish the number of the people's representatives. It has been said that if you make the number smaller, you will have a greater concentration of talent. Let me ask who was it that propounded those very measures which have been complained of, but those who, at the time, were said to be the most talented men of the State. Was it the honest hard-working farmer who recommended these schemes of internal improvement which brought so much distress upon the country? Not at all; and if, by seeking to diminish the number of representatives, you are desirous of excluding them from the halls of legislation, for the purpose of introducing the "talent" of the State, I should be most decidedly opposed to it. These, it is true, are the men who never make speeches, but are always ready to give their votes, and that promptly, whenever an important question is to be decided; and they are, therefore, as capable of representing the will of the people as those who spend hours of the time of a legislative body in making speeches. They are in general the right men. They mingle with the people; they become acquainted with their wants; and, when a question comes to the vote, they understand the matter, and are as capable of expressing the will of the people, as those who claim to be the talented men, either in the popular or senatorial branch of the Legislature. Let us then give the people full representation here; let us give them small districts, so that when a law is to be placed upon your statute books, it may be the will of the whole people, and not of a mere section. I am in favor of the principle of representative government to its fullest extent, so that the people; and their different interests, in every locality, may be fully represented. If you make this a question, depending upon territory of some fifty miles square, and diminish the number of representatives to some seventy or seventy-five, you will find that one voice cannot fairly represent such a locality. Hence, I am of opinion that the number, in the popular branch of the Legislature, should not be below one hundred, and that the districts should be so small that everything appertaining to their best interests may be fairly represented on this floor. You will then have a representative government that will truly represent the people's will; you will have a class of men who, if they are not able to make flaming speeches, will at all times be ready to give correct votes.

Mr. COOKERLY moved so to modify the amendment as to make the numbers seventy-five in the House of Representatives, and twenty-five in the Senate.

The modification was accepted by the mover of the amendment.

Mr. KILGORE remarked, that as this was a very important question, and as it was desirable to have the sentiments of the Convention fully elicited upon the subject, he would move that the committee now rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

The committee then rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion, the Convention then adjourned until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

THURSDAY, Oct. 31, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. JAMESON.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Several petitions were presented.

Reports were made by various committees.

Resolutions were presented, and communications submitted. All of which were read and appropriately disposed of.

INQUIRY.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, he desired to inquire whether different committees could report upon the same subject matter, and, also, if it was to be understood as the sense of the Convention that each committee could report upon subjects not referred to them by the Convention? He had discovered in the report from the committee on the legislative department that that committee had reported upon matters which, by a vote of the Convention, had been referred to the executive committee. The last section of that report in particular embraced a subject that had been referred to the committee on the executive, which committee was about to make their report. He did not know that it was at all necessary to multiply section upon section upon the same subject.

The PRESIDENT stated, that the several committees might have different branches of the same subject under consideration, and that they were not necessarily restricted to report only on those subjects specially referred to them. They might decide for themselves what subjects appropriately came under their consideration.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. The last section of the report, just presented, relative to the veto power, was a subject that was specially referred to the committee on the executive.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe remarked, that the Convention had a right to refer the same subject to different committees if they chose to do so. The committees were bound to report upon them, and then the Convention could decide between the reports, and adopt that which they considered the best.

ELECTION OF STATE OFFICERS.

The order of the day being the sections of the new Constitution, reported Oct. 25, by Mr. Read of Clark, chairman of the committee "on state officers other than executive and judiciary," was then taken up for consideration by the Convention, and read a second time.

The article reads as follows:

ARTICLE.—

SECTION —. A Secretary of State shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and be commissioned by the Governor for two years, or until a new Secretary be elected and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Secretary of State more than four years in any term of six years. He shall keep a fair register, and attest all the official acts and proceedings of the Governor; and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes, and vouches relative thereto, before either House of the General Assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined him by law.

SECTION. — There shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and commissioned by the Governor, a Treasurer and Auditor, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold their office for two years and until their successors be elected and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer or Auditor more than four years in any term of six years.

Mr. SHOUP moved to amend the first section by striking out from the second line the word "two" and inserting the word "four." He said that it must be evident to the minds of all the members of the Convention that there would be very few gentlemen competent to discharge the duties of the office who would be willing to remove from a remote part of the State to occupy a situation here for only two years. Unless a longer period for remaining here, say four years, was fixed upon, the office would almost necessarily have to be filled by residents of Indianapolis.

Mr. READ of Clark stated, that the committee on state officers took this view of the question. They considered that the people were desirous of having the terms of elections short, and they believed, also, that in the new Constitution provision would be made for biennial sessions, and that the Governor's tenure of office would be fixed at two years. He would suggest further to the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) that in ninety-seven cases out of a hundred those individuals who held the office for two years would undoubtedly, if they discharged their duty faithfully during that period, be re-elected. The more frequently these elections came before the people the more faithfully would the incumbents of office administer their necessary duties.

Mr. HALL said that he hoped the motion of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) would prevail. He was in favor of the one term principle. At the proper time he would move to amend the article under consideration, so as to render the Secretary ineligible to hold the office for more than four years out of eight.

The doctrine of rotation in office had been discussed, to some extent, in that portion of the country which he had the honor, in part, to represent; and it received general favor from the people. When an officer is eligible to be re-elected, much of his time is often used to secure his re-election. This is not all: most officers have some patronage—some favors to bestow, or some lenity to grant—some more, some less—but whatever they have, it is all given to secure a re-election. This is all wrong—it is anti-republican. Let officers be elected for a short period—not long enough to cause them to forget the occupation they were pursuing when elected—and when their term of office shall have expired, they can return to their former business and pursue it. But if you keep a man in office for a great length of time, and then turn him out, he has been taught to depend on the perquisites of his office so long for a support, that he is rendered incapable of following any occupation whatever. He consequently becomes a mere drone in the body politic.

This is more especially applicable to the office of treasurer, and such offices as have the control of public funds. There is nothing more corrupting than money. The temptation to use public funds, or to allow special friends to use them, is strong—often too strong to be resisted. An oath, however strong it may be, is no guarantee that public funds will not be misapplied. The only safe remedy is, strict accountability, short term of office, and ineligibility.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Shoup,) for reasons that had not yet been submitted.

He perceived that the committee's report on this question contained a clause not in the present Constitution, viz.: that the Secretary of State shall be eligible to the office of secretary not more than four years in one term of six years. I do not know, said Mr. O., the reasons which actuated the committee in inserting this provision, but I imagine they may have been, in part, that it is a common thing, and an undesirable thing, that an executive officer should take up a large portion of his time, toward the close of his term of service, in electioneering for a renewal of office, instead of attending to the duties of his office. They may have considered, that such a clause was presenting temptation to the public officers to squander their time. It was a notorious fact that many of the public officers did thus spend the latter portion of their terms of office, in electioneering for a renewal of them. If they made the length of the Secretary's term four years, and suffered the proviso to remain in the section as it then stood, there would then be no renewal of office until after the term of six years had expired, and of course no temptation to divert time which belongs to the public, to purposes of private advancement.

But it is said that if we pursue this policy of non-re-eligibility in regard to this office, we must do so also in regard to all others. That does not follow. I have seen no such proposal in regard to members of the Legislature. No such reasons occur, in their case. As members of a deliberative body, they serve but some weeks or months out of each year. They have time of their own to canvass after each session, to render account of their stewardship, and receive fresh instructions for the future. This is right and useful. Short terms, renewed as often as the people see fit to renew them, are appropriate in this case.

But we are speaking now of executive officers, not of legislative; of men whose whole time belongs to the State under which they are commissioned. And it may well be a question whether we ought to put such officers, at the close of each second year, in the position either to loose their chance of a re-election, or to devote time and thought—perhaps to travel all over the State—in order to put themselves on the same vantage ground as others who may seek to supplant and replace them.

Mr. FOSTER said, that the Convention had decided, by an almost unanimous vote, to have biennial session of the Legislature, and it was to be presumed that the committee on the tenure of office would fix the term of Representatives to two years, and that of Senators to four years. He did not know what the Convention would fix the term of office of the Lieut. Governor at: he presumed, however, at four years. Under these circumstances, the Auditor and Treasurer being equally important officers, he thought they should be elected for the same time. He professed to be a democrat, and he desired to see a certain democratic principle established—one much talked about, though but seldom carried out—and that principle was rotation in office. It was a good democratic doctrine, but the worst of it was, it was seldom carried out. For one, he proposed that officers should be elected for a certain term of office, and after that term had expired, that they should then be ineligible for re-election; but to elect them but for two years, with a clause of re-election for another two years out of six, he was opposed to. He did not think that the term of office of the representatives and senators should be such that they should be ineligible, but he thought all administrative officers should be so. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup.)

Mr. BRACKEN observed, that he was in hopes the word "two" would not be stricken out and the word "four" inserted. It was an understood matter in the committee that the committee on executive officers were not to report terms of office of four years duration either for the governor or any of the State officers.

This was the more requisite if the principle of biennial sessions of the Legislature was to be carried out.

One of the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) why the Secretary of State should serve four years, was, that it was an office of importance, requiring much experience for the incumbent to perform his duties aright—but unfortunately before he was done he stated that there was no opportunity for mis-feasance, mal-feasance, or non-feasance in holding that office, and he (Mr. B.) thought that both statements could not be correct. If it was the fact that this officer was incapable of going wrong, where was the necessity of lengthening the term of office, and why not throw it back more frequently into the hands of the people? The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) had affirmed he was a democrat, and in favor of the democratic principle of rotation in office; then why not throw the election of these officers more frequently into the hands of the people, and then if they were worthy and capable, they could be re-elected?

Mr. FOSTER begged leave to correct the gentleman from Rush. In his remarks he had spoken of ineligibility to office and in favor of a fixed term of office, after which the candidate should be ineligible to re-election.

Mr. BRACKEN said, he understood the true democratic doctrine to be that the people were the sovereigns, and that they had a right to elect whoever they pleased, as often as they pleased, to do their business. If the officer performed his duty faithfully there was no reason why the people should be prohibited from rewarding him with a re-election; and if, on the contrary, he did not perform his duty with fidelity, there was greater reason why, at the expiration of the two years' term, he should retire from his office. For this reason they had cut down the terms of service of the various officers to two years.

The gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) had stated in support of his amendment that if the term of this office was fixed at two years, those who resided about the Seat of Government only could or would endeavor to obtain it.

This idea was somewhat new to him. He had always thought, and he saw no reason now to change that opinion, that there were at least twenty candidates for every office to be filled, from every part of the State. There were plenty of men competent to fill this office if it were only to be held for two years, to be had from every portion of the State. If any gentleman could tell him of an office of profit in Indiana that had to go begging for the want of competent applicants to fill it, he would give the question up at once.

A MEMBER. President judges.

Mr. BRACKEN. Well, that is an instance, but even the office of president judge does not go begging in our part of the State. He thought at any rate that the judiciary was very well represented in the Convention. An office of no kind would go begging in this State, for the people thought it honor as well as profit to fill them. He was in favor of the shortest term of office, so that the incumbents could go back to the people for re-election, and if they had served faithfully there would not be much difficulty in getting re-elected.

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Shoup,) the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, were taken with the following result: yeas 76, nays 56.

Those voting in the affirmative were Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Terry, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, Mr. President—76.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Allen, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Bracken, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Fisher, Frisbie, Gordon, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Holman, Johnson, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Mower, Niles, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Vanbenthusen, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum—56.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the original amendment—

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick moved to amend by striking out the word "six" on the fourth line, and inserting the word "eight."

Mr. HOVEY moved to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick, by striking out all after the word "Provided," on the third and fourth lines.

The question being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) to the amendment of the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham) it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick (Mr. Graham) to the original amendment,

Mr. SHOUP moved to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick, by striking out the word "four" on the fourth line and inserting the word "eight," and also by striking out the word "six" on the same line, and inserting the word "eight."

The question being taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham,)

It was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham,)

Mr. GRAHAM said, perhaps it is necessary for me to say a few words with reference to the amendment I have offered.

The section as amended makes the term of office of Secretary of State four years, instead of two, as reported by the committee; and for the purpose of carrying out the principle of rotation in office, I have offered my amendment. I propose, sir, that the Secretary of State shall only be eligible to the office four years, in any term of eight years. The amendment to my amendment, proposed to make him eligible eight years in any term of twelve years. In other words he may be elected for two succeeding terms of four years each. If this amendment prevails, it will be, in my opinion, equivalent, in a large majority of cases, to extending the tenure of this office to a term of eight years. I have as much confidence in the ability of the people to select their own officers, as any gentleman in this Convention, and cannot, for the life of me, come to the conclusion which some gentlemen have, that this restriction originates from a belief that the people are incompetent to select their public agents.

It is true, sir, that the people, without the restriction, would have the power to elect any individual over the incumbent; but, sir, it is a power seldom exercised in those offices, the tenure of which is limited to two succeeding terms,

Those who have held the office for one term have a decided advantage over their competitors, for if they have discharged their duty, their election is almost certain. The ground taken by the incumbent and his friends is this: he has faithfully and honestly discharged the duties of his office, and can serve but one term more, therefore he should be re-elected. He and his friends urge that the selecting of any other over him would be a reflection upon his character as an individual, and his acts as an officer. Whenever that false issue is made before the people, the incumbent, if he has half discharged the duties of his office, is sure of his re-election. This is the case, sir, with sheriffs. They can serve but four years in six. And does not the doctrine now prevail that sheriffs have a pre-emption right to the second term? Yes, more, sir, that they have the right to select their successors. And that successor frequently, when his second term is about to expire, throws the winding up of his official business into the hands of the old sheriff, so that he will be his successor. By this pre-emption right to a second term, and the election of a deputy, the office of sheriff is frequently kept in two families for a great number of years. I wish, sir, to strike at the root of that false issue that is too frequently made before the people by office-holders. They ask the people to endorse their conduct as public officers, which, they say, can only be done by being re-elected. Such an issue I want to prevent. If they have faithfully and honestly discharged the duties of their offices, they have done nothing more than they were sworn to do.

I desire to have a fixed tenure of office. Then, if after the time of ineligibility has expired, the former incumbent desires to come again before the people, he can do so. And if his former services have been as beneficial to the people as he would have them believe, he will certainly succeed. In view, then, of breaking up this pre-emption right to re-election, and for the purpose of making all elections equal, I hope my amendment will prevail.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the original amendment, offered by the gentleman from Warrick, (Mr. Graham,) and it was adopted.

Mr. MILROY moved to amend by adding after the word "electors," in the first line, the words, "of the State."

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. KENT moved to amend by striking out the word "and," in the 6th line, between the words "same" and "all," and inserting the word "with."

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not know but I shall come under the supervision of the smoothing iron committee, with reference to my words, phrases, &c., but I will propose the following amendment: Insert the word "upon," in the 8th line, between the word "enjoined" and the word "him," so that it will read, "and shall perform such other duties as shall be enjoined upon him by law."

The amendment was adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWMAN proposed to amend by striking out the fifth, sixth, and seventh lines, of the section, and the words "shall" and "other," in the eighth line, so that it will read, "He shall perform such duties as may be enjoined upon him by law."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. NAVE proposed to amend by adding, at the end of the eighth line, these words, "but shall not receive any perquisites therefor."

Mr. DOBSON. That will be embraced in another section, fixing compensation.

Mr. NAVE withdrew his amendment.

And then the first section, as amended, was adopted by unanimous consent.

The second section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

SEC. —. There shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and commissioned by the Governor, a Treasurer and Auditor, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold their office for two years and until their successors be elected and qualified: Provided, that no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer or Auditor more than four years in any term of six years.

Mr. CARR proposed to amend the section by striking out the word "two," in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof, the word "four;" so that it will read, "who shall hold their office for four years."

Mr. PETTIT. I hope this amendment will prevail, in order that there may be uniformity in the term of all the executive officers. There can be but little doubt that the Convention will fix the Gubernatorial term of service at four years: the term of the Secretary of State has already been fixed at four years; and the Treasurer and Auditor, who have control of the monetary affairs of the State, are officers, in some sense, ministerial to the Governor; that is, they belong to the executive department, as well as the Secretary of State; and for this reason, it seems to me, they should all hold their offices for precisely the same length of time. They will be elected at the same time, entertaining similar sentiments and views, and they should go out at the same time. I think it is expedient to make the term as short as possible, without reference to eligibility or ineligibility; for I am utterly opposed to the policy of conferring office until old age makes a man unfit for it. This rule of eligibility says: to the people, (in clap-trap style,) that they shall not choose whom they please to office: and they will not refuse a man his second election, because he has spent so much time electioneering, and because he has done his duty, and all that. On the other hand, if you make the officer ineligible, it will have a still worse effect. If you elect a man for two or four years, and say to him, you shall hold your office so long, but under any circumstances, however faithful and competent you may prove yourself to be, you shall not have the place again; this would have a tendency to produce a stupor, lethargy, negligence, and want of readiness to serve the people in his office, which ought not to be tolerated in any officer. Sir, it is humiliating to place a man in such a condition. Let gentlemen consider how it would operate upon their own minds, if they felt that their place in this Convention was the last favor they were to receive from their constituents. Who would not say that such a place is beneath the aspirations of an honorable and high-minded man!

Sir, I despise and spurn the principle. I maintain that you will have better officers by holding out the assurance that if their conduct shall undergo the proper scrutiny of time, their services shall be appreciated. Sir, if you prevent the eligibility of your officers, you take away their amiability, and stifle their better feelings, and you curtail the rights of the people. To such a principle I never will give my sanction. I don't know but, that with reference to judicial officers, I would say, that after a man has become exceedingly old, he should not be continued in the place of judge. I do not know but I would be willing to say, that the judges of the supreme court and of the circuit courts should not be elected after they had passed a certain age—say sixty years. Because, there is a time when men decay, as well as when they must be young. And since the time or the tenure of these offices is commonly of considerable length, I don't know but that it would be proper for the people to put such a check upon them. There is another extreme to which this rule applies. We say that a man shall not hold office until he is twenty-one, and that he shall not be a senator till he is twenty-five. I think, then, there might be just as much propriety in saying that a man shall not hold office after he arrives at a certain age, or after he shall have become a child again. Once a man, and twice a child, you know. While I would be willing to do this, I would place no restrictions upon the people. I would not damp the laudable ambition nor take away the spirit of accommodation in the officer, which he would naturally cultivate to induce the people to elect him again. The prospect of a re-election causes a man to desire to be acceptable again to those who have confided in him, and this is often the greatest incentive to the faithful discharge of the proper functions and duties of his office.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I voted against the same term when proposed for the Secretary of State. And because the Treasurer controls, annually, some eight hundred thousand dollars of the public money—which in four years amounts to nearly two millions—I am not willing that he should have so long a term as four years. Mr. President, we are only commencing to form a Constitution, under which the Legislature is to meet but once in two years; then it is plain that with the present amount of revenue, these officers will control nearly seventeen hundred thousand dollars in the term of two years; and by extending their term to four years, we shall put into their hands the control of upwards of three millions of dollars. When we make these calculations, it seems to me that the term of four years would be too long, and the temptation would be too great. I do not care what gentlemen say about being treated courteously by a public officer; I would throw around him all those guards which should most securely deliver him from temptation. It might be, perchance, that the Treasurer of State would come here poor; and it might be all right with him at home. But when he gets here, at the seat of Government, places himself in a good house, has money in his possession, and goes to the Governor's levees, he begins to think, and reflections something like these come over his mind in the midnight hour: "Why should I be without riches? I wish I had money. I was contented at home, but here I am not. I cannot give these splendid parties. I cannot ride in those splendid carriages." Let such a man go four years as Treasurer of State, and he may in this way get above what he can bear. Men are not infallible. But what would be the result of these midnight reflections? Will he steal the public money? No, sir, he is not going to steal. Gentlemen, I suppose, know what stealing is. We have all stolen a little in our lives, and have some knowledge of its practical workings. We all remember how it was in our mill-boy days; we would not get over the fence to steal an apple from the middle of the orchard which we had to pass by near the road. We would not do this at first, but only take a few near the way-side. But the second year we became confident enough to get over the fence, grab a few, and break. The third year we would go carefully over the whole orchard, perhaps. But the fourth year, if the old man came to see what we were about, we would stone him out of the orchard. Thus it was that the stealing propensity carries men on step by step. And so it might be with your Treasurer, with an official term of four years. He might not venture upon anything wrong for the first, second, or third years; but in the fourth year, having two years of revenue in his hands without the supervision of the Legislature, he might venture upon a speculation, which he would have well matured in his mind. He might take two hundred, or three hundred thousand dollars, or even fifty thousand, of the public money, and entrust it to some cousin of his, to go into a little speculation. He don't intend to steal the public money by any means; but only to let his relative make a speculation, in which he will share pretty largely in the profits, and then he will put the money back into the Treasury. This is his serious and settled purpose and intention; but by some casualty of trade which could not be foreseen, the speculation proves a failure, the money is gone, his reputation is gone, and his securities are ruined.

With regard to the gentleman's notion of one term of service, and the ineligibility clause of the section under consideration, I would say to the gentleman from Tippecanoe, we are not going to disqualify a man for office. The section does not propose to disfranchise the officer, and condemn him to perpetual obscurity and retircacy. We are only going to say to him, if he shall make a good officer during the two or four years of his term, "Though you cannot continue in that office, sir, yet we can give you some other if you desire it." We do not propose to disqualify these officers at all for holding any other office. We do not, in this way, propose to disqualify a man for the office of Governor, or United States Senator, or any other place to which he may aspire. But we want these officers to discharge the public trusts confided to them, for our benefit as much as their own; and at the end of their term we want them to retire and give place to other men, who will look over and see that all is right. It is one of the most foolish things in the world to set a public officer to work to overhaul his own proceedings.

Sir, I have had a lesson on this subject in the case of our sheriff. The law makes a sheriff re-eligible, and in every case where a man succeeds and is elected for one term, he may be sure of the other term. This hardly ever fails. I might fearlessly ask any gentleman to point out a failure in any case where the incumbent has got half wit. If he gets the first term he goes in for the second. That is the rule. I never saw it fail but once; and then the officer had not sense enough to manage his own papers.

I do not want to restrain the people in the manner that the gentleman from Tippecanoe intimates. But in framing the organic law of the State, I understand that we are to adopt and establish principles by which every man in the State must be restrained more or less. I understand that we are to proceed in the affairs of government upon something like system, otherwise why not say the people shall send up here as many senators and representatives as they please, and whoever they please, without limit or qualification? If we fix a rule for our government in one case, should not rules restrain us in every other case?

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have one or two reasons to present, going to show why I am in favor of short terms, and opposed to re-eligibility for both State and county officers. Where the State officers remain so long in office, there is danger that they will organize and keep up a kind of State regency; such was the case in the State of New York for a long period of time. The case is precisely the same with reference to county officers. There, where the term of office is extended in the same hands, there is danger that they will get up a kind of court-house influence. This is the reason why I am in favor of electing all officers for short periods of time, and preventing their re-eligibility. I have another objection to long terms, which applies especially to accounting and receiving officers. I believe such officers should not be continued long in their places, because one is intended to be a check upon the other. When the same persons are continued in these offices for a long time, they learn to place too much confidence in each other. In another State I have known some serious defalcations—one case in my mind was for about seven thousand dollars—and it is seldom the case, where two officers have been long continued in their places, that, even after their retirement, they are not constrained to put some considerable balance of money quietly into the treasury. For this reason, sir, I shall vote for the shorter term, especially for the offices of Treasurer and Auditor; and when we shall come to the consideration of the tenure of county officers, I shall vote in the same way.

Mr. TANNEHILL said, Mr. President, there is a fitness in all things. I have been listening for some time to what has been said concerning a man's holding office for a long term. Now, in order that the people may enjoy what is right and proper with reference to this thing, I would not be in favor of reducing this term of office to too short a time, nor of extending it to too long a time. But there is a medium which we ought to adopt. It is not consistent to adopt long terms of office and re-eligibility. I suppose no politician will deny that. The oftener the people exercise their sovereign power, the more safe and secure are they in their political interests, and the better contented they are. For example, if you remove the general elections two years apart—two years is a considerable length of time in which to give the people no opportunity to come together and consult with reference to their best interests, besides the disadvantage of changing from what it has been. My opinion in regard to the subject under consideration is, that short terms of office and re-eligibility are consistent with republicanism; but I shall oppose long terms with re-eligibility. I do not consider that the demands of equity and justice could be secured to the people in this way. There is something to be considered with regard to the justice of this thing. Suppose, for example, that a man has a dozen sons; he educates them without partiality, and they are all prepared and qualified to fill the offices of government with credit. This work of the father is certainly an advantage to the whole community. No man will deny this. But now, if you have long terms of office, there is no encouragement for the parent so to prepare and qualify his sons. A person in office has it in his power to secure more friends, than a man out of office. This, I admit, is a fact; but if his term is short, and he has filled up the measure of the expectations of the people, why, let him be re-eligible. But, above all, let the people, at short periods, exercise their right of sovereignty, and then all will be safe. I should be sorry to see this Convention set the precedent of long terms and re-eligibility. I am sure it would not work well. It would be much better to say the term of office shall be for two years, and the officer shall be re-eligible. Then, if the officer has done well, and the people choose to do so, let them re-elect him; or if not, let them, as they have a right to do, place another man in his room. I have said that I considered long terms of office to be inconsistent with the principles of republicanism; and why? Because the people, being sovereign, ought to exercise their sovereign power as often as it may be necessary and prudent for them so to do. Why, then, attempt to deprive the people of the exercise of this right by establishing long official terms? You might as well say to a monarch on his throne, that he should dispense with the exercise of his sovereignty for so long a time. I presume that the people of Indiana never would have called this Convention upon the presumption that terms of office would be lengthened and re-eligibility destroyed by our action here.

I have but little to say, Mr. President. I am in bad health and cannot talk much. But these are my views, and this is the course which I think would be best calculated to advance the highest interests of the State. I think, also, that a word of caution might not be amiss at this time, against the temptation for gentlemen to go on and fix up their big salaries, and their long terms, thinking they, themselves, are going to hold these places: though I am not niggardly about salaries, I am for giving good salaries to all our officers. But I must insist upon having the terms of office short, and making the officers themselves re-eligible. These are my views.

Mr. SHOUP. I fully concur with the view taken by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) that we should rather induce men to accept of office and hold on to it, then hold them back. It strikes me that a two years' term is not long enough to induce a responsible man to take upon himself the duties of either of these offices. I hold the same views with reference to this, as I held with reference to the former section, that, if the term of these officers shall be fixed for two years, the effect will be that they will fall immediately into the hands of those who are located around the capital. It must be remembered that the people of this State will expect their candidate to canvass the district. Who then, sir, from any remote part of the State would go to the expense of canvassing for one of these offices, if he were to remain in it but two years? He could not afford it without an increase of the salary. I hope, sir, that the word "two" will be stricken out, and the word "four" inserted: that it will be the pleasure of the Convention ultimately to determine that the several State officers shall be retained for the term of four years.

Mr. HELM. I have favored rotation in office in theory and in practice, and I seem to be in advance of some democrats here, upon this subject; notwithstanding I believe it to be an article in their confession of faith. I hold, also, that offices are not created for the benefit, solely, of office-holders, but they are created for the benefit of the people. Gentlemen have seemed to look at the subject to-day, as though offices were created solely for the benefit of the office-holders. I sir, am in favor of frequent changes in office. It has been hinted by gentlemen on my left, and over the way, that office-holders by their position were enabled to exercise a large amount of political influence upon the balance of the community. This influence, sir, is felt in every county in the State. A court house influence has been spoken of, and I presume there is not a member upon this floor, who has not felt the power of an influence of that kind, who has not heard the cry of the court house clerks and other officials of the county, combining to put down those who are not office-holders! An influence of this kind has been brought to bear, perhaps, in every county of the State. This evil results to every community where men are suffered to hold office for a long time.

It has been argued here, sir, that if men were allowed to hold office for a longer term, there would be no inducement for the people to qualify themselves for office. And I hold, myself, that there would be found a larger number of qualified men, if the opportunities for obtaining office were made a little more frequent. What is the inducement for a young man to prepare himself for the duties of county or circuit court clerk, when he looks around him and finds these offices frequently filled by the same person for a term of twenty or thirty years? The practice of continual re-election to office, I am opposed altogether to.

Mr. READ of Clark. The view which I take of this subject leads me to favor short terms of office and a strict accountability of officers. I confess that I had some doubts relative to the propriety of extending the term of office of Secretary of State, for reasons which have been already advanced. But as to the Auditor and the individual who holds the purse strings of the State, I have no doubt whatever. The present Constitution of the State fixes the term of these offices at three years; and now gentlemen seem to be disposed to extend it to four years. The committee was of a different opinion. We had no doubt (I repeat) upon the subject of the official term for the Treasurer and Auditor, their offices being intimately connected with each other. Gentlemen say, that by declaring these offices ineligible for a second or a third term, we almost disqualify them for holding any office whatever. But this is not the case. If a man is disqualified for one office, are there not a hundred other offices in the State to which he may look? There is not an individual in this Convention who can expect to hold a seat in another Constitutional Convention, but still they are all big with the desire of office—some for one thing and some for another. I have not a word to say, sir, against any of our present State officers. No man has a more exalted opinion than I have of the Auditor and Treasurer; but I am free to say that there are very many men who will ask for these offices for the sake of the stealings—the salary being only a secondary consideration. The stealings will be the great object with some men; then the question with me is, how shall we come at them? How shall we bring them to a final judgment? These examinations by legislative committees are all a perfect farce; I say this from experience. For these officers always have friends enough around them to help them out of any difficulty in which they may be involved. It is only when their successor comes in, that we can bring them effectually to judgment. And it was by this means; of short terms and strict accountability, that the committee thought to secure the interests of the State, which might be committed to the hands of these officers.

Mr. FOSTER. The principal thing which I have in view in extending the term of these offices, is, to make their incumbents ineligible; and it has been intimated by gentlemen that these officers can come into these places here for the purpose of making them stepping-stones into other offices. It has been intimated, also, that unless they are restricted to short terms, they will, perhaps, make too free use of the public money. I have but one remark to make with reference to this matter. There are men possessed of adroitness enough to conceal their dishonest purposes and square up things at the end of their first term, so as to secure to themselves a second term. I believe it will be conceded by all that no individual from Marion county can be re-elected to one of these offices; and the result is, that the Auditor and Treasurer have sometimes to come from some other part of the State, and whether they be farmers, lawyers, or physicians, they must leave their business, of course, and come here to reside. Now, sir, I hold that when a man is in Rome he should do as Rome does; he should conform to the usages of society in the place where he resides. Well, his salary for two years would scarcely furnish his house decently; for the man who aspires to one of these offices should at least stand on a par with his fellow-citizens in this respect. It is plain, then, that unless the term were extended, the salary would offer to a well qualified man no considerable inducement to accept of either of these offices. There was another consideration which would prevent men from seeking these offices. It is expected that they will be made elective by the people; and in this State it is customary for every candidate for office, from the Governor down, to stump it before the people; these candidates, therefore, will have to go all over the State; a thing which would be attended with no little expense, and which any prudent man would hesitate long before he would take it upon himself. Heretofore, all these candidates had to do, has been to furnish a little wine and an oyster supper or two—things much more comfortable and agreeable to most men than going all over the State as a candidate. As has been remarked by the gentleman over the way, I, also, am in favor of rotation in office. I believe it is the democratic doctrine. I know it has been customary heretofore, upon the principle of re-eligibility, for these officers to hold on from term to term; but because a man is in office it is no reason he should be continued in it. I have no idea of giving to any man such an advantage, especially if the individual belongs to the class of men referred to by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) and his trust should be one of as high a responsibility as that of the Auditor or Treasurer of State. Therefore I would be in favor of making these offices ineligible. The gentleman from Owen rather intimated that all men were guilty of stealing somewhat. His intimation brought to my mind what I once heard of an old Scotch parson. The old parson had a deacon or clerk by the name of Jemmy McFarland; and on one occasion the old man said to his people, "Ye are all my sheep now, and Jemmy McFarland is my wee dog to help keep the sheep in order." This being an important announcement in the estimation of the old parson, and desiring to enforce the idea, he raised his voice and repeated the words: "Ye are all my sheep now, and Jemmy McFarland is my wee dog to help keep the sheep in order." Upon this Jemmy roused himself, and looking up into the face of the parson, he replied: "I am nae mair a dog than you are, sir." "Hoot, awa' mon?" said the parson, "I am speaking but in the way of a parable."

MR. DOBSON. In the remark I made, I did not allude to any officer; I alluded to men in general. With reference to our present Auditor and Treasurer, I believe them to be honest and faithful. There is no temptation, indeed, for them to be otherwise. Nevertheless; I would have a provision in the Constitution requiring a settlement with these officers every year. The instance in my mind occurred in middle Tennessee, where the county treasurer held his office during good behaviour. The individual to whom I alluded had kept the office of county treasurer for twenty years. The people had no right to examine a man's papers; and he was continually speculating upon the public money. And when the proper functionaries would call upon him to examine into the condition of his office, he would be informed of the time, and go over to his brother-in-law and get fifty thousand dollars. And then, when the committee would come and find twenty thousand dollars in the office, and inquire for the balance, he would say, "Here it is, in this box;" and all would be right. After they were gone, he would send back the box to his brother-in-law. In this way this man became rich, and it was also true that the county sustained no injury. But I also have another case of a county treasurer, falling into the same temptation, and not only broke himself up, but ruined all his connections. Therefore, I say, the further we keep ourselves from temptation, the better it will be for us. And now, when the Legislature is to meet only once in two years this temptation will be doubled, and those who make office-seeking a business are, generally, the most dishonest men in the country. The finances of the State of Indiana, so far as the expenses of the civil administration are concerned, have been, perhaps, as well managed as those of any other State. As for the finances applied to public improvements, they have not been under the control of the State officers, and therefore all the blame for their mismanagement must fall elsewhere.

MR. MAGUIRE. It strikes me, sir, that amongst the greatest evils that can befall a free people, are long terms of office and ineligibility. I am in favor of short terms, with the right to a re-election for a reasonable length of time, if the people choose to continue the incumbent in office. The prospect of a re-election always operates as a stimulus to a public officer to discharge his duties with fidelity, and produces a salutary influence upon his conduct and deportment. I voted against the proposition to make the term of the Secretary of State four years instead of two. I could see no good reason why that officer should be elected for a longer term than the Auditor of State. The Auditor has no public money in his hands. He is only an accounting officer, and there can be no reason given in favor of a four year's term for the Secretary which would not apply with equal or greater force to the Auditor. My own impression is that it is proper to limit the terms of the Secretary, Auditor, and Treasurer to two years, and permit them to be re-elected at least once or twice if the people continue to confide in their honesty and capacity. It has been remarked that the condition of the accounts of the Auditor and Treasurer cannot be fully ascertained until they go out of office. Why, sir, their offices have been thoroughly examined annually by a committee of ways and means of the Legislature, appointed expressly for that purpose; and a competent committee can readily ascertain and report whether the business is correctly transacted, and whether the books and money on hand correspond with the official reports required to be made by those officers. Rotation in office is a correct doctrine—a doctrine of which I have long been an advocate—but it seems to me that its application, as a general thing, is more appropriately made by the people than by the stern provisions of a Constitution. It seems to me, sir, that any proposition which operates as a restriction upon the power of the people, should be regarded with great caution, and adopted, if at all, after very deliberate consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been argued that, on the part of an office-holder, the idea of re-eligibility inclines him to honesty and industry. This is a new doctrine to me. I never heard of it before, and it may be correct. But I know it is a saying in the country, that if you want to make a man dishonest, give him an office. My opinion with reference to the subject under consideration, has been well expressed by others. I think short official terms should be established, whether we have re-eligibility or not. I insist only upon short terms. My notion as to the term of the Secretary of State was, that he ought not to serve for so long a term as that which the Convention has agreed upon. Short terms of office offer certainly a better security against losses by defalcations. They are but little more expensive to the people, and if, as has been urged, these offices, with a short term, should be found burdensome to their incumbents, all I have to say is, that these gentlemen must know before-hand the salaries attached to these places; and there is little danger that such a state of things will ever arise, as to compel their acceptance of them.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I think that the proper term for the office of State Treasurer, for the reasons already stated, ought to be limited to two years. But I see no reason why the term of the Auditor should not be fixed for four years. For this officer, as was truly stated by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,) has no supervisions of the public money. I think it proper and requisite that all officers, whether of the State or the county, holding public money in their hands, should be called frequently to an account by terminating their official tenure. If we cannot be allowed a division of the question upon this amendment, I shall vote against striking out; for I would not extend the office of Treasurer beyond two years for the sake of extending the term of the Auditor.

Mr. HOVEY proposed to amend the amendment by providing, "that the Auditor shall hold his place for the term of four years, and the Treasurer for the term of two years."

The PRESIDENT decided that this amendment was not in order.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE proposed to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"And also striking out the word 'six' where it occurs in the sixth line, and inserting the word 'eight.'"

This proposition was rejected; and the question again recurring upon the amendment of Mr. Carr—striking out "two" and inserting "four"—

Mr. PRATHER proposed to amend the amendment by adding the words, "and that all the officers of State shall serve four years."

The PRESIDENT said the Chair could not entertain the motion. That was precisely the proposition that was pending now.

On motion by Mr. RARIDEN, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

~~~~~
FRIDAY, Nov. 1st.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. Cooper.

The journal of Thursday was read and approved.

Mr. OWEN gave notice that on to-morrow he would move to amend the rules of the Convention, so that on Saturday of each week resolutions should have precedence over the orders of the day.

TERM OF OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of article 1, providing for the election of Secretary of State, Auditor, and Treasurer.

The PRESIDENT stated that the pending question when the Convention adjourned yesterday, was on the motion of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) to amend the first section by striking out "two" and inserting "four."

Mr. PRATHER moved to amend by striking out the words, "Auditor and other," where they occur in the section.

Mr. PRATHER said his object was, if this amendment was adopted, to offer another section making the Auditor's term of office to consist of four years.

The amendment was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Is it in order to offer an amendment at this stage of the proceedings?

The PRESIDENT said that an amendment would be in order.

Mr. CHAPMAN then offered the following:

"Strike out all after the word, 'provided,' and insert the words, 'that no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer more than two years in any term of four years; nor for the office of Auditor more than four years, in any term of six years.'"

Mr. C. remarked that the effect of his amendment would be to confine the Treasurer of State to one term in office, and he believed he had effected that object by changing the phraseology of the proviso.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The yeas and nays were demanded upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jackson, (Mr. Carr,) which is as follows:

"Strike out the word, 'two,' in the first line, and insert the word, 'four.'"

Mr. OWEN. A single word, Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are taken upon this question. I have an amendment in my hand which I propose to offer at the proper time. I know that it is not now in order, but it might influence the votes of some gentlemen, if they knew that an amendment of this character was to be offered as soon as in order. It is as follows:

To strike out all after the word law, in the third line, and all in the fourth line up to the word qualified, inclusive, and insert:

"And who shall hold their office for four years, and until their successors be elected and qualified: Provided, That the person elected as Treasurer at the first election under the amended Constitution shall hold his office for two years only."

I will explain its effect. The question now pending is upon the amendment to the section, proposing to strike out the word "two," where it occurs, and insert the word "four." Should that amendment prevail, the Treasurer of State and the Auditor of State would be no check upon each other as to the correct discharge of the duties of their respective offices. They will each hold office for four years; they will hold the office simultaneously, coming in together and going out together. I hold it to be a good principle, if men are to hold offices as checks upon each other, that they should not hold those offices simultaneously. I would, if I may be allowed the use of a very familiar phrase, "break joints" in the building of this department of the State government. The first Treasurer elected under the new Constitution would, in accordance with the terms of my amendment, be elected for two years, so that his term of office would expire two years before the expiration of the Auditor's term. Subsequent Treasurers would be elected for four years, and thus the two officers would never hold office for the same four years.

I have heard of a case in Ohio, the circumstances of which the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) knows much better than I do, in which there was a collusion between the Auditor and the Treasurer, and a large amount of the public money was embezzled. In this case, these two offices were held in conjunction and simultaneously, and the officers were thus enabled to cover up and conceal their defalcations until the final exposure.

If, instead of adopting the principle of making the tenure of these State offices for four years, without an exception, we will elect the first Treasurer to be chosen under the new Constitution for two years only, we shall avoid the difficulties I have pointed out. But if you make this an office to be held two years, or four years, without a provision like those I have read, a most undesirable result will follow. The Auditor of State and the Treasurer of State will come into their respective offices together; will hold them simultaneously for the same length of time, and will go out of office on the same day.

I do not desire to discuss the question of the policy of making these officers ineligible for a second term at this time. There are arguments for and against it; but, without expressing any opinion upon that point, I remark again, that, if we declare that these officers shall not be eligible for a second term, and then say that the holding of these offices (of Auditor and Treasurer) shall be for the same period, the result will be as I have described it, and as bad as though the offices were held for four years.

But I simply rose to say, that, if the amendment now pending does not prevail, I shall then offer the amendment I have read.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I highly approve of all that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has said in regard to preventing the State Treasurer and State Auditor from holding their offices simultaneously; but I think we can gain the object he has in view by adding his amendment to the one now pending, in the shape of a proviso. I think the object can be attained in this way, and without the necessity of a motion to strike out and insert.

The yeas and nays being demanded, were taken, and resulted—yeas 42, nays 92—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Hogen, Howe, Logan, Miller of Clinton, Miller of

Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Pettit, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shoup, Steele, Terry, Watts, and Mr. President—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Mower, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tanehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimbley, Vanbenthusen, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenger—92.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson offered an amendment, which was, in substance, to strike out from the section under consideration all between the word "law" and the word "provided," and insert:

"The Auditor for four years, and the Treasurer for two years."

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. The amendment just offered by the gentleman from Jefferson meets my views precisely. I am one of those who are willing that all officers should be held to the strictest responsibility; but, at the same time, I do not desire to impose an unreasonable amount of responsibility. If the Treasurer of State, who has the keeping of vast sums of the public money, is not kept in abundant check by his bond, by his reports, and by examinations into the affairs of his office by committees, I am willing that he should be "closed up" at the end of two years. But no such reason exists in the case of the Auditor of State. All the reasons which I adduced on yesterday in favor of my proposition to make the term of the office of Secretary of State longer, apply with stronger force to the office of State Auditor. He is to Indiana what the Secretary of the Treasury is to the United States—he is a cabinet officer, and chief of the exchequer. A higher order of qualifications are demanded for this than any other of the State offices. He must understand the amount and condition of all the resources of the State; and the apportionment of taxes. He must be fully acquainted with all the fiscal interests of the State in every particular. He should be thoroughly acquainted with political economy—should be thoroughly conversant with everything connected with revenue—all the statutes of the State having regard to the various funds of the State. There are various funds; the College Fund, the Wabash and Erie Canal Fund, the Surplus Revenue Fund, the Saline Fund, and others. In view of these varied and important qualifications, no man, I care not how good his general capacities may be, can step into the office of the Auditor, and, by intuition, understand all its duties. He must, to some extent, be educated to it. It is an office requiring of its incumbent great labor; and it is of the greatest consequence to the people that its duties be well and intelligently performed. Let this Convention well consider the subject before they decide to restrict the tenure of this office to two years. If there is one subject upon which the people are peculiarly sensitive, it is upon taxation; and yet the Auditor controls this matter, and virtually orders the amount to be levied, and the manner of its collection. It is as customary as it is proper for the committee of ways and means to call upon the Auditor for his estimates and opinions, and his recommendations are generally the basis, if not the substance, of their reports.

In addition to all this, I will remark that we are going to have a curious state of affairs with regard to the election of all these officers. It is understood that all these State officers are to be elected by the people. Now, if you make these elections so frequent, you certainly multiply the chances for electing bad and incompetent officers. What will the people of Jefferson county know about the character and qualifications of a candidate living in Laporte, or some other remote county! Unless he goes to the great expense of time and money to travel over all the State, the people will not know whether to vote for him or not. The result will be this: The annual conventions of both the political parties held at the capital of the State will pick out and nominate one man for Secretary of State, another for Auditor of State, &c., &c.; and these political conventions, sitting at the seat of government, will virtually appoint these State officers. The democracy of this change from Legislative elections to elections by the people at large, will, in this way, be lost in the name of the thing.

For these reasons, I shall vote to make the term of the Auditor's office four years.

Mr. WATTS said, there was another objection to short terms, over and above those which had been already urged, which would influence his vote. These offices were to be filled by a direct vote of the people, and, if the term of service were made so short as was now proposed, it would effectually preclude every poor man, however competent, from competing with his more wealthy neighbor, in canvassing the State. It was an expensive operation to canvass the whole State, and no poor man, whatever his abilities might be, would risk, for so short a term of office, the expense that would inevitably be entailed upon him. That was one great objection with him. It would, in point of fact, result in nothing more than an election by a caucus, as had been suggested by his friend from Marion. A convention here would select the officers and offer them to the people for their votes; and the people would, in that way, be virtually disfranchised—would be prevented from exercising their democracy on this subject.

Mr. STEELE said, he could find no good reason why there should be any distinction in the time which the State officers might be called upon to serve. He knew of no good reason why the Secretary of State should serve four years, and the Auditor or Treasurer only two years. He had, on the previous day, voted for the continuance in office of the Secretary of State, for four years, and he could not for a moment think that any gentleman, whom the people might elect as Treasurer of the State of Indiana, in whose hands would be placed the whole control of the funds of the State, would prove a defaulter, or abuse the trust which the people thus reposed in him. On this point he differed with the gentleman from Owen, who, perhaps, had been unfortunate in his associations, and who seemed to have a dread of evil-minded men. But there were others who had not that dread; who had had honest associations, and who were, therefore, disposed to place more confidence in the general honesty of mankind. He could see no good reason, then, why the people should not elect a Treasurer for four years, as well as a Secretary of State, or any other officer. This officer was not only to be elected by the people, but he was to be bound in sureties for the faithful discharge of his trust; and they might depend upon it that some responsible man would always be recommended to the different counties, and that they would have ample security for all their funds. He begged to say that there was an objection to this section, which he regarded as of much greater weight than the mere tenure of office. He had voted on yesterday—and he regretted that vote very much—to render any man ineligible to serve a second term in succession, who had served four years. On reconsidering that vote, he had come to the conclusion—and it certainly was an honest conclusion with him—that, under our republican government, no individual ought to be rendered ineligible for any office for one moment. He begged to be allowed to make reference to the liberality of the law organizing this Convention, as an illustration of the position which he took. What did this law say? Why, that every individual in the State of Indiana, no matter what office he might hold, should be eligible to a seat on the floor of that Convention. And were they now, as members of the Convention—being a selection of the talent of the State—were they now going to say that, when a man had served in office for the term of two or four years, he should thereupon be made ineligible to serve again? He could not for a moment think that any such illiberal spirit would prevail in that body. With the gentleman from Tippecanoe, he was clearly of opinion that such a restriction would tend to destroy the energy, the usefulness, and, perhaps too, the honesty of the man who might be called to serve in offices of State. He regarded it as decidedly anti-republican and oppressive in its character. He had no doubt that any difference of opinion which might exist amongst the members of that Convention was perfectly honest; but he must candidly tell them that he would rather to-day, that they should lay their hands upon his suffrage and deprive him of it, than to say that, after a man had served his country faithfully and honestly, and with ability, for four years in any office, he should, therefore, be rendered ineligible to serve his country for four years more. They should remember that they were framing a new Constitution, which was to be the organic law of the State, and that if this restriction was introduced, they could not repeal it next year, but that it must inevitably remain for many years to come; and, if they were at this time of day, to say to their fellow-citizens, who, like themselves, by the great Creator of nature, had been made free, that they should not be allowed to offer themselves as candidates for any office in their own gift—if they were not only thus to abridge the rights of individuals, but also to put a restriction upon the choice of the people, he should, from that moment, whether his time in this world might be long or short, ever regret that a vote had been cast in the ballot box, for the calling together of that body. He would rather be deprived of the right of suffrage at once, than of the right of offering his services for any office—not because he wanted office, but because this provision would operate as a two-fold restriction—a restriction upon the man who had faithfully and advantageously served his State, and also a restriction upon the choice of the people who would thereby be prohibited from exercising their free choice. [Applause].

With one more remark he would close, for he thought that fifteen minute speeches were long enough at any time. They had been told on yesterday by some gentleman, he did not remember who, that they were working for the benefit of the office seekers, and not for the people. In one sense that might be true, although so far as he was concerned he was decidedly for the people. The only way in which he could conceive that they were working for the office seekers was by attempting to put in this "ineligibility" restriction. So far as that was concerned they were decidedly working for the office seekers sending officers round to be filled in rotation without regard either to the qualifications of the candidate or the choice of the people. The only object seemed to be to prevent a man who had well done his duty from ever doing it again, and to prevent the people from having him again as their servant. [Applause.] How absurd was the notion! Where was the man who had a good farm horse that would work well in his team, and plough his corn, and answer all his purposes steadily and faithfully, and without any tricks—where was the man having such a horse who would be ready to exchange him for one of which he knew nothing, which might work in his team or break his waggon, which might plough his corn or trample it down, which might carry him safely to see a friend or to find the doctor, or which might as probably break his neck? [Shouts of "good! good!" and great applause.] Where was the man that would make such an exchange? And, although he did not mean to say that men were no better than horses, he would say, and he would say it in the presence of that Convention, that with our free institutions no man could continue in office longer than for one term unless he were a meritorious officer. And were they willing to destroy the merits of the man in supporting such a provision as this, and to fasten him down so that the people could not reach him! God forbid that the Convention should attempt to muzzle the country in this manner. [Continued applause.] He supposed, nay he believed, he was in a minority upon this question. Be it so; he only regretted it the more. He would, however, say this much, that while life remained, if no other voice than his were lifted up in this matter, he would endeavor to show, and to have it engraven on the minds of the people as on a rock of adamant, that there was one man in this body who was unwilling that the people should be restricted in the choice of their servants. [Applause.]

He ought perhaps to apologise to the Convention for having trespassed upon their attention in alluding to a clause of the article other than that which was immediately under consideration, but it was part of the same article and was intimately connected with the subject now under discussion, and he hoped that the considerations he had thrown out would meet with the attention of the reflecting portion of that body.

Mr. HAMILTON, who spoke in so low a voice as scarcely to be audible to the reporter, was understood to say that he did not rise for the purpose of making a speech, having no idea that by any thing he could say on this subject he would be able to change the views of the Convention; but he wished to set himself right before his constituents on the question. He was of the opinion that it was of vastly more importance that the Auditor should be continued for a longer term in office than the Treasurer, inasmuch as the duties of the one differed widely from those of the other, and a thorough knowledge of them were much more difficult of acquisition.

Inasmuch then, as the Auditor of Public Accounts was the proper accounting officer of the State, and inasmuch, also, as it would take a length of time for him to become thoroughly acquainted with the varied duties appertaining to the financial affairs of the State, it appeared to him that the term of his office should be extended to the period of four years. He should, therefore, vote for having the Auditor's term of office fixed at four years, instead of two years, and he hoped that the propriety of that course would fix itself upon the minds of the members of the Convention.

Mr. OWEN wished to say one word by way of explanation. When the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson was first offered, he was inclined to vote for it, because it seemed to answer nearly the same purpose as that which he had a short time ago intimated he would offer to the consideration of the Convention. On a further consideration of the amendment, however, he found he could not give it his support. If this amendment were adopted the practical working of it would be that the Auditor and Treasurer would be elected, on the first election, at the same time—the Auditor for four years, and the Treasurer for two years—but the Treasurer being re-eligible for another term, and being at the Seat of Government, he would have a good opportunity of electioneering, and of having his name brought up as a candidate; and probably in nine cases out of ten he would be elected two additional years, and in that way would serve the same four years as the Auditor. There would not, therefore, be that check to prevent collusion which he proposed to effect by the amendment which he intended to offer. He preferred his own amendment, therefore, because while it would fix both offices at a term of four years, the same persons would not fill these offices simultaneously, and we should, by that means, have the full benefit of the check which the office of Auditor was designed to give.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. In reply to a suggestion from the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) that my amendment might be acceptable to him if it contained certain restrictions upon the eligibility of the Auditor and Treasurer, I beg leave to say that I drew the amendment as it is, so that we might have a direct vote upon the question of the length of the terms of service of these officers, unconnected with the question of their re-eligibility. When we have settled the former question we can proceed to the consideration of the latter, and our votes upon the question of re-eligibility will, no doubt, depend in some degree upon the disposition that is made of this amendment. The discussions on this section indicate that those who are in favor of a two years' term are particularly anxious that the Treasurer of State should hold his office for a short term. As there are reasons why the Treasurer should hold his office for only a short period, that do not exist as to the Auditor, I thought I might, perhaps, meet the views of both parties by the terms proposed in my amendment. The reasons urged by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) and the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Hamilton,) in favor of extending the Auditor's term of office to four years, appear to me to be such as ought to impress the mind of every member of the Convention. The duties of the Auditor are, in my opinion, more important than those of any other executive officer connected with the State Government. He has the guardianship of all the financial affairs of the State, and there is, perhaps, no State in the Union whose financial affairs are in so complicated a condition as ours. In addition to our ordinary revenue and disbursements, we have a number of trust funds, all of which require much attention, and certainly experience would be of great advantage in the administration of these important interests. We have large amounts loaned upon mortgages which are successively expiring and have to be renewed, or new loans made, and new mortgages taken. Upon the Auditor's judgment and fidelity will depend, to a considerable extent, the security of these funds, and his deficiency in either may involve the State in heavy losses. If his term is but two years, by the time he has become thoroughly conversant with all the financial affairs of the State his term of service expires, and the benefit of his experience is lost. But it is said he may be re-elected. True, he may, but that by no means follows as a matter of course, and if it does, I can then see no particular necessity for going through the form of an election. But, sir, my observation does not satisfy me that the faithful performance of official duty always secures a continuance in office. Very often party, in its blindness, disregards all the claims of merit and qualifications, and recklessly puts at hazard the highest interests of the State. As I said before, the same reasons do not exist in favor of giving to the Treasurer an official term of four years. He is charged with the safe-keeping of the public money. It is therefore of the first importance that he should be honest. But as he is not authorized to pay out any money except upon the warrant of the Auditor, he has but very little discretion to exercise. He is a mere disbursing agent. It does not require the same amount of information and familiarity with the finances of the State to enable a man properly to discharge the duties of a Treasurer as of an Auditor. If he is honest and a good accountant he may make a good Treasurer, but he may be both and yet make a very poor Auditor. If this section is adopted without amendment, I suppose we can find competent men—residents of this place—willing to fill them. But, I would ask, what competent man from abroad would be willing to break up all his business connections and remove to this city for the honors and emoluments of either of these offices, for the term of two years, and the chance of a re-election to a second term? Will not the effect of shortening the term of service be either to fill all these offices with residents of this place, or with incompetent men from other parts of the State? We ought to endeavor to place all the citizens of the State on an equality in these matters, and also do all in our power to elevate the standard of official character so as to call to the aid of our embarrassed finances not only integrity, but the best abilities of the State.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton. I am disposed to vote against this amendment. Some days since a resolution of positive instruction, was introduced into this House, making it the duty of the appropriate committee to report a clause for the new Constitution, in favor of biennial sessions of the Legislature. It is also in contemplation to put a stop to local legislation as far as possible; to all this I say consent. It is also in contemplation to make further reform in the legislative department, by limiting the House of Representatives to seventy or eighty, and the Senate to some thirty or thirty-four.

In view of all this, sir, although I am not so certain how far I shall favor this last proposition, in my opinion, we shall have a pretty thorough reform in the legislative department. But how does it happen, I say, in view of all this, it is proposed to extend the present term of office; thus putting a greater distance between the people and their servants, while we will, by biennial sessions, lessen the power of the people to correct the abuses of State officers; you propose to place these officers at a still greater distance from the people than under the present system. This I believe to be bad policy. To abridge the powers of the people still more, a proposition is under consideration, and the report of the committee now under consideration, provides that no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer or Auditor more than four years in any term of six years. It is proposed to carry this principle to every office in the State. Well, sir, it appears to me a monstrous doctrine to incorporate in the Constitution, that the people shall not have the right to vote and confer office on any elector they may choose to elect. Now my doctrine is this: short terms of office, so that the office holder will be compelled to make short settlements with the people, and when he will not be far off, if the people wish to remove him. Nothing will tend, in my opinion, better to ensure the faithful performance of the duties of office, and especially would it be so, when the convening of the Legislature is less frequent; and now if we should adopt this doctrine of short tenure of office, and I hope we will, then certainly the incumbent should be re-eligible as often as the people should elect to put him in nomination. Therefore I hope those members favoring these principles will assist in voting down every amendment, until we can have a vote direct on the motion to strike out "two" and insert "four;" after that we can dispose of the proviso. Perhaps it may be expedient to elect Auditors for four years, and to provide that no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer of State more than four years in any term of six years. I know it is argued that the Auditor's office is a very important one, and the Treasurer's a very tempting one; all true, sir, but the same can be said of many of the other offices. Therefore I think it is best to observe the same rule throughout.

Mr. FARROW observed, that he did not wish to do anything by his vote or action, in that Convention, that might be detrimental to the general interest of the State; but they must be satisfied that there were considerations in regard to this question which were far above the mere consideration of the length of time that an office should be held. They had already been informed that the duties to be performed by the officer holding the office now under consideration, were high and responsible; and if the period for which the office was to be held, was to be so shortened, as to prevent him from having an opportunity to make himself fully acquainted with its duties, they would be creating an office that would be comparatively useless. He was not particular about the re-eligibility of officers of any grade whatever, but it seemed to him, that the offices which they were now about to create under the new Constitution, should be equal in point of length of time for which they were to be held. The Secretary of State, the State Treasurer, and the Auditor, should be considered in no other light, by the Convention, than as a cabinet for the executive; and he was perfectly willing that the executive should have the benefit and use of his cabinet for the entire period for which he might be elected. He could not, like some other gentlemen, see any great danger to the interests of the State, by continuing men of this grade in office for four years. His own impression was, that if there were honest men in the State who could be secured to fill these offices, all the business confided to their care would be equally as secure during the term of four years as that of two years, because if a man went into office with a disposition to be dishonest, he could as easily accomplish his dishonest design, during a short term as he could during a long one. He thought upon the whole, it would be well to consider this matter very carefully, so as to ascertain whether the duties of the office of Auditor could be fairly understood and discharged, to the satisfaction of the people, by any man, in the short space of two years.

Mr. BASCOM did not wish to detain the Convention with any lengthened remarks, but he desired to set himself right upon this question. He was most decidedly in favor of short tenures of office, and he could not conceive where was the great necessity that the persons elected to fill the office of Auditor, should occupy it for four years. He believed in a speedy and strict accountability to the people. When he came to that Convention with a view of reforming the Constitution, his wish was to give all power to the people as directly as was possible, and to let them decide as frequently as was requisite, on all matters in which their interests were affected.

From the arguments of some gentlemen, it would appear that the Auditor could not possibly learn to discharge the duties of his office in the short period of two years, and therefore it is concluded that he must be a man of high standing, that you must give him a full salary, and throw a robe of dignity over him, and make him a great man, and that, therefore, there would be no use in a poor man canvassing the State for such an office. Oh no! a poor man would not do, but you must have a man who can talk, and who is a good looking man, and who perhaps is as well qualified to fulfil the duties of the office as a hog. [Laughter.] He may be a very good looking man, and may make flowery speeches, but that will certainly not qualify him to discharge the important duties of an office of this character. The people want business men, not talkers—men who understand the business of the State, and if they found that they had elected a man who could not transact it in a manner both creditable to the State and to himself, then, they wanted an opportunity to send him forth at the earliest opportunity.

Again, if a man discharges the duties of the office to which he is elected, with satisfaction to the people, then I think the people ought not to be deprived of the privilege of re-electing him, and not as the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson would have it; that the people should be deprived of his services. If they turned out a good and valuable public servant, it was their own lookout, their own loss. But he was far from being of opinion that the capability of rendering valuable services, was confined to a few individuals. There were thousands and thousands of people capable of discharging the duties of Auditor of the State. It had been urged that lawyers and other men of business, capable of undertaking this office, would not neglect their regular business to take this office for a short term. He thought there must be a great change in the people of Indiana, if it ever so happened that scores of candidates could not be found for any office, even if the term of it were only for one year. The ambition for performing public service was remarkably manifest, and showed itself even in the desire to fill offices which render no profit. There was hardly a vacancy in the office of coroner of a county, but a score of candidates could be found to fill it. He knew that it went very much against the grain of office-holders to see the term of office reduced. He knew from experience that these were the men who were desirous of having long terms of office, but the people in his part of the State were decidedly opposed to it. They wanted a change, and he thought there were facts and arguments both, to show that a change was much required, especially in the period of the Auditor's and Treasurer's office. They might elect an Auditor or a Treasurer for three or four years, and when the time came round for a settlement of accounts, they could make perhaps a very fair and flattering statement for the time being, by which they could hocus pocus the people, but when the time ultimately came to weigh them in the balance, they would be found wanting. Then the corruption and the fraud would be made to appear. On the other hand, with short terms, and strict accountability, the state of affairs could be more frequently, and more stringently, examined, and then the people could choose the men they wanted. He was fully impressed that the people desired short terms of office. They desired this not only in regard to State offices, but it was a feeling extending itself in regard to all offices—even the lowest of a county or a township; and in these high offices there were more opportunities for fraud than in any others; and even this office required to be as strictly watched as any other office in the State. He hoped, therefore, that this amendment would not prevail. He would move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. STEELE observed, that he did not care a great deal how short gentlemen made the tenure of the office. They might make it for two or for four years, although, for his own part, he would prefer to have it fixed at four. He did not wish to charge any impurity of motive to any member or members of the Convention, but he could not but think that it was possible that gentlemen might be influenced more than they were aware of by political considerations. He, however, would go with gentlemen to make the term two years, provided that there should be no restriction as to eligibility for two subsequent terms.

Speaking of moral honesty and corruption, he would simply observe that he (Mr. Steele) had been elected three times to an office, the term of which continued seven years [applause]; and he had never suffered himself to be seduced nor did he ever intend to be. He declared solemnly, on that floor, that were they to give him all the funds of the State of Indiana at his disposal, he could report them to their biennial Legislature as he received them, and perform his duties faithfully and impartially. If, then, he could perform these duties faithfully and impartially—not that he sought at all to perform them—and after having thus performed them, secure the good feelings and the approbation of his fellow citizens—after thus paying everything in full, and settling with the Indiana Legislature to their entire satisfaction, in the name of God why could he not come before the people next year for their suffrages? [Applause.]

Mr. LOCKHART moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "law," in the third line, and insert the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. THORNTON said, that as the discussion on this subject had been continued so long, and perhaps the Convention having its mind sufficiently made up, he would move to re-commit the article to the committee from which it was reported, with instructions that they should re-consider the subject, and report an article to this effect:

"That the Treasurer of State shall serve for one year, and the Secretary for two years, and the Auditor for four years; and to be re-eligible for a second term and no longer."

He took that ground upon this principle, that men that held public money should be called frequently to account. He did not believe that the Treasurer ought to continue in office for a longer period than one year. He believed, however, with some of his friends who had expressed an opinion upon the subject, that the Auditor of the State ought to continue in his office for a longer term than the others, on account of the arduous nature of his duties and the difficulty of becoming sufficiently acquainted with them. He was perfectly satisfied that the Treasurer should hold his office for a short term. Something had been said about the difficulty of calling officers to an account if the term were fixed for a year only, on account of there being a probability that the Convention would so order it that the Legislature should hold only biennial sessions. In that case it would perhaps be necessary to have some tribunal by which we could call officers to account, so as to avoid the difficulty.

He had voted, on the previous day, when the question was under consideration in regard to the term of office of the Secretary of State, for striking out the word "four" and inserting "two," and it may be said by some gentlemen that those who voted for "two" in the present case, are anxious to avoid the consequence of their having voted for "four" on yesterday. From what indications I now see, I think there are many gentlemen who voted for "four" on yesterday, who will vote for "two" in regard to this question.

Mr. HARDIN moved to lay both the amendments on the table.

• Mr. THORNTON suggested that his motion—the motion to re-commit—was a privileged motion, and had precedence of all others.

The CHAIR decided otherwise.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the amendments on the table, and

It was decided in the negative.

Mr. READ of Monroe said, that he had been examining the amended Constitutions of the different States, and in almost all of them he found that it was provided that the Treasurer should be elected for only a single year, and the Comptroller of public accounts for but one or two years. It was so in the amended Constitution of Connecticut; and in the State of New York, the financial department of which was much larger than it was likely that of the State of Indiana would ever be, they had adopted this provision :

"That the Secretary of State, the Comptroller, the Treasurer, and the Attorney General shall be chosen at the general election, and shall hold their offices for two years." In the State of Illinois they have adopted the same principle—that of short terms—and also in the States of Wisconsin and Iowa. In the Southern States they have adopted the principle of longer terms. He believed, in reference to the office of Auditor, that it often happened that a man was as competent to perform its duties on his first entrance upon it as he was at any future time; and if he was not, and was a moderately intelligent man, this would stimulate him to more zeal in acquiring a knowledge of his duties. If he was a man of intellect he would look around and see what were the financial systems of other States, and adopt what he found good and reject that which was not good. He might perhaps be allowed to cite an example. There was a gentleman who was now a citizen of this State, who, in the early part of his life, had held the office of State Auditor in Ohio during the most difficult periods of the financial concerns of that State; and it was universally acknowledged that his first report was worth all the reports of all the Auditors of the State for twenty years preceding him.

A MEMBER. That's a fact.

Mr. READ. These great States then had not experienced any difficulty from the frequency of electing officers of this description. The only real cause of complaint had been of deficiencies at the seat of government, and the only way to remedy this was to create short terms of office. He had nothing further to say than that he hoped the Convention would adopt the report of the committee as it came from their hands.

The question was now taken on the motion to recommit the report, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson,

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the resolution so as to provide that the Treasurer should not be re-eligible, but that the Auditor should be re-eligible.

A MEMBER, whose name we could not ascertain, moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOVEY moved to amend by striking out all after the word "provided."

Mr. KENT moved to lay that amendment on the table.

Which was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BORDEN had only one remark to make in relation to his amendment, and it was that a distinction would be made between the Auditor and the Treasurer—the latter going out at the end of two years—a settlement would be inevitable at that time. He would make that alteration on the ground, that in proportion to the duties to be performed, the office of Treasurer was more lucrative than that of any other, and there were always men who would be ready to take it, even with that limitation. It would then stand thus : the Secretary of State would be elected for four years, and would not be re-eligible; the Auditor would serve for two years, and would be re-eligible for two years more, and the Treasurer would serve for two years and would not be re-eligible.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered on this amendment, they were taken with the following result:

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Foley, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hendricks, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, March, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Owen, Ristine, Sherrod, Smiley, Spann, Tague, Watts, Wiley, Work, and Wonderlich—51.

NOES.—Messrs. Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Haddon, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Vanbenthussen, Walpole, Wheeler, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—79.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN. To test the sense of the Convention, I move to strike out from the section under consideration, all after the word "provided."

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman from Wayne send up his amendment in writing?

Mr. RARIDEN. I have no amendment to offer, I merely move to strike out. I am aware, sir, that there are objections both ways in regard to this matter, and that good reasons can be assigned for restricting the term of office to two years, and, on the other hand, for extending it to four years. I have endeavored to look carefully over the subject, and to form the best judgment I could. I desire to see frequent elections—I want to see the people frequently called upon to review the actions of their servants, and yet I feel desirous that they should be untrammelled by party bonds, and I also have fears that if the elections are too frequent, party Conventions at the capital will appoint our State officers. But, sir, I am not prepared to assume the ground that the mere possession of office necessarily corrupts a man; nor do I believe that offices should be made the reward of political or party services. Now the disposition to impose the restrictions attempted to be placed in this section grows out of one of these two considerations; either the fear that office will corrupt the officer, or else, as old General Smyth used to say, in olden times, or else because it will double the chances of obtaining office.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). That is the case.

Mr. RARIDEN. My friend from Tippecanoe says that is the case, and I doubt not that he speaks ex cathedra. Now, sir, I am not willing to cultivate a thirst for office. In my humble opinion, the worst symptom you can see among the young men of a county, is an avidity to get office, a desire to live at the public expense. It is an unmanly trait. The result of leaning too much on the strong arm of the State, is to unfit a man for the stern duties of life, to unnerve him for the slow, and quiet, and toilsome steps by which men reach wealth and social distinction. Above all things, I dislike to see this disposition in community to abandon the ordinary pursuits of life, for the chase, the ignoble chase after office and salaries; to see men leaving their farms, their workshops, and their professions, to seek for places in an overcrowded public service. I should be induced to oppose frequent elections upon that ground, alone.

There is one thing mentioned by the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) in which I heartily concur with him. If the elections are held as frequently as proposed, the State officers will mostly be appointed by the annual conventions of that party which happens to be in power, and the people will not be generally acquainted with their candidates. But if the term of office is for four years. It will induce the candidate to travel into every county in the State, and make himself well acquainted with the masses of the people. But it is not a general rule that the best man for an electioneering campaign makes the best officer. It is not true that the greatest stump speaker, and the most popular canvasser would make the most competent Auditor of State. I am willing enough to see candidates for Congress, and for State offices go around among the people and discuss the questions of the day. It increases their urbanity and improves their manners, sir. [A laugh.] But above all it impresses them with the presence and power of the people. But if you fix the term of these offices for two years, the candidates will not make the tour of the State, they will not go before the people, but party will settle down into a complicated, but regular machinery, which will control the selection and election of State officers. Party, for the sake of strengthening itself, and gratify its leading men, will make rotation in office one of its principles.

Mr. President, there is another benefit to result from the frequency of these elections, although I don't know but that it is malicious in me to contemplate it with so much pleasure; the frequency of elections will produce jealousies and discord among those politicians who consider that their services to their party have entitled them to office. Say what you will, and as much as you will, about patriotism and all that, when a man considers that his services have entitled him to office, he will not, when another is appointed in his place, rejoice that the State has found better men to fill the office, but he will be very apt to lead off his friends and make a little party of his own. The result will be the frequent re-construction and consequent purification of party. When a man or set of men come to the conclusion that they are not well treated, and considered by the dominant clique of their party, that their services are not so well rewarded as they should be, they will join together in a war upon that dominant clique which has controlled their Conventions, and if the "bolters" be strong enough, and wise enough, they will soon become the controlling power in the party, and from the necessity of carrying out the reforms they promised in the event of their obtaining power, parties will be purified at the same time they are re-organized. Party abuses always result thus, or in what gamblers would call "a cut and shuffle." But for my own part, when a man gets into office, and fulfils its duties well and honestly, (and sir, the punctual fulfilment of his duties is the only way he can sustain himself,) I am not in favor of ostracizing him because he has once been in office, or because he is too popular. These are the thoughts sir, which have suggested themselves to me in this connection. I am not disposed to disfranchise a man because he has been in office two, four, or six years.

A word upon another thing which occurs to my mind. However much we may talk about democracy and whiggery, the truth is, that in every dominant party there are a few men in whom whigs and democrats respectively have confidence, men upon whom the party rely; and, sir, these men are, for the time being, as absolute in their power as the Autocrat of Russia. They are the distributors of office, the almoners of power, and the oracles of creed and principle. I have been long enough in public life to know that. When Martin Van Buren was President, I know that he was as absolute in his power as the monarch on his throne. When he declared that a principle or a policy was democratic, it was so; his party had such implicit confidence in him, and his influence was so potent, that no one dared express dissent from what he had said. So with General Jackson. And, sir, I am frank to say, that if Henry Clay had been elected President it would have been the same in the Whig party. There never was a man in any party in whom so much confidence was reposed, or in whose hands power would have been more absolute. And so it will be, though in a lesser degree, in the State. Through the power and discipline of party, it will go out from this City who is to be your next Auditor, what man the dominant party are to support for Secretary, and who for Treasurer; and show me the man, whig or democrat, who will stand up and refuse to vote for the nominee of his party. The people throughout the State are not prepared to judge of the qualifications of the candidates, but they say they have confidence in the head men of their respective parties, at Indianapolis, and they are confident they would not present an unworthy candidate for their support. Make your elections so that the State officers are to be elected every two years, and you will see that some men, not generally among the people and in remote parts of the State, but politicians near the Seat of Government, will break out of the party traces, and if they do not succeed in constituting themselves the centre and governing influence in their party, they will be sure to effect a reform among the "Regency," to use a New York phrase which all my Democratic friends understand.

I do not believe that it is best to make your officers ineligible for a re-election. I do not believe in all that is said about the corruption of every man who has held office. I do not believe in the corrupting influence of money upon the public mind. I do not regard nor respect the charge that it is easy to corrupt the people with dinners and festivals. It is a libel upon the virtue of the people. I have not yet lost confidence in my fellow men so as to believe them so easily corrupted. It is not so easy a thing for a man holding office to secure his re-election as has been represented. The effect of rendering your officers ineligible for a second term, will be to encourage the pursuit of office; and the pursuit of office for the sake of the salary or the honor, is, in my opinion, most disreputable. I consider the farmer behind his plough in a nobler position than your State Treasurer behind his desk.

Mr. WOLFE. It appears to me that we have been tied up here long enough, and I shall not detain the Convention with any remarks at length.

I observed that we had been "tied up" here about long enough. It is not a common thing with nautical men, in a seafaring life, to "tie up" in fair weather. The present time, in my opinion, is too propitious for action upon the subjects before us to be wasted in fruitless debates. I think we had better take this report just as it came from the committee who prepared it; that will probably be found the best as well as the most expeditious mode of settling the matter and getting ready to proceed to the mass of other business as yet untouched by the Convention. All the amendments which the ingenuity of this numerous and able body could suggest have been proposed to this section, and yet it is no nearer meeting the views of gentlemen, nor is it any nearer its final adoption, than when it was brought in from the committee. I hope that the vote taken yesterday, by which the term of office of the Secretary of State was changed from two to four years, will be reconsidered. I hope that the Convention will reconsider the matter, and make the tenure of that office for two years also. We shall then progress in our business as we should do. There appears to be a prevalent disposition to gain honor by proposing and debating new propositions; it is my opinion that many desire to get a reputation in that way, but I tell them they will get more honor by expediting business and getting speedily through with the work we were sent here to perform, than by making all the speeches that can be sent out.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to adjourn, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. ZENOR, who said he had a proposition which he should like to submit before the Convention adjourned. He moved to re-commit the section under consideration, with instructions.

The Convention refused to re-commit.

Mr. BARBOUR. I had prepared a motion to re-commit this section, myself, for the purpose of allowing the committee to report as to the tenure of these offices in separate sections. In this way I believe the Convention could quickly dispose of the report. Take the majority of the motions and propositions to amend this section, and there is in each one some one thing of which members would approve, although they may not be disposed to adopt the proposition as a whole. Some are in favor of making the term of the office of State Treasurer four years while others would have it but two years, and some who are in favor of a short term for Treasurer are for a longer term for the other officers. Now, I think that if these propositions were in different sections a majority would be found prepared to adopt each.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I hope the question will not be pressed at this time. We are now settling one of the most important principles in the new Constitution. I would remark to the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) that there is more of "politics" in this section than in any other that may be incorporated in the new Constitution, and it is mixed up with a fundamental principle; it is a question which should be decided only after mature reflection and a careful consideration of all the points involved. The settlement of this question involves the political weal or woe of the people of Indiana for, perhaps, a half century to come. In order that time may be had for a fuller consideration of the subject, I again move that the Convention adjourn; which motion was agreed to, and

The Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

(The following speech of Col. TAYLOR of Laporte, delivered on Thursday the 24th ult., was unavoidably omitted in the proper place.—

Mr. TAYLOR said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: Having been invited by some gentlemen to stand a little further back, I acquiesce; for it is not for ourselves, but for our auditors that we speak. I hope the Convention will hear what I have to say; I claim this attention not for myself, but for the subject to which I propose to allude. We are assembled here for the purpose of discussing all subjects in connection with the new Constitution, and I am grateful to my honorable friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) for presenting this proposition for our consideration, for it has spread a new light upon the political horizon of our State. It contains a principle which, if it shall meet with approbation in this Convention, will add much to secure rights to our constituents which they justly claim at our hands. I look upon this new project as containing a principle far in advance of the old system of Grand Juries, which gentlemen have been at so much pains to eulogize.

Mr. President, this is emphatically an age of reform, and in saying this I pay a great compliment to the people of this generation; and, sir, this is a new question, directly affecting the interests of individuals and of the State, and intimately connected with the advancing spirit of this age. In connection with this subject, we have had the history of England, of France, of Scotland, and of almost all the nations of the earth, arrayed before the Convention; and I am obliged to gentlemen for having presented to us such a fine display of their historical information. They have, at every step, evolved new light upon the subject; and I am desirous to obtain all the light I can. I know that our constituents at home will bear with us if we take time for these investigations; and although we may be tedious in debate, I hope that we shall be led to wise and just conclusions.

Sir, this institution has reigned over us, in the State of Indiana, for more than thirty years—ever since its first organization as a State. It is one we borrowed from the old world. Yet this is no argument or reason why the enlightened people of our State may not alter or amend it. Should we not use the lights derived from the experience of past ages, which we possess, for the purpose of advancing in the present? I should hope so; and especially that the light we have should be now applied to this institution; for I regard it as very nearly the only one which has escaped the acute investigations of our times; although it is manifest that it has been made the instrument of more oppression than any other institution in our Government. It has been asserted by some gentleman in this debate, that it would be better to endure a bad system, if it were not absolutely intolerable, than to resort to change. This may be so; but it is my judgment that we have lived under this oppressive system of Grand Juries too many years already; and, therefore, I am anxious that the Convention shall go into a fair and full investigation of the subject, and try it by its merits, and I trust that the friends of the new system will be able to convince their opponents that they are supporting an inferior system, altogether incompatible with our free institutions. The friends of the resolution do not wish to carry it merely because it is new, but because the measure itself is meritorious. The present system of Grand Juries has been long tried, and, as I think, its usefulness has fallen far short of what was anticipated by its friends; and there are more people now suffering from the oppression of this institution than from that of any other one institution under which we live. In proof of this, I would remark here, that the odium which attaches itself to a man's character when indicted for crime, can never be removed. It is as clear as the noon-day sun that no man can eradicate it from his escutcheon, but it will follow him to his grave.

From the amount of light before us, and that which is being developed by the arguments of gentlemen upon this subject, the Convention cannot be at a loss for a sufficient justification for making any alteration or amendment, or even abolishing the system.

I, for one, am prepared to abolish the system; because, by the secret character of Grand Jury proceedings, they operate injuriously upon the character of our people. They act in secret, like the midnight assassin, upon the character of their fellow citizens. They meet to hear an ex parte trial, where the citizen has no chance to defend himself; he cannot be heard; he is not called upon for the purpose; and it is his worst enemy who generally goes and reports against him, charging him with a high offense against the laws. This is one feature of the system which, above all others, should be stricken off. And it seems strange to me, that a people like ours, with all the experience of history upon this subject before them, and now before this Convention, should suffer this institution to continue to settle its blight and mildew upon us, staining with an indelible blot the fair fame of our people. If we, ourselves, may have been so fortunate as to have escaped its power, that is no reason why we should not lay hands upon it and uproot it from our midst. It has affected our most faithful friends. The honest and the upright of our fellow citizens have often fallen victims to its power; for this reason it ought to be removed and cast out as a public evil. Where is the comparison between a public and honorable mode of criminal examinations and a secret, clandestine, and bacchanalian mode?

Sir, the people are moving in this matter, and I am gratified that they are. I was glad, this morning, to see a petition presented praying for the removal of this institution from our criminal code. I have no reverence for this institution on account of its antiquity. No oppressive system can obtain any reverence from me on account of its "being hoary with antiquity." No, sir, I would hurl it from the statute book as far as I might have the power to do it.

What, sir, do the friends of the new measure propose to this Convention, as a substitute for the old one? I confess that this is a question which has not been well matured, even by its advocates. Heretofore, we have been looking more to the monster, than to the substitute. But, in due time, if we can carry this measure, I feel authorized to say to the Convention, that we will present a new and better mode of criminal examinations; both for the protection of character on the one hand, and for the punishment of crime on the other. It would be a bad compliment to the good sense of the citizens of Indiana, to confess that, if we were without this Grand Jury system, we have not the capacity to originate a system, the operation of which would be more conducive to the ends of justice and mercy, than the operation of the present Grand Jury system. Sir, I hold that we can do it. I claim, not for myself, but for the people of Indiana, and for this Convention, talents equal to any emergency which may arise, requiring the protection of our citizens in all their interests and relations; and I am confident that we can substitute, in the place of Grand Juries, a system which will, in its practical workings, meet with approbation and success. Sir, I wish to abandon the secret feature of the Grand Jury system, and place it in the power of the citizen, when he is accused of crime, to come into court, openly, and have a high-minded and honorable trial, face to face with his accuser; so that, if he be guilty, he may be condemned; and, if he be innocent, there shall rest no blighting stigma upon his character. Under the old system, this mildew of suspicion remains upon the character of every man who has had the misfortune to be indicted, no matter how innocent he may be. Who ever heard of a single case of a man being presented to a Grand Jury, and a bill found against him, that did not carry conviction to the mind, that there must have been some reason for his indictment? I never had a man pointed out to me, as having been indicted by the Grand Jury for a high crime, that I did not at once imagine that I saw something in his countenance which seemed to indicate him as a criminal—a man whom I would always feel disposed to shun; and I believe this feeling to be common to every man. It is not so great a public injury, that the felon should escape, as that an honest man should be destroyed in his reputation by the operation of a civil institution. Sir, with a high-minded individual, the idea that he is suspected of a high crime against the laws, is worse than death. All honorable men estimate their character to be of more value than their life; for character lives from age to age, which is not the case with our perishing existence. When we shall be buried in the grave, that will have no more terrors for us; but we do wish to leave to our families and descendants, the inheritance of a good name. But this can never be done where a man becomes the subject of that indelible impression of criminality, which, under the law, the Grand Jury may now cast upon him. Such an unfortunate individual can never even sleep in peace, so far as his character is concerned. The fact will witness against him, and last as long as time and history endure, that a bill of indictment for a high crime, had been once found against him. Let me suppose the case of a member of this Convention becoming the subject of such a stigma, and removing to another state, where he might again become a candidate for the legislature, and where, it might be, he would meet with one of his former acquaintances upon the political arena, who would tell the people that, "in the state where this man formerly belonged, the Grand Jury of his county once found a bill of indictment against him for false swearing." After such an announcement, although he might be as pure and innocent as any one of us, would it be possible for him to be regarded as fit to represent an honorable and high-minded people? They certainly would reject his pretensions, if for no other cause than this.

We propose a system, then, under which both parties shall come up openly before the tribunal, to be composed of three, four, or five justices of the peace, taken from different townships in the county, as suggested by my honorable friend from Laporte (Mr. Niles). Under this system, if a man is suspected of any high crime against the statutes of the State, he will be arraigned before such tribunal, where he will have the right to question and cross-examine witnesses, and, if he should be acquitted, the whole proceedings being open to the public, it would not affect him in his reputation, any more than if he were sued for a sum of money which he did not owe. No honorable, high-minded citizen could be injured under such a system. There would be no bill found, unless upon clear evidence of guilt. But, on the contrary, how is it under the old system? Why, how often is it the case that females are brought reluctantly, to give testimony before Grand Juries? When the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) who last addressed the Convention, made his reference to the gentler sex, I thought he was coming over to this side of the question. I supposed he was going to come out and say that no lady in this free country, should ever be arraigned before a Grand Jury by any mere slanderer, and her fair fame taken away from her. I was astonished to hear that gentleman, after this allusion, come out in support of an institution so well calculated for the purposes of malice, and so often made the instrument of destroying the fair fame of the gentler sex. Sir, our higher virtues are more frequently made the subject of envy, than our weaker virtues; and it is not unfrequently the wish of a bad spirit, to attempt to destroy the fairest reputation, in order that his own may be elevated thereby; and, in this way, the reputation of many a lady has been destroyed, who had previously always maintained the purest character, and the highest position in society. And these Grand Juries offer the most acceptable facilities to an envious mind, to go in and swear that such a lady had taken a false oath; or that she had been guilty of petit larceny, and so cause a bill to be found against her, which must effectually destroy her reputation for the remainder of her life.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am most anxious that we should not be in haste about the determination of this question; but that we should consider the time well spent, which shall be occupied in this debate. Sir, let me say to you, that the proposition now before the Convention embraces a new political movement—a movement which will be carried out, sooner or later, so that we shall yet live under a different institution from that of the Grand Jury system—an institution where there will be less danger to be apprehended from the machinations of the slanderer; and an institution which will go much further to protect the character—nay, the life—of the citizen. For, what is life without character? No individual can contentedly exist without character. Without character, life becomes a burthen to them. For myself, Mr. President, rather than have a bill found against me by a Grand Jury—I say it with deliberation, in the presence of this honorable body—I would greatly prefer death. No, sir, give me the right of a public examination, in preference to a Grand Jury, or any other secret institution that has power to cast the curse of an infamous crime upon me, without any foundation in truth whatever.

Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Convention but a few minutes longer upon this subject. I rose merely to ask for it the careful attention of this body. They are all men of reflection, no doubt; and as my very honorable friend from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) on yesterday, asked the attention of the thinking and reflecting members, because he was himself penetrated with the deep importance of this subject, so, now, do I ask the attention of gentlemen, and for the same reason. We have no clap-net here; and I do believe, if gentlemen will but give the subject their full and unbiased consideration, that they will see light springing up in the place of darkness; that they will find the proposition to improve upon more mature reflection, and that they will be constrained to say that there is more justice in this proposed change, and a greater approximation to the equilibrium of right and justice, than has ever been discovered in the old institution, which has blighted the character of thousands. I do not censure gentlemen for parting reluctantly with the old system. They should not lay it aside without reflection. But, upon this subject, we do not want history; we want only our own deliberate and practical reflections, to enable us to sound the death knell of such an old and mischievous institution, and rear a better one upon its ruins.

If the Grand Jury system was really as good and desirable as gentlemen seem to think it is, I should be very reluctant to oppose it; but the only reason which they advance for continuing it, is its antiquity—because they have long known it. Our proposition, on the contrary, being new, has to contend with the prejudices that cling and cluster around old things; and I feel gratified that it has received as much attention as it has. Although this is a new proposition, yet, sir, looking at it in the light of justice and reason, we think we can see in it everything requisite to protect the rights of the citizen and secure the interests of the State; and should this body fail to adopt it into the organic law—although “no prophet, nor the son of a prophet”—I will venture to predict, that, before thirty years shall elapse, the people of other States in this Union, as well as those of this, will have destroyed this feudal monster of oppression, and reared in its stead something similar to what we now propose.

By way of showing the ground for this prediction, I beg leave to make a statement which I know to be true. Some eighteen years ago, I had the honor of a seat in a deliberative body, not like this, but a State Legislature; and in that body I mooted the question of the election of judges directly by the people; and I remember very well, that, for so doing, the democratic party thought it an insane experiment, and treated it with ridicule. They all said of me: "That young man wants to subvert all the established usages of society, and turn everything upside down." But what has been the result? Dowe not see that our party, almost like one man, are in favor of the election of all judicial officers; and not only so, but that many of the States of the Union have adopted it as a principle in their Constitutions. And is it not more than probable that this Convention will adopt it? Well, as I was saying, when I first mooted this question, it did not receive one-tenth part of the amount of attention which has been awarded to the proposition now under consideration; and why? Because it had not half the merit in it; for it does not matter very much how a court is organized and carried on, but it does matter a great deal whether we maintain an institution which, in its very nature, is calculated to cast reproach upon the character of the citizens of the country; and that is the reason why we see our honest and fair-minded yeomanry instructing their delegates and petitioning this body upon this subject, and why we see so many gentlemen here, who will not be found advocating so odious a measure as our present system. I tell you, sir, our Grand Jury system would have been changed years ago, had it not been for a general impression which pervaded the minds of men, that it was a principle required by the Constitution of the United States. It is not entirely a new question; it was suggested to me by my constituents at home. They came to me frequently, saying: "If you can do it, we would like to have the Grand Jury system abolished; but many, while they earnestly desired this remodeling, supposed that the Constitution of the United States had placed an insuperable barrier to any change. And I thought so, too; for I had read in that instrument that a man should not be put in jeopardy except upon indictment or presentment. But as soon as I learned that it applied only to the practice in the federal courts, I arrayed myself in opposition to Grand Juries, and I am well assured, also, that I am on the side of justice; but this is not saying that others have not as much right to think for themselves as I have. They think, no doubt, that we are trying to uproot the foundations of government; but they are laboring under a very great deception, for we are only trying to bring about a reform, and bring out a better system for the administration of criminal law. And if our State will only take the lead in this reform, it will not only help to sustain our present lofty position in the confederacy, but the principle will go forth to our sister States, attracting attention everywhere, adding to the reforms of the age a reform that will honor us as its advocates and originators; and for ourselves, we shall throw off the yoke of an ancient dynasty, and establish a new system of criminal punishment that will be a sure relief against the evils of crime, bringing a speedy retribution upon the guilty, and a triumphant and complete exculpation of the innocent. In conclusion, I trust, sir, that the measure under consideration will pass. It may not be the most perfect substitute that can be adopted, yet, time will point out its imperfections, and experience will complete it. And, in my humble judgment, it will be the harbinger of a purer and more advanced civilization, and strengthen, as we progress, the confidence of the citizen in the protective power of the law—to secure life, liberty, happiness, and, let me add, character.

SATURDAY, Nov. 2, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ISENSEE.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. OWEN, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, made a report.

Mr. FOSTER, from the committee on the elective franchise and apportionment of representation, also submitted a report.

They were read a first time and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

RESOLUTIONS TO HAVE PRECEDENCE ON SATURDAY.

Mr. OWEN, in pursuance of notice given on yesterday, moved the following amendment of the rules:

"So to amend the rule regulating the order of business as that, on Saturday of each week, resolutions shall take precedence of the orders of the day."

The question upon the adoption of the amendment to the rules having been announced by the Chair,

Mr. OWEN said, he believed that the resolution which was adopted for the change of the rules generally, introduced by the gentleman on his right, (Mr. Stevenson,) was one of the most fortunate, with reference to the advancement of business, which could be devised, if the Convention were to have business coming in, in advance of the orders of the day. On the other hand, it was always found convenient in Congress, and other deliberative bodies where he had had experience, that there should be some chance to introduce resolutions, not only resolutions of a special and imperative character, but resolutions of inquiry, and miscellaneous propositions. For, if they were to continue without this opportunity, there would be continually motions made to suspend the rules, which would necessarily induce a great consumption of time, and a vast accumulation of useless matter upon the journal. It was his object to strike a mean betwixt the gentleman's rule, and this lack of opportunity to introduce resolutions.

Mr. FARROW moved to postpone the further consideration of this proposition till this day four weeks. He thought the Convention would have enough to occupy their attention in the meantime.

Mr. BORDEN said, there were many gentlemen here who were under obligations to their constituents to present matter by way of resolution. He thought it was due to their constituents that this opportunity should be given. But it seemed to him that, for the present, they might, well enough, devote to the introduction of resolutions, one further day in the week. He thought two days in the week would not be too much time to devote to this object.

Mr. FARROW'S motion was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved to postpone the subject until this day week.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to. And the question being taken on Mr. Owen's resolution, it was adopted without a division.

STATE OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT announced the consideration of the second section of the article reported from the committee on state officers other than the executive and judiciary, on Friday the 25th of October, by the chairman (Mr. Read of Monroe); the question being upon the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Rariden, striking out the proviso, which is in the following words:

"Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Treasurer or Auditor more than four years in any term of six years."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, he had remarked on last evening, that the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne was very important, because he considered the section as it now stands embraced every important principle. But, upon looking around over the House to-day, he discovered a great many vacant seats; a great many members were absent on leave, and there being a very thin House, he did not desire to discuss the question at this time, unless it become absolutely necessary that it should be discussed, and if the question was to be taken definitely upon the subject, he thought it necessary that something further should be said. But to test the sense of the House in regard to a postponement of a further consideration of the question in its present shape, he would move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne upon the table, and ask the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, the Secretary reported—yeas 63, nays 56, as follows;

YEAS.—Messrs. Bascom, Berry, Borden,

Bowers, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foley, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Tague, Tannehill, Todd, Trembly, Vanbenthusen, Wolf, Wonderlich, Yocum, and Zenor.—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Hawkins, Helmer, Hovey, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kindley, Lookhart, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pettit, Rariden, Ristine, Shoup, Steele, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, and Mr. President.—56.

So the amendment was laid upon the table, and the question recurred upon ordering the section to be engrossed for the third reading.

Mr. TERRY proposed the following amendment: strike out of second section, all relating to Auditor of State, and insert the following:

"There shall be chosen, by the qualified voters of the State, and commissioned by the Governor, an Auditor of State, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold his office for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be elected and qualified."

Mr. T. said, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention, between the four years and the two years term. It seems to me a strange thing, Mr. President, that gentlemen, professing a great devotion to the popular interests, should take the position assumed here by some, after contending so strenuously for short terms of office, and a strict accountability of officers. Allow me to remark, sir, that this effort for short terms and strict accountability, has been making ever since the organization of this government. But it would seem, from the zeal manifested here upon this subject, that all these attempts have met with a most signal failure. Gentlemen assert that the people are not permitted to exercise their sovereign will, and then come up here and coolly propose to restrict that sovereign will. Sir, is this democracy? It may be, in the modern sense of the term, but it is not republicanism. For here, in the second section of the first article of our present Constitution, it is declared, "That all power is inherent in the people; and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, they have, at all times, an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter or reform their government, in such manner as they may think proper." Here is the text upon which our government is founded, and upon which all the Constitutions of every State in the Union are predicated. And an attempt is now made, by those who profess to be the special friends of popular government, to restrict the power of the people in the exercise of their most important attribute of sovereignty. Sir, do the people demand this at our hands? All the authority which we have here in this body, is, to propose such reforms in the organic law of the State, as public opinion seems to require, and, if public opinion has required us to impose this restriction upon the sovereignty of the people, then these gentlemen are correct. But the argument that officers should be restricted to short terms and made re-eligible, is too flimsy a disguise to cover up the purpose of securing power and influence in the hands of all the office-holders in the State, and enabling them to say to others—gentlemen, stand back this time; your turn will come next. We all agree that the expression of the popular will should be full and free and without restraint; but adopt the principle of re-eligibility proposed in this report, and all the offices in the State will be disposed of by party organization, and the power of the machinery of party will completely suppress the will of the people.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley, said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I did not intend to say anything upon this subject, but since the gentleman (Mr. Terry) has renewed this proposition—brought up the old proposition identically, which the Convention has two or three times decided against; that is, the perpetual re-eligibility of officers; I desire to say a word with reference to the whole matter.

I do not know the politics of the gentleman last upon the floor, nor am I careful to inquire; but he threw out the idea that there must be some party machinery connected with the rotation in office, and the same gentleman proposed that perpetual re-eligibility should be adopted. Let us look at this proposition a little, and see what it is, or rather what might be the effects of it. Let us inquire into the proposition and strip it of all disguises. What does the gentleman desire? He moved that the Auditor alone shall be made re-eligible forever; surely then he would desire that all the State officers should be made re-eligible. Now, let us look at this in a party point of view. Suppose all the State officers—the Governor, Auditor, Treasurer, Secretary of State, and Judges of the Supreme Court, were to be made re-eligible, and located at the seat of Government; I ask gentlemen, if this would not bring to bear a most powerful influence upon the politics of the State? What is the doctrine of re-eligibility, but to give into the hands of office-holders the power to perpetuate themselves in place forever, if power and party influence could effect that object? They have got the patronage and the influence of office in their hands, and what else should they do, but to keep themselves perpetually in place? Sir, it is to prevent a state of things of this kind, and to break it up completely, that I shall go against the doctrine of re-eligibility. Whenever you can break up this organized clique of office-holders, you will break down this party machinery, which the gentleman's (Mr. Terry's) proposition, seems to me, to be designed to build up at this central point. It seems to me, that this proposition is exactly calculated to build up a kind of political hierarchy, which shall perpetuate itself in power and make a most indelible impress upon the future politics of the State, and because I am opposed to such a result, I am in favor of the principle of rotation in office, so, that no person shall hold office longer than a term of two or four years in any term of six or eight years.

Sir, is this disfranchisement? If gentlemen think this to be disfranchisement, let them stay out of office. A plenty of men, well qualified, will always be found ready and willing to accept of office upon the terms which may be proposed in the Constitution. I am exceedingly desirous that this principle should be impressed upon the Constitution, so that it shall be distinctly understood as extending to every ramification of office in the State—even to the judiciary itself. I would not have them hold on to their places by perpetual tenure, for I hold this doctrine to be true, that there are as good men out of office as there are in office.

It occurs to me, as I pass along, that I should notice a remark made by my respected friend from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) since I have the gentleman's obligation that I shall have a hearing from him whenever I speak, conferred as a mere matter of compliment, I suppose. I regretted to see that gentleman leading in the direction which he did, for, of course, I thought that he should have taken the real democratic side of this question. But, instead of that, he got up and denounced that side of the question in terms of great strength and vehemence; he derided and denounced the doctrine of putting any man out of office who was qualified for the place and desired to retain it.

Mr. PETTIT interposing, and Mr. S. giving way, said: I desire to correct the gentleman. He has misapprehended me entirely; I never uttered the sentiment here, or elsewhere, that a man should stay in office forever. I am in favor of short terms of office. I desire that all officers should be, as often as practicable, remitted to the people for re-election. But while I am in favor of short terms, I am utterly disposed to oppose the doctrine of re-eligibility. If a man discharges the duties of his office to the satisfaction of the people, there is no reason in the

in the world why he should not be re-elected, if the people desire that he should be.

Mr. SMITH (resuming.) I thank the gentleman for his explanation. But I repeat my impression, that he spoke in very strong terms of denunciation against laying any limitation upon the right to hold office. On the contrary, I must maintain that it is our right to set those limitations. But, as I was saying, the gentleman denounced this doctrine strongly and eloquently, that his words passed over the house like a shock of electricity; and I felt that this, my cherished doctrine, was all gone by the board. But when I looked at the gentleman's reason, what was it? Why, he affirmed that if you let a man take office for but a single term, it would make him cross; that he would not act the gentleman while in office, but would be rude and repulsive. Well, if this were to be the case—if we were to put a man of this kind in office, this would be one of the best reasons why we should turn him out as soon as possible; for there are gentlemen by nature, who would be, or who ought to be, thankful for the privilege of holding office for but a single term. I would prevent any other description of persons from coming into office, if it were in my power.

But, Mr. President, this rotation in office is not a new idea. We rotate our Governor, and we rotate our Sheriffs. We say to the best men in the State, you shall not be eligible to the most responsible office, until you are thirty years old. A man must have attained the age of thirty years before he is eligible for the office of United States Senator. And I would inquire of those gentlemen who are in favor of this principle of holding office continually—this perpetual eligibility—if there has, ever been any fault found with this doctrine of rotation, wherever it has been adopted! Why do you rotate your Governors? They have less influence upon the politics of your State than your Treasurers, because they have less money to handle, and less immediate communication with the people; and so it is with your Auditor and Secretary of State, though their salaries and emoluments of office are not near so high. Why not rotate these? And as a gentleman near me suggests, why not rotate the President of the United States—that highest and most important officer in the Union? Why not rotate your Secretary of State, your Treasurer, and Auditor, why not rotate every man in the State who holds a highly responsible office? I would remark that public opinion has rotated the President of the United States, although the Constitution of the United States does not; the illustrious example of Washington done that which the Convention neglected to do. And I would inquire whether any man in the United States, dare to ask for a re-election to a third term of this office? No sir: public opinion would scout at such a pretension, and where we have rotated Governors, Sheriffs, and Presidents, the doctrine has been more heartily approved than anything respecting official tenure, which has ever yet been introduced in any of our republican constitutions.

Mr. President, I have heard this argument urged. It frequently happens that a one armed man gets into the office of county clerk, or county auditor, who is well qualified for his place—why turn out such a man as this? He may have held his place for five or seven years, and it may have made him rich, is that any good reason for turning him out? No, surely not. But I will give you a good reason: here is one one armed man in office, and there are perhaps a hundred one armed men out of office; this is a good reason for rotation in such a case, and allowing some other one armed man, who is poor, well qualified to take the place and hold it until he has secured for himself and family something to subsist upon as well as the other, and then allow some other one armed or one legged man to take it, if he is qualified and deserving. This argument thus falls to the ground.

Well, sir, my friend on the right (Mr. Steele) has an argument which is this—and it was well put and well said; he is opposed to turning the old horse out of the plough, and he says: Would you turn out the old horse, and take the young one? I answer, yes, I would turn out the old horse—[several voices, "consent!"] turn him out—not to die, but take care of him; and why not turn him out? It is due to the young men that they have the opportunity of early training; the weight and responsibility of the State will soon be upon them, and the old should be turned out, if they do not give way. For this reason I would rotate them out, but my friend says this would be disfranchisement; this would be muzzling the people, for he believes, I suppose, in the old Jewish maxim, "you shall not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn."

Mr. President, I do not understand the proposition as disfranchising the people, nor in any proper sense muzzling the office-holder or the people.

But now, sir, with reference to this principle of rotation in office, (and it is a great and fundamental proposition, which we should carefully attend to,) I hold if there has been any one thing more plainly and intensely reflected by the popular will upon this body than another; which has come to us as the light comes to us from the great solar centre, the people, it is this, that we should declare that all officers shall be elected by the people; that we shall establish short tenures of office, and the principle of rotation in office, by the fundamental law of the land. I consider this to be emphatically the doctrine of the people. Now let us inquire, Mr. President, whether this doctrine is not most consistent with the laws of justice, as exemplified in family economy. Let us inquire whether this principle may not be traced up to the highest and most purified sources of domestic order. Let us inquire what man having three sons to assist him in the business of his farm, and who should say to the one, "My son, you must attend to the stable for this week;" and to another, "You must attend to the woodshed, and look after that department of labor for this week;" and to the third, "You must go into the parlor and entertain company for this week;" and to the latter he should add, "you shall put on a white cravat and qualify yourself to entertain company upon these conditions: if you don't cut the furniture, nor tear the carpet, and if you keep your face clean, you shall stay in the parlor next week." It is assumed that the three sons are equally well qualified to fill either of these places; well, the next week comes round, and it appears that the young man in the parlor has complied with the conditions imposed upon him—has performed very well—has kept his face clean—has not cut the furniture—has not torn the carpet. And thereupon, the father, ascertaining that all is right, makes the same conditions for the next week, and the next, and so on; and the lad complying strictly, continues at his pleasant, easy, and honorable post, while the other boys are condemned to the duties of degradation and drudgery. What would you say of a father who would manage his sons in this way? in a manner so un-parental and unjust? Why, you would say, he is an unfeeling man; that he should permit all of his sons to have an equal opportunity of meeting, entertaining, and enjoying the society of his company; he should not, in such a way, make one of his sons a gentleman and the balance boors.

But, sir, we point you to an illustration of this principle, derived from a higher power than this. I will go to a different department in domestic life. I will call upon the ladies to aid me in this argument. I will ask gentlemen to look to the economy of any highly respected and talented lady of our State—and I glory in the State where I reside, because truth allows me to remark here that in this country poverty is no disparagement—that it is no disparagement to any lady in this State, that, with her daughters, she should perform all the duties pertaining to the family establishment, taking personal care of all household interests from the kitchen to the garret,—I would direct the attention of gentlemen to this higher and purer source, that they might learn a lesson of such a lady in her domestic policy, if you will allow me to use the term. There is a lady, educated and wealthy, who resides in this State; this housewife and matron has two daughters who are equally well qualified to assist her in the discharge of all the business of the house. On Monday morning she says to her oldest daughter, "my daughter, you will, this week, go into the parlor, where you will take your needlework and entertain company; and your younger sister will aid me in the other business of the house—cooking for the family, &c." This arrangement goes on very agreeably; and the next week, coming round, she says to the elder sister, "your younger sister, for this week, will take her lessons, go into the parlor, and attend to the honors of the house, and you will go with me and assist me with the domestic affairs of the family." Under this system of arrangement every thing goes on smoothly, quietly, and gently. Everything being done up right, upon this most obvious principle of fairness and equality, no complaint is ever heard against the domestic arrangements of this most estimable matron—all sharing alike in the labors and honors of the household, and all equally respected and respectable. This state of things could not be maintained under any other system, and this is precisely the principle which I wish to impress upon all the offices of the State. If office is easy and honorable let all have an opportunity to enjoy it; if burdensome, let it not be imposed forever. I have said before that I believe there are as good men out of office as there are amongst the office-holders, and I desire to extend to all, as far as possible, the opportunity of participating in these favors of the people. I am utterly opposed to the principle which makes it possible for office-holders to perpetuate themselves in their places. I would run an open seam through their tenure of office from the highest to the lowest. Why, sir, when a man has once got into a profitable and honorable position he will have his friends around him, and will be able to make others by the blandness and courtesy of his manners, and also, as far as the power of his official influence will permit him to go, to that extent he will operate upon the public mind, for the purpose of retaining his office. I do hope, sir, that this principle of short terms and rotation in office may be impressed upon the new Constitution and established as a fundamental provision of the organic law of the State.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to occupy a few minutes in replying to the member from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) who has just taken his seat. That gentleman has had the honor of a seat in Congress, and has had the advantage of more political experience, and has filled more important offices, than the humble member who now occupies the floor. But, sir, notwithstanding all that difference, notwithstanding that I am willing to "knock under" to him on the score of ability, I really do feel like trying to make a reply to what he has just said. I want to notice his illustration in regard to the owner of the old horse [laughter] desiring, and it being to his interest, to turn him out after a life spent in his service. He said it was to the interest of the farmer to turn out an old horse and take in a young one who could work faster; and he argued from this, that we should turn out old officers and take in new ones every two or four years. He used this illustration to make his position stronger, that we should make these State officers ineligible after one or two terms in office. He would appear to represent the people in the similitude of the owner of the horse, and the officers in the similitude of the old horse. But, sir, notwithstanding his similitude, if he was a farmer, and was trying to get a load of corn from his field with a young colt who was unused to the harness, and not broken to pull through the miry places and up the hill, I think he would be glad to take out the young colt and put in the good old horse [much laughter] who was steady and used to a heavy draught up hill. Yes, sir, he would take him for the sake of getting his corn to the crib for the support of his family. I will take the gentleman's own similitude and remark upon it. He has alluded to the women. Now, I will suppose that he takes that delicate portion of his family—the best part of creation—his wife and daughter into his wagon; but will he put in his young colt who may take fright and run, or may balk and stop in the middle of his journey, and would he put his lady and family at the rear end of a young colt? [Roars of laughter.] No, sir, I have too much respect for the gentleman from Ripley—I have so much confidence in his carefulness and his regard for his family—that I know he would send off for the old horse. [Continued merriment.] But he went further; he remarked, when he was using the similitude of the ox, if a farmer would keep an old ox to plow his corn, after he had got old and blind? Does the gentleman [turning sharply round to Mr. Smith] mean to say that at this moment I am blind? [Laughter over all the chamber]

Mr. SMITH. I had no reference to the gentleman from Wabash at all: I was trying to show the necessity the owner was under of turning his ox out to pasture, after he got old and so blind that when he plowed with him the ox would go weaving and staggering through the furrow, treading down the corn on both sides. [Laughter.] I have more respect for my friend from Wabash than to allude to him in that manner.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. President, the gentleman has explained what he intended to say. Well, I will still take him on his similitude of the ox. [Great laughter.] I would ask him if he hadn't better have the steady old ox than a young steer, not half broken? [More laughter.] And moreover, to carry out the similitude, it is well known by every farmer—and I am proud to say there are many farmers in the Convention—that a young horse is never used until he has been broken in by being worked with the old horse. Every man who expects to hold an office should be well learned by the old officer before he is allowed to hold office himself. Are there not young men learning to fill office at this Clerk's desk? These very young men are under tuition now that will fit them to hold other offices by-and-by. They may be employed in the next Legislature the better for having served here. Must they be choked down and muzzled hereafter because they have held an office here. I tell my friend from Ripley that the Scripture says: "Muzzle NOT the ox that treadeth out the corn." [Laughter.] But I am coming to the point now; and I will illustrate it as strongly as my friend from Ripley illustrated his argument. I will use a mechanical figure. I have had a good deal of experience in life. I have followed a good many trades and means of living, and among other things, I have been a mechanic, and I shall, therefore, be allowed to illustrate my meaning in this way. Now here is the Capitol, a very fine and elegant building. It was built for the State, and the mechanic employed did his duty faithfully. He performed his contract with the State in a workmanlike and creditable manner, and he expected it would be a recommendation to him when he wanted to build other edifices. He worked hard that he might have the name of building the best edifice in the State. But, if you carry out the policy argued for by the gentleman from Ripley and others, you would not allow him to build another house. Here is your Insane Asylum to be built—and, sir, the finest building I have seen is the Insane Asylum—but you won't let this good architect, who has proved himself a good one, build the other State building, because he has built one; and so you would turn a good mechanic out of employment. This would be on the same principle that you would say the people shan't elect an officer to the same place twice, no matter how well he has served the public when he was in office.

I will make another remark in regard to the sovereignty of the country. I agree with the gentleman in all that he says about the sovereignty of the people. But I thought that the sovereign of a country could distribute the offices as he thought best? I thought the people could make a man President for one term, or two, just as they thought best, and that they could keep a man in office two years or ten years, if they thought he was faithful and discharged his duties well. But it is proposed to restrain this sovereign from exercising his judgment in the selection of his officers; it is proposed to forbid him from keeping a man in office longer than two or four years. Now I am for leaving this matter with the sovereign who is the people in this country. I wish to let the people keep a man in office just as long as they see fit. I will not muzzle them. Suppose we go to the highest authority? Suppose we look to the high court of Heaven! The gentleman will learn, if he looks there, that the angels were once driven out of Heaven for asking for rotation in office. [Much laughter.] What was the difficulty in that Heavenly kingdom that created all things? We understand that some of the angels aspired to fill the highest place? They wanted to oust the great Creator, and for this crime they were cast down.

The gentleman said my doctrines were of a Jewish character. Sir, do you recollect Nicodemus? Was he a Jew? What was his language to the Saviour, and what was Christ himself crucified for? He was put to death because he had rendered the greatest and most important services to the people gratuitously. Now this is the reverse of my doctrine. I would honor men and keep them always in the public service when their character was so exalted. Then my doctrine is any thing but Jewish, sir.

Sir, your humble servant has held office, and the people did not see fit to turn him out for the long period of twenty-one years. Although I held office for so long a time, yet I am now poor, for what I have received has been distributed to those around me.

Now, sir, I have taken up some time, and I am sorry it has not been more profitably employed, but on the present occasion I could not pass over the remarks of the gentleman from Ripley. This is a very important subject, and I hope gentlemen will pause before they conclude to trammel the people in the selection of their officers. Let us not say you shall not keep a good public servant, but you shall turn him out and take in a new one. Let the old and tried servants keep their places just as long as it is the people's will. It is not our place to tie up their hands. Our country has been prosperous under the old system, and we should let it remain. I hold to the good old rule, and so help me God, I always will, "Do unto others as you would have others do to you," or, as I might say, Mr. President, do unto others as they have done to you. I was long kept in office by people who placed confidence in me, and now that I am old and going into the grave I will not make an iron rule that others shall not be kept in office as often as the people choose to re-elect them.

Mr. NILES. Mr. President: Though I am yet hardly able, in justice to myself, to be upon this floor, I desire to submit a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith). I feel that questions of vital interest, affecting the theory if not the operations of free government, are involved in this debate. And, sir, I am fully satisfied that the gentleman's remarks—his entire argument and the entire position assumed—are founded upon two essential errors, which, incorporate them often as you may in Constitutions, will still be radically unsound.

There are two kinds of provisions which we make in Constitutions. In reference to the one class, I will go as far as those who go farthest. They consist in declarations of palpable truths—propositions which underlie all human rights, and which cannot be violated without doing violence to every dictate of sound reason and every principle of genuine benevolence. By the enunciation of these, we seek more effectually to protect those personal rights which are implied in the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and which is the paramount object for which governments are formed.

Then, sir, there is another class of provisions which relate to the people in their aggregate capacity, and what they may do, either directly or through the intervention of agents. I go as far as any one for prescribing within narrow limits the powers of the people's agents. But in what the people do directly and without the intervention of agents, I go for the widest liberty.

Our governments are founded upon an entirely different principle from that of the monarchies of the old world. The order of things is entirely reversed. Theirs is a false system, founded upon a false philosophy—the idea that all power is derived from one man. Ours, beyond all controversy, is the true doctrine—that all power is in the people, and that all government results from their voluntary choice. The further, then, they deviate in practice from the theory of their governments, the better; while, as ours is unquestionable truth, the more closely we adhere to our theory, the better, in the end, our system will work.

Then, sir, I apprehend that the gentleman's remarks involve these two errors: first, that offices are created for the benefit of office-holders, or at least that idea is implied in his argument. The other is, that it is not safe wholly to trust the people, in the management of what is peculiarly and exclusively their own business. Upon these two points I am at issue with him, and with all others who occupy the same ground. And I hope, indeed, sir, that two such principles will not be engrafted upon the Constitution. Both are radically wrong, and no assertion of them can make them right.

In the first place, manifestly, offices are in no way designed for the benefit of the office holders. The gentleman talks about "a one-armed man," and why turn him out? He says, "because there are a dozen other one-armed men who need the office just as much." I could give a better reason. If he be an incompetent officer, and the people see fit to turn him out, let him go; but if he be the man whom the people, of all others, desire to retain, let them have the power to do it. The proposition may be familiarly illustrated. The office holder is an agent for the people. In incorporating a railroad company, with what propriety could you provide that the company—having the right to employ agents for limited periods—should have no power of re-appointment? I go as far as any man for short terms and frequent accountability. I would not place the officer, for a long period, beyond the reach of the people, but I do not go for limiting the people in what is peculiarly their own business. I would throw upon them the whole responsibility of its being well or badly done. I would not limit them as to this power of re-appointment more than I would an incorporated company; I would leave it all to the people. We well may, as according to the theory of our government, we should, trust the people in what is peculiarly their own business; and the more they are trusted, except where we would guard paramount personal rights, the more worthy they will prove of being trusted, as beyond all question, the best discipline for freemen is the exercise of the rights of freemen. They will purchase wisdom by experience.

But the gentleman, as he said, holds to rotation in office, and speaks of the example of the Presidency of the United States—"that no man would dare to be a candidate after a second term." Admit it; and I submit, sir, in all earnestness, whether it was not far better that that rule of action should be, as it has been, settled by the people themselves, than to have had it fixed upon them by the Convention which sat in Philadelphia. I might add that the one term principle is almost settled, and soon will be. It is only another illustration of the truth that we not only should, but may with safety, trust the people in the management of their own business.

In regard to judges, I agree with the gentleman, that we should not fasten them as permanent fixtures upon the country. They should be elected for reasonably short periods, but subject to re-election. I think it unfortunate that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are not elected by the people. But I submit it whether, if Chief Justice Marshall or Mr. Justice Story were now living, and if the election of judges of that court were left to them, you would think it wise that the people should not have the power to elevate, for a second term, to that high office, either of those illustrious men! And in answering that question, which must come home to the sound reason of every member upon this floor, do you not settle the whole question now under debate?

At the risk of being tedious, (several voices: no, go on, go on,) I will allude to another point. I regard this as an important matter, involving great principles which I do not wish to see perverted in the instrument to go from under our hands. The gentleman has asked, and all such illustrations are calculated to have their weight, "how we should regard the conduct of a farmer who, having three sons, should assign to one a permanent place as a gentleman in his parlor, to another the business of cutting wood, and to the third the work of the farm and the position of a clown?" Now, sir, I would say, impose no restrictions upon the assignment of places and professions—leave it all to the judgment and paternal affection of that father. Let him have the power to do as upon mature reflection, with a full knowledge of the several capacities and tendencies of his sons, may seem best, and while one son may be suited for a profession and another for agricultural labor, do not, by any means, compel the farmer to enter a profession, and thereby pervert the natural order of things.

I say, in conclusion, it is my deliberate judgment, that in all such matters, as whom they shall elect to office, you cannot trust the people too far. It is emphatically their own business—it comes in conflict with no man's personal rights, for no man holds a title to office. If he be a pauper or deprived of a limb, let the charities of the State support him, if need be, but let it be remembered forever that no man holds a title to office. Let no principle of "rotation in office" be fixed in the Constitution—let the people fix it. The government is for the good of the people, the officers are held for the benefit of the people, and when the people continue one man in office, or elect another to fill his place, they violate no man's private rights. Therefore, I say, emphatically, this is peculiarly the people's business, and let us trust the people, for the more they are trusted in what is their own business, the more worthy they will be of confidence.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I think I understand my friend upon my left (Mr. Niles) as representing me to be opposed to the re-eligibility of office-holders. He is mistaken. I have no objection whatever to the re-eligibility of officers, but I want to limit their terms, and bring them to frequent accountability by having frequent elections, so that, if the people desire it, they shall be rotation in office.

Mr. RARIDEN said: My principal object in asking for the floor, was to offer my mediation between the two members who stand opposed to each other upon this question. I think it very proper that I should be the person to mediate between them, for they are both ex-members of Congress, and so am I; and I am therefore, perhaps, better prepared to decide which of them has advanced farthest on the line of progression. [A voice—"we will hear you."] Well, sir, I go with the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) upon this ground, because he has faithfully read the history of the progress of men's minds upon this subject. I take it for granted that the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) is very little in advance of men as we have seen them thirty-four years prior to this time. What was the doctrine of 1816? It was that the election of these officers should not be confided to the people. The men of that day adhered to the old theory, that the people were not capable of making these selections. Such was the importance of the functions of these offices that it was not considered safe to confide their election to the people. This was the foundation of the provision upon this subject in our present Constitution. This was the reason why these elections were retained in the hands of the legislative body. But now time has progressed, and men's minds have progressed to the point where the gentleman from Tippecanoe, myself, and a few others have been constrained to entertain the idea that it is safe to confide these elections to the people. The gentleman from Ripley admits that the people may be trusted a little in this matter, but for fear they will do wrong he wants to put such limitations upon their power, that if they do wrong in these elections the wrong shall not hurt them much, and if they do right, why, it is no business of ours. This theory rests exactly upon the point where it has been placed by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and it can be entertained only by those who cherish the idea that offices are conferred merely for the sake of the men, and that the shorter the tenures of our offices, the more are our chances and the chances of our friends increased for obtaining them. This, Mr. President, is radically an erroneous theory. The selections to office are made with a view to the interests of the people; not with a view to the interests of the individuals selected; but they are selected because they have capacity, integrity, and fidelity—this is the supposition, at the time, whether right or wrong.

Now, if it be right to trust the people with the power to select their own officers, is it not also right to take away all restraints upon the exercise of this power? Why, sir, it would be an outrage to continue such a restraint. Who suffers if they make a wrong selection? It is their own error, and they bear the burden of it.

These inferior offices have no analogy to the office of President of the United States, whose hand is filled with patronage which might be used for the purposes of corruption. If it were allowable to say that the American people could be at all corrupted, there would be a manifest impropriety in continuing this office for a long time. But as for the Auditor and Treasurer, whose business is watched year after year—who are held accountable in the strictest manner—there can be no necessity to shorten their term and render them ineligible.

This argument, in one or two things, is very radical. Either it embraces the idea that the possession of office is a means of making party capital, or else a means of corrupting men—upon the supposition that our fellow-citizens may be corrupted by the inducements which they may be able to hold out—both of which ideas, in my judgment, are radically erroneous. I ask the gentleman (Mr. Smith of Ripley) to consider that we have progressed from the time when, in 1816, it was assumed that the people were incapable of selecting their own officers. We are all now in favor of trusting them with making these selections. And a few gentlemen, with myself, entertain the idea that they may be trusted in this matter, without restriction, again and again; and if they see proper to continue the same individual in office year after year, in consideration of the faithful discharge of his official duties, and his complete fulfillment of public expectation, that it is not at all improper for them to do so. It is merely leaving in the hands of the people the power of awarding meritorious services.

On the other hand, the course pursued by the gentleman from Ripley results in what is called ostracism. He proceeds upon the idea, that, when a man becomes so popular that everybody confides in him, he becomes a dangerous citizen; in fact, there is no danger to be apprehended.

I am not particular, sir, about the tenure of these offices. I admit that there would be great inconvenience to have these elections every two years, and it would greatly cheapen the offices themselves, rendering them less desirable and important than though these elections were to take place every four years. Nevertheless, I want the people to hold these elections just as often as they see proper. If gentlemen say, that, after a man has served two terms, he shall be disqualified, I cannot go with them. I am not willing to assume the ground, that the officer who has served one or two terms has obtained such an ascendancy over the minds of men that no one can stand any chance against him.

But there is another consideration. I do not wish to cultivate a thirst for office in this State. The man who sets himself up to live by public employment, has but very slight claims to my support. The individual who sets himself up to cater for the taste and opinions of every man, if he is not very free from the common frailties of men, will be sure to lose his character for that little gem which I esteem very highly, which is sometimes called candor and fairness; he will assume too much of the habit of a species of double dealing—a way of becoming all things to all men. I have not much reverence for these everlasting office-seekers—those very characters which I suppose the gentleman (Mr. Smith of Ripley) has been alluding to. I sympathize not with such characters; and politically I raise my hand against them. In so doing, I think I would be acting as a republican. Nevertheless, whenever the majority here shall decide against me, I will rest satisfied that they are right, and I am wrong in some sense. Privately, I will think and speak what I please; but publicly I will say, vox populi vox dei.

MR. OWEN. MR. PRESIDENT: I have arisen chiefly for the purpose of recommending to the Convention to look back toward the point from which we started. What is the question? Could any man tell who had been listening to this discussion for two or three days past? Such a man would certainly come to the conclusion, that the matter under discussion was, whether any officer of the State should be re-eligible, after having served one, or at most, two terms. But no such question as that is before us. We are deciding the question whether the Auditor and Treasurer of State, shall be elected and remain together here for a longer term than four years. Now, all my votes upon this subject have been decided upon the conviction, that it is wiser and better that these two officers—the one holding the purse of the State; and the other, the officer who draws upon that purse for every disbursement—should not remain together for a longer term than four years. I have voted in this way, because I think men ought not to be led into temptation. This is a principle to which we often advert in our prayers; and it is a true principle in regard to the regulation of the conduct of men. I have not that bad opinion of mankind which many profess. I do not believe in human depravity, in the sense of which many understand that phrase, but I say there are temptations to which men ought not to be exposed; and to which, if they are, some will surely fall. For this reason, I desire to see inserted in the Constitution a restriction to the effect that no two officers, with such intimate relations in the discharge of their respective duties, coming here together, at the seat of government, should be permitted to remain together longer than four years. In my judgment, that would be a wise restriction.

With reference to the reasons that have been given by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and the gentleman from Wayne, on my left, (Mr. Rariden,) why we ought to make no such restrictions, I have a few words to say. I have taken down the words of the gentleman from Laporte; and, speaking of this restriction, he says, "it is urged by those who are not willing to trust the people with the management of their own affairs." The words of the gentleman from Wayne, were: "if it be right to trust the election of officers to the people at all, it is certainly right and proper to take all restraints from them." If this be so, we had better go home at once; for our whole object in sitting here, as I understand it, is to propose a Constitution which shall restrain the power of the people themselves, as well as restrain the legislative power.

Mr. RARIDEN (interposing). Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. OWEN. I shall be most happy to be corrected, if I am wrong.

Mr. RARIDEN. We differ only about the design, or the intention of Constitutional restraint upon the people. I contend that it is simply the intention of the Constitution to restrain the representatives of the people; and that all the rights of the people, as defined in the Constitution, are left with themselves; and, that Constitutional restraints have reference only to the legislative power.

Mr. OWEN (resuming). To get definitely at this matter, let us take up some one of the provisions of the first article of our present Constitution—it matters little which—and examine its character and effects. The first that strikes my eye, is the section touching imprisonment for debt.

"The person of a debtor, where there is not strong presumption of fraud, shall not be continued in prison after delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditor."

Now, is this a restriction on the Legislature alone, or on the people also? Suppose the people think it best that a debtor shall be continued in prison after he has surrendered his estate. Can they instruct their representatives in the State Legislature to pass a law to that effect? and then, perhaps, next year, to repeal it if it no longer suit them? Clearly not. When they consented to adopt the Constitution, they abandoned their right to pass any such law.

Let us try another section. "The Legislature shall not grant any title of nobility." A very unnecessary provision, truly; but imagine the case, that the people should desire to grant to some idolized favorite, a patent of nobility, can they require of their Legislature to decree its issue? They cannot. While the Constitution remains unamended, neither the Legislature nor the people can do this thing.

Mr. RARIDEN. I beg pardon for interrupting the gentleman from Posey, but I desire distinctly to understand whether he means to say, that the article of the Constitution which restricts the Legislature from creating titles of nobility, is a restraint upon the rights of the people or a restraint upon the Legislature?

Mr. OWEN. So long as this Constitution is the organic law of the land, it is clearly and undeniably a restriction upon the rights of the people.

If this be not the case, what is the object of a Constitution? If it does not effect this, what does it effect? In a Constitution, the people agree to impose certain restraints upon themselves. In a calm moment, they decide upon certain general and permanent rules of action, from which, in their annual law-making, they will not depart, just as a good man restrains and governs himself by the dictates of moral principle.

But now, sir, to revert to the immediate matter on hand, the terms of Auditor and Treasurer. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) said, on a previous occasion, when speaking of the election of these officers, as now proposed, by the people, that that election would, in fact, be governed by a caucus nomination, here at the seat of government; that those who are sometimes called wire-workers would make themselves busy here, and place before the people the rival aspirants. Say that this be true, then the gentleman has furnished the strongest argument against his own position. If a caucus vote determine the candidates for these offices, then the non-re-eligibility clause which we are now discussing, resolves itself into this, that the people are forbidding a continued nomination of the same individual by a caucus at Indianapolis. It is the people, in effect, saying to that caucus, "twice you may nominate the same individual, but the third time you may not do it." That, if the gentleman's premises be correct, is the substantial effect of the constitutional restriction he opposes.

I am not speaking here to the question of non-re-eligibility in elections generally. That will come up by and by. I confine my remarks to the case of Auditor and Treasurer; and so far, I approve the principle as wise and prudent.

Mr. WOLFE. Mr. President, the first question for us to ask ourselves at the present time is, what have we come up here for? We came here, sir, to organize a government. To that government properly belong three departments, the executive, the judicial, and the legislative. We are also here to provide for important reforms, one of which is to throw all the elections directly to the people, except the election of United States Senator, which the Constitution of the United States provides shall be made by the Legislature. It has been objected to this proposition to render office holders ineligible for re-election, that we were limiting the rights of the people. Now, when we prescribe limitations to the terms of office, it is the office holders we limit, not the people. For my own part, I am in favor of restricting a man from being eligible to office after two terms. I hold to the old adage, "short settlements make long friends." I believe fully in that. The people are almost unanimous in taking this view of the subject. The people desire, whether a man shall stay in office one or two terms, at the end of four years, if the officer shall have served so long, they desire that a new man should come into his office and examine his books and accounts, to see that every thing is right and proper. When a merchant or a railroad company employs clerks and agents, they always have access to the books and papers to satisfy themselves that their business is correctly and honestly conducted. But the people cannot come up in a body to the capital to look into the accounts of their servants. Therefore, they send up one of their number to fill the office—to examine as it is his duty the condition of the public interests in that quarter, and if there be any thing wrong, to report the same to the people. The new officer can have no interests in common with the old incumbent; on the contrary, it is to his interest to make all proper investigation and corrections where any are needed. If he succeeds in ferreting out and exposing corruption and fraud in the former administration of his office, the people will have confidence in him. Hence it is to the interest of the new officer to guard the rights of the people. To render an officer ineligible to more than one re-election, is not fettering the will of the people, because, after the expiration of four years, when he becomes ineligible to re-election for that particular office, he has the right to serve the public in any other capacity in which he may be chosen. For my own part, I would like to limit the tenure of the office of Governor to two years, also. I would have all the State officers elected but for two years, and then ineligible for re-election, but to "lay out" for two years and give time and convenient opportunity for a thorough examination of all their doings while in office. I presume that every delegate in this chamber knows the will of his people upon this subject. Then let us act accordingly, and act promptly. Why talk about restraining the people? I tell you they want their officers restrained, and that is all this section proposes.

The general desire is to get competent men in all our offices, and gentlemen tell us that those who have been long in office are most likely to be competent men. We have men in training for every office in the country, from the office of coroner or justice of the peace up to that of president of the United States. And here in Indiana, where we have a million inhabitants, can we not get competent and proper men to do all the business of the people? Sir, we have thousands of upright men who are competent to fill every office in the State, and there is therefore no necessity for cavil against short terms on the ground of turning out competent and getting in incompetent officers. Where is the safeguard of the people? It is in requiring of all her officers a frequent accountability. I would even go so far as to fix the per diem allowance of members of the Legislature, and the salaries of all the State officers. I know that many of the people are in favor of that being done in the Constitution.

I have noticed in the debate this morning that there appears to be a difficulty in understanding whether offices should be regarded as for the benefit of the office-holders, or for the sole benefit of the people. I take it as a clear and undeniable proposition, that offices never were designed for the benefit of the office-holder. My opinion and view of the matter is, that it is one of the necessary evils of society, that we have to have offices and salaries, and office-holders. But offices should be held for the benefit of the people solely, and in re-organizing the government we should so fix the terms of office, the condition of eligibility and re-eligibility, and the amount of salary, as to render this evil as small a one as possible. But, sir, it is a doctrine that I, for one, have yet to learn, that offices were ever designed to be held for the benefit of the office-holder. Therefore, in examining this question, I do not look at that point, I do not stop to inquire whether ineligibility will benefit or hurt the office-holder. I do not care how it affects him; the question for me is, how will the interests of the people be best secured? Will this measure guard their interests and protect their rights? We should thoroughly purge the legislative department; the people expect this of us. They expect us to take away from the Legislature the power of impeachment, and the power to grant divorces, and so to organize that department of the State government that it shall no longer be a mere law enacting and law repealing body. Now, let us do all these things that the people want and expect we will do. Every man knows very accurately what the people want, and we will not give any new light as to the wishes and opinions of his constituents by the debate here. All the arguments used here on the various questions that have been up, have changed few minds. We had the Grand Jury question up for a week, and all that debate has not changed a single mind. [Several voices—"That's a mistake;" "I was changed."] Well, I did not know that a single mind had been changed. I am glad if the debate effected good. But we have reasonable duties to perform here, and I wish to urge their speedy performance. I am glad to see the good spirit which has thus far characterized all our discussions. Let us go on as expeditiously as possible, and get through with the consideration of these questions, upon which there is a division of sentiment and opinion.

I am in favor of the section as reported by the committee, and shall vote against every amendment. It is time that the question was settled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The debate has taken a wide range already. For the present, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. NAVE. I have heard complaints made upon this floor against too much speech-making, and of gentlemen occupying the time of the Convention unnecessarily; but when I see a question under consideration of so important a character as the present one, I cannot, for one, remain still in my place, or refrain from expressing my entire disapprobation of the proviso contained in this section. It is a proviso, sir, that will destroy a fundamental and indubitable right of the people of this State. It directly proposes to deprive the people of that right which, as American freemen, we have ever held to be secured and guaranteed to us, as well by the provisions of our glorious Declaration of Independence, as by the present existing organic laws of the State of Indiana.

In answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I will state, sir, that he proposes to incorporate into the bill of rights, by his amendment, a provision that, in my humble judgment, will secure all that could be desired by the people of Indiana in future.

I will read the amendment.

"We declare that all power is inherent in the people, and that all free governments are, and of right ought to be, founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends the people have at all times an inalienable right to alter and reform their government."

I will contrast the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) to the declaration of rights, which properly declares that all power is inherent in the people, so far as to their self-government, but no farther, and that they have absolute power and control over their own representatives and all officers of State. Now, I ask, does the proposition under consideration compare in principle with the one proposed to the bill of rights by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen); the one recognizes all power to govern in the people, and the proposition under consideration positively denies that power as belonging, naturally, to the people, by both depriving them of the right of conferring, by their suffrage, office a second term upon the same person, and in declaring that a faithful public officer, although he may have discharged every duty imposed upon him with honesty and fidelity to the public, yet he shall not offer himself as a candidate for re-election to the same office, thus depriving them of a natural inalienable right which they have inherited from their forefathers, who acquired it for them when they, by the lavish expenditure of their blood and treasure, obtained the liberty of this republic. You restrict the citizen of this State by this proviso, from exercising a natural and inalienable right that should never be taken from him. I ask in all seriousness if this proviso is not in opposition to the fundamental organic law of the country? And yet it is proposed to impose this restriction upon American freemen.

It appears to me, sir, then, that the principle proposed in the declaration of rights, which I have referred to, of this State, is in direct contradiction to the terms of the amendment now under consideration, which provide for depriving the citizen of the right to vote for an incumbent who may have served faithfully for two terms, for a third or more terms. For that reason I am opposed to the entire section. Gentlemen may boast much of their rights as freemen of this republic, but I have only to say by the present section under consideration, you restrict the right of suffrage by preventing the people from voting for those whom they prefer if they have already held office; thus thereby sapping at the very foundation of the rights of the American citizen.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I desire, sir, before the vote is taken upon this question to make a word of explanation. I stated the other day that I was willing to extend the term of the Auditor to four years, but during the progress of this debate I have changed my views on that point, and I desire now to state briefly the reasons. But I will first say a few words on the principle involved in this question.

- The gentlemen who advocate the perpetual re-eligibility of these officers insist that it is an unnecessary restraint on the power of the people to choose whomsoever they may prefer to be their officers. They say it implies a suspicion of the wisdom and capacity of the people; that, in fact, it is a denial of the right and capacity of the people to govern themselves. They ask are we afraid to trust the people? I answer we are not. The people, at least their representatives, in their original and primary capacity, exercise the high and solemn power of prescribing and fixing limits to the powers of the government. The question now is not how far we will trust the people, but how much authority we will grant to those officers with whom we, the people, entrust the powers of government? How long will the people part with their power? How long shall the officer hold it before he returns it to those from whom he derives it?

I understand, sir, that all free governments have limited powers, and the tenure of office is at least not perpetual. Now, sir, as I am somewhat old fashioned, I will follow the gentleman from Ripley, as my Democratic leader on this subject, as he is said to be a little old in his opinions, advocating doctrines that were supposed to be true some twenty years since. I have no sympathy with those progressives whose reforms lead from republicanism towards despotism. Now, sir, it is an old fashioned maxim that power has a tendency to draw to itself additional power, to entrench itself by every means possible. To counteract this, the terms of office (for the officers possess the power of the government,) in republics are made short. The people frequently resume that power which they had parted with, and in important offices, the officer rendered ineligible, that he may not usurp power, and control or defy the people.

Gentlemen say this prohibition of re-eligibility is a new edition of the Athenian ostracism, which banished citizens who had become too powerful. The Athenians resorted to this contrivance because the powers of their government were not properly balanced; and the authority of their great officers was not sufficiently limited and defined. The powerful citizens often usurped the whole power of the government, and established themselves permanently in office. Hence they were suspicious and oftentimes unjust to their great men. But at Rome, in the age of the republic, the powers of the government were better balanced, and the election of consuls, and most other officers, were annual. Far greater confidence was granted by the people to their great officers. But when the people of Rome invested the decemvirate with indefinite authority, and unlimited tenure, for the mere purpose of presenting a code or revision of the laws, they attempted to usurp the whole power of the State. Hence, I apprehend the proverb may have been derived that "where annual elections end, tyranny begins."

Allow me to say with reference to this question of the Auditor, that it is possible our system of banking may be changed, and new duties assigned to that officer in connection with our monied institutions, and thus his power greatly increased. And the same reasons which require that the tenure of office of the Treasurer of State, should have some definite limit and termination, may with equal force be applied to this officer. I shall, therefore, vote that the Auditor's term of office shall be the same as that of the Treasurer.

MR. GIBSON said, MR. PRESIDENT:—We have just witnessed an exhibition, which I hope not to see repeated on this floor. While an amendment was under discussion, involving a highly important principle, and at a moment when members were endeavoring to obtain the floor for the purpose of participating in the debate, one of the opponents of that amendment, who had the good fortune to catch the eye of the President, moved to lay the amendment on the table, and that motion was sustained by the vote of the Convention. This, sir, is applying the gag to debate, and that in the most odious form. I repeat, sir, that I hope, that, as it was the first, it will be the last exhibition of the kind we shall be called upon to witness.

If upon any subject upon which it shall become our duty to act, but a single member of this body should differ in opinion from myself, I, for one, am willing to listen to him, until he has exhausted all arguments that he may wish to offer.

An example was afforded the other day in the debate on negro suffrage. The gentleman from Steuben (Mr. May) had the moral courage, though standing alone in his opinions, boldly to advocate the extension of suffrage to the negro race. Upon that question he and I are as widely separated as heaven is from hell; yet, sir, I would have been the last man, by vote or act of mine to abridge in the slightest degree any remarks he might wish to make upon the question. And that, sir, is in my opinion, the spirit which should actuate this body, in the discharge of the high trust committed to their keeping.

I would, sir, especially deprecate any attempt to force a vote upon the question of ineligibility, at this time, when nearly one-third of the members of this body are absent. It is one, perhaps, of no great practical importance; but involving, as I conceive it does, the very principle which lies at the foundation of our government, and upon which rests the whole structure, the right and capability of the people to govern themselves; it derives from that fact an importance, which demands our most careful deliberation. It is a question no less than this; are the people of Indiana capable of selecting, at the ballot-box, the officers necessary to carry on the government; are they to be trusted in the unrestrained exercise of this power; or do they need the restraining hand of this Convention to prevent its abuse. Were the fathers of the republic right, when they announced to the world that man was capable of self-government! or are we to believe the monarchists of Europe, when they tell us that the experiment of republicanism must sooner or later fail, and that the masses are not to be entrusted with power!

This sir, is the true question involved in the section under discussion; and those who advocate the proviso, differ only from the monarchists of the old world in the length to which they would carry the principle, and not in the principle itself—The one is not willing to trust the people at all—the other is willing to repose half confidence in them.

With regard to the length of the term for which these officers are to be elected, it is a question of minor importance, and one in which I feel but little interest. It is the principle contained in the proviso, which I desire to combat; and I would here remark, that I agree with the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) that if it is proper in principle to apply this proviso to one office, it is proper to apply it to all; out, I believe sir, I agree with him in nothing else.

That gentleman has entered into a labored argument tending to show the propriety of rotation in office; an argument that would have been admirable on the stump, and directed against an opponent who had, perhaps, grown gray in office. It is a principle about which, perhaps, there is but little difference in opinion, either in this body or among the people at large; but gentlemen seem to forget the difference between the people's being influenced in their votes by such a principle, and having it thrust upon them as an inexorable rule to which no exception should be allowed, and from which, under no circumstances are they to be allowed to depart.

A MEMBER, (offering a book,) read what Mr. Jefferson says.

MR. GIBSON. I would rather know first, which side of the question he is on. I yield to no man, sir, in reverence of the mighty minds, of the past, those

"Dead but sceptred sovereigns
That still rule our spirits from their urns."

But neither the authority of Jefferson, or any other man, has weight enough with me, to carry with it a provision as monstrous in principle as I conceive this to be.

As I was remarking, sir, the true issue to be determined, is not the propriety of rotation in office, as a political principle, for about that there is but little difference of opinion; but whether that, which has heretofore had no greater force, than what its own merit entitled it to have, shall now be raised to the dignity of a Constitutional principle; whether we shall so hedge the voter round with restraints, that half the freedom of elections will be lost, to insure the triumph of an isolated political principle, having no proper connection with organic law!

Shall we go home, sir, to our constituents, and tell them, that coming here pledged, as we did, to extend elections by the people to all offices—pledged to take from the Legislature the elections which it now has, and give them to the people; that after declaiming from every rostrum in our respective counties, about the right and the capability of the people to elect their own officers, shall we, I say, tell them that after all this, the very first section of the new Constitution which we adopted, contained a restriction upon the elective franchise.

That while we took from the Legislature the power of electing a Secretary of State, Treasurer, and Auditor, we conferred it with a grudging hand upon the people. That we placed restrictions upon them that had never been thought necessary or proper, when the election was in the hands of the legislature. What other construction could be put upon such a provision, than that we believed the masses were less to be trusted than the Legislature?

But let us look for a moment at the practical effect of this principle when we shall come to apply it to the election of not merely these, but all other officers in the State—you say in effect to the people of a county, you may elect your own clerk, or sheriff, or auditor; but for fear that you may not be capable of acting with due judgment in this matter, we impose this restriction upon you: that you may elect any other man than the one whom a majority desire, and whom you know to be qualified. That man you shall not elect, but among all others you are free to choose. I repeat it, sir, that the whole, and only effect of this proviso is to prevent the election of the men whom the majority of the State or a county may desire; because, if a candidate is not the choice of a majority, he will, of course, be beaten at the polls, and this proviso has no effect on him one way or the other. He is just as sure of being turned out of office without the proviso as with it. It is only the officer whom the people would re-elect, that is to be turned out of office by it. It is as I said before, saying in so many words to the people, that the man whom the majority desire is the man, and the only man for whom you are prohibited to vote.

Sir, if this is not a restriction of the right of suffrage, I am unable to understand the meaning of language, and, if it is, then sir, we shall be false to our pledges to the people if we adopt it; for, upon no other subject, perhaps, has so much been said upon the stump, by delegates during the past summer, as upon the capacity of the people to elect their own officers. And now, sir, when we come to carry out the principles we there advocated, gentlemen shrink back in doubt, and ask, is this safe, can we trust these elections in the hands of the masses without any restraint? Must we not guard the people against themselves. For one, sir, I have no fears on the subject. I have never known an incompetent officer re-elected by the people, but have known such, beaten with a party majority in their favor, and party discipline to sustain them.

The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) to whose remarks I always listen with the greatest deference, has endeavored to show that all Constitutional restraints are but so many curbs upon the will of the masses, and that there is no real difference between restraints upon the power of the executive and legislative departments, and restraint upon the people themselves. The argument was ingenious, but not even the ingenuity of the gentleman can sustain a proposition so obviously wrong. There is, sir, a difference, plain and palpable. To carry on the operations of government, and frame the laws under which the citizens of a State are to live, Legislative bodies are necessary. To restrain the action of those bodies within their proper sphere, the people in their sovereign capacity, embody in a written Constitution, the restrictions necessary and proper for that purpose.

But the case is widely different, when that same people undertake to impose restraints upon themselves.

In the one instance, it is the master dictating to his servants the limits within which they are to act; in the other, it would be that same master imposing shackles upon his own free action.

I will go, as far perhaps, as any other member in tying up the hands of the Legislature; in defining clearly and distinctly, the limits of their power; but, when gentlemen propose to place shackles upon the elective franchise, in the primary elections of the people; to establish a censor over the ballot box; to say, in short, to the masses, those elections which we take from the legislature, we give into your hands, but we cannot wholly trust you; you are so liable to be corrupted by patronage, so easily misled, that you will not change your officers sufficiently often, if we do not force you to do so. I say, sir, when such a principle as this is proposed to be made part of the organic law; I cannot in any shape or form sustain it.

The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) is fond of reasoning from analogy, and has presented us two, as he deems them, analogous cases—one drawn from the stable, the other from the drawing-room.

I must confess his sketch of domestic felicity was happily drawn; it lacked but one feature to make the analogy perfect, and that is, resemblance to the question before us. If the gentleman had carried his picture a little further, if he had told us, that the mother doubting her own stability of purpose in the management of her daughters, had procured the legislature to pass a special law, requiring her at all times, under all circumstances, foreseen or unforeseen, to adhere to the line of conduct she had marked out, then sir, the analogy would have been perfect, and he is welcome to all the force his argument can derive from such an example.

I have before said, that the principle of rotation in office, as a principle for the guidance of political parties, is a good one; and receives almost unanimous assent.

Gentlemen ask, why then not adopt it? In return, I would ask them, why not engraft upon the Constitution all other political maxims which may receive the assent of the majority?

A large majority of this body belong to the democratic party; they would assent to the proposition, that it is desirable that our future governors should be democrats; but is any gentleman prepared to say, that he, would make democracy a constitutional qualification for the office; that he would chalk out a political creed to which every aspirant for office should subscribe. There is no one argument that has been offered on behalf of the proviso under consideration, that would not apply with equal force for the adoption of such a provision.

Let us try it, and see whether I am right or not. First, I will say as the friends of this proviso say of it; that the principles of the democratic party are the true basis of republicanism. Right, says the majority.

Therefore, it is desirable and every way proper that the officers of the State, should be members of that party. All right, again will be responded by the democratic majority.

But the people in their elections do not always follow this rule; they sometimes elect whigs.

Too true, indeed, would be the response.

Therefore, if the principle is a good one—but the people will not always keep it in remembrance—let us by constitutional provision, force them to observe it. There, sir, is the whole strength of the argument in favor of ineligibility on account of previous incumbency, and I ask in all fairness, is it not just as good in the case put by me, as in the one now under consideration.

We are told sir, that when a man once gets into office, it is very difficult to get him out again, that he will use, and use successfully his position and patronage, to secure a re-election.

To get rid of this evil, gentlemen must go one step further; they must say not merely that the Auditor, or other officer shall not be re-elected to the office he held, but they must class him with the felons of the land, and say he shall not be eligible to any office whatever.

Cannot the Treasurer of State, use the same influences to procure his election to the office of Auditor, or Secretary of State, that he would use to secure his re-election as Treasurer, and would they not be as potent in one case as another?

If the people are the unsafe guardians of power, which the arguments of gentlemen assume them to be; if it is really necessary to guard them against their own blindness, let us at least, do it effectually. Let us leave open no avenue through which designing politicians can lead them astray. I think, however, gentlemen would pause long before they would take such a step, though their own arguments lead naturally to its adoption.

Sir, the agitation of this question comes not from the masses of the people themselves. It is not in the nature of man, voluntarily to abridge his own rights and privileges. They do not distrust themselves, nor do the advocates of this measure really distrust them. This question, sir, had its origin among a class of small beer politicians in the State, whose only hope of office, rests upon the exclusion of all better men, by rendering them ineligible; who think if they can only keep the wheel in motion, their turn will surely come after awhile; who expect to get into office as some men get on juries, by hanging around the court-house until the regular pannel is exhausted, and they are taken from necessity, not choice.

Against the proviso in question, as applied to the offices under consideration, and wherever it may be attempted to be made part of the Constitution, and whatever form it may assume, I shall be at all times ready to record my vote.

Mr. WALPOLE. The provision to the section now under consideration, which provides that the Auditor and Treasurer of State shall not serve more than four years in any term of six years, has been violently assailed by the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson,) and others. Various amendments have been proposed, to change its character. Entertaining the views I do, and feeling myself called upon to assign my reasons for sustaining the provision, I shall do so in a few words. Our government, in all its departments, is elective. Elections are the source and fountain of its life—its perpetuity depends upon their purity, and we should guard it with care. The elective franchise is, therefore, the greatest and proudest privilege of the citizen, and I will go as far as any member to protect its purity. But, I ask, how maintain it? It is to be maintained by keeping the ballot box pure from the approach of corrupting influences; and this is to be effected by keeping it free from the patronage which public officers command, and too frequently apply to attain their object. Let not the patronage of office be brought in conflict with the freedom of elections, is my object and desire.

The Auditor and Treasurer of this State have always an immense amount of public funds at their disposal, and thus an immense patronage (if such it may be called) which they may use to perpetuate themselves in office. They have now under their control and management, near a million of dollars of trust funds. These funds are loaned at the discretion of those officers, upon mortgages, with the power to call the fund in or extend the time of payment. They have immense discretionary power over these funds: they are loaned to many hundred citizens of the State, and to such citizens as these officers may select from the thousand applicants that desire accommodations.

And, sir, upon the winding up of our State Bank, there will be near one million more added to the credit of the State, and, no doubt, will be put under the control of these officers, to be managed as other trust funds are managed. To this you may add near three-quarters of a million of dollars every year of State revenue, and, should the system of free banking, as now proposed, (and I have little doubt will be adopted,) which contemplates banking upon U. States and Indiana stocks, and money; all to be deposited with these officers; we may reasonably suppose that there will be five million more. In a word, these officers will, in the form of revenue, trust funds, and bank security, command the management and control of at least from eight to ten millions of dollars, and every year increasing, without check or restraint. And, as you contemplate, by your new Constitution that you will have biennial sessions of the Legislature, the consequence will be the concentration and centering of an immense and irresistible influence and power in their hands—a power I fear too strong for the freedom of elections.

This immense power in the hands of two men bent upon retaining power, would be felt from the centre to the circumference of your State; it would be an element used to continue the dominant party in power, be it either whig or democrat.

It is to guard and protect the elective franchise against temptation to corruption—to maintain the purity of elections that shall govern my vote.

It is provided in that portion of your Constitution which is known as "the bill of rights," that all "elections shall be free and equal." Will your elections be free and equal when a private citizen is opposed by a public officer—an incumbent—backed by the immense treasures and power I have alluded to so imperfectly? No, sir, but to guard against it let us carry out that patriotic declaration that there shall be equality in elections.

I know I am not taxing your credulity too high, when I ask you to credit me in my firm belief, that men may and will use place, and power, as appliances upon the ballot box.

You are familiar with the duties, as well as the powers of your county Auditor's and Treasurer; they act in a circumscribed circle, in comparison with your State officers. Yet their duties are not unlike; they have trust funds at their command, and under their control, but not one hundredth part that your State Auditor and Treasurer manages.

Yet they understand the secret of accommodations. They are not unmindful that money is power, and true to themselves, if not to duty, they never fail to use their position and power, for their self or party advancement. Few, if any instances have occurred of a county Auditor being displaced. If any such instances have occurred, I do not know of them.

I have always thought we have conferred too much discretion on the officers of State and counties over our large trust funds; our system, is a borrowed system; a system concocted by politicians—not statesmen—their purposes not to secure your Treasurers, but to use them for party purposes, persons and party have used, and will continue to use them, as long as money may be found useful in elections.

Our system is called a system for collecting and disbursing the public revenue—while it apparently does this, it is a system to perpetuate power.

Your State Auditor and Treasurer will always be the head of one or the other of the political parties, the county Auditor and Treasurer of their party, and their adjuncts, and the money and trust funds of the people will be used as the bane to the purity of elections.

Then there will be no security against this combination unless you render the head ineligible after the second term, and I fear this will not altogether effect the purpose I hope for.

MONDAY MORNING, Nov. 4, 1850.

The convention met, and was opened by prayer by the Rev. Mr. Babb.—Journal read and approved.—

GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The convention then proceeded under a special order to the consideration of Mr. Pettit's resolution for abolishing the grand jury system:

Mr. WALPOLE rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT, I move the resolution and proposed amendments be committed to a select committee with instructions to report upon the following points: First, are presentments and indictments in judicial proceedings according to the course of common law: Secondly, if so, to abrogate the grand jury system would not the same violate the second article of the compact of the 13th July 1787 which guaranties the benefit of judicial proceedings according to the course of common law, to the inhabitants of this State: Thirdly, is not said compact confirmed by the federal constitution and binding upon the people and the State.

I have no wish, nor shall I at this time debate the policy of the original question.

My purpose is to settle a question which I think, is paramount to that of policy—that is the question of power, in this convention to incorporate a provision abolishing the long and well settled principle of the common law, which requires that no one shall be called to answer to a charge for crime except upon presentment and indictment.

It occurs to me, after reading the compact referred to, that to say the least, that our power is doubtful and deserves the careful examination and deliberation of this body, and so far as I am concerned, I will not as a representative of the people in this body exercise a doubtful authority, nor do I think it the part of wisdom for this body to do otherwise. That the question is encompassed in doubt none will have the temerity to controvert. If, however, the question after receiving that consideration which I think it should command, is settled on the side of power; I and those that think as I do, will feel free to meet the proposition as one exempt from constitutional objection and will then meet it as one purely of expediency.

My motion and the points of inquiry that I have propounded, fully, distinctly indicates the ground of denial to the exercise of the power—but that the convention may better understand me and without at all going into a discussion of the motion I have made, I desire to lay before the convention briefly the hypothesis leaving the conclusion for the committee to report.

The ordinance of the 13th July 1787 as is well known to the members of this convention, was adopted prior to the adoption of the federal constitution; a portion of the ordinance was subject to amendment and repeal, a portion of it however, to employ its own emphatic words, "shall be considered articles of compact between the original states and the people and states in said territory and forever remain unalterable unless by common consent."

The second article of the ordinance, being of that portion of the same which is declared to be a compact, among other wise and patriotic provisions, provides that "judicial proceedings shall be according to the course of common law and that these and other provisions of the compact shall never without the consent of the original states and the people and states of the territory," (meaning the states of the territory north west of the river Ohio.) and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent.

This compact has been confirmed by the federal constitution. If I am not mistaken when I say that the compact is ratified by the federal constitution, then I venture little in hazarding the opinion that the power of this convention over the question is a doubtful power.

If the compact is confirmed by the federal constitution, are we not concluded? The congress of the United States by its act of the 19th April 1816 regarded as a free open question as to validity of the compact upon the original states and the people and the states of the territory, by the act last referred to they authorized the inhabitants of the Indiana territory to form a constitution for a state government, by enjoining that the constitution of the state should not be repugnant to the articles of compact of the 13th July 1787.

The framers of the present constitution regarded the compact as obligatory upon the people and the state and the present constitution embraces every right provided for in that compact. It is worth the few moments' time of gentlemen to read the ordinance, the federal constitution confirming it, the act of congress authorizing the forming of the state constitution, all of which may be found in the volume containing the revised laws of the state for 1843. Without further remarks I will repeat my instructions.

1st Are presentments and indictments in judicial proceedings according to the course of common law? This question all will answer in the affirmative and that they can as common law, emanate from no other power than from a grand jury.

2d If so, to abrogate the grand jury system will it not violate the second article of the compact of the 13th July 1787, as guaranties the benefit of judicial proceedings according to the course of common law, to the inhabitants of this state.

3d Is not said compact confirmed by the federal compact and binding upon the people and the state?

The consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) for the present, was passed by.

Mr. TERRY, of Davis having the floor on the main question proceeded at length in opposition to the original proposition offered by Mr. Pettit. To enable Mr. T. to revise his speech its publication at his request is delayed.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I desire, Mr. President, at this stage of the proceeding to submit a few remarks upon the very grave proposition introduced into this Convention by my friend, the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

For the first time in any American Constitutional Convention, or in any law-making body having power over the subject, in any country of the world where the common law prevails, is it now, and in this body, proposed to abolish the Grand Jury system.

Other parts of the common law, in the progress of opinion, have been changed or modified; other parts have been stricken down and swept away by the tide of improvement. But that principle which requires that no person shall be put upon his trial—shall be held even to answer publicly to an accusation for a capital or otherwise infamous crime—until men of his own vicinage—his neighbors—shall, upon their oaths, declare that the circumstances showing guilt are such that he ought so to answer, has stood as one of the great land-marks in modern free governments. It has become embodied as a principle in the Constitution of the United States, and of nearly every State. Not only do these Constitutions declare that no man shall be convicted of any crime but by a jury of good and lawful men, but in that tender regard for human freedom which constitute their very essence, they declare that no man shall even be put to trial upon a criminal charge without the intervention and sanction of a jury of such men.

Why, sir, in the humane design of the law to throw over every man a broad and impenetrable shield, so that he may by day go abroad without fear of the machinations of private malice or political persecution, and by night lie down in security, what more could it do? Here is a double defence; here is an outer and an inner wall of protection. Not in a single American State have these walls, either the one or the other, been broken down. I venture, sir, not in a country or colony where the common law—our own common law—is known, or where the Anglo-Saxon race dwells. In regard to London, to which reference has been made, an examination of the facts will show that in that great receptacle of crime, where there is constantly a world's convention of rogues, so far as abolished, it has been as to smaller offences, not as to capital crimes, and for the purpose of giving the police magistracy more summary power in such cases.

Not only has the Grand Jury gone with every Anglo-Saxon colony, whether to Australia or to New Zealand, to California or to Minnesota, but it has overcome national prejudice, and by its own intrinsic excellence been introduced into rival systems of jurisprudence. The jury of inquiry—the Grand Jury—was, by the Constitution of 1830, adopted in France as a new bulwark of safety to the French citizen. Strange that while the sons of freedom elsewhere should be struggling for this very institution, we should be here debating whether we shall not give it up!

Mr. President, I pause—I hesitate. I would as soon walk boldly forward, leaning upon the arm of that gentleman (pointing to Mr. Pettit) as upon that of any other in the Convention. No man has a brawnier arm, whether for attack or for defence; no one a bolder heart or steadier step, or a more right onward purpose. I like his company—nay, sir, I like his lead. I shall not, I trust, in our work have occasion to part with him often. Indeed, sir, I know that in my humble way I shall, for the most part, be with him.

But when I am asked to lay the axe to the brave old oak which has so long sheltered a race of freemen, I again say I pause. If it has any growing defect let the proper remedy be applied, but cut it not down, spare it, I pray.

Mr. President, far back in a remote age there originated two legal systems, the one or the other of which, or the two combined, even at this day hold the empire of the whole civilized world. One of these systems is known as the civil law. It had its origin among the Romans, and was perfected at a period of the highest civilization. It descends to us as the offspring of philosophy and science. This system is adopted in its principles and mode of procedure in certain courts of our own country; it is the basis of the judicial policy of all continental Europe, and is recognized and appealed to even in some Mahomedan countries. This system, eminently wise and just, as it is acknowledged to be in all that relates to matters of contract and the mere private relations of men, makes no provision for the security of political rights. It has no juries, it has no habeas corpus, it has no representation of the people in government. Hence it does not, of its own force, carry with it in its progress human freedom. It is not the handmaid of liberty.

There is, sir, another system. It had its rude beginnings in the woods of Germany, among a brave and barbarous race. In its very inception it recognized the agency of the people in the whole business of government, both in the making of the laws and the administering of them. This system, in its great outlines, became part and parcel of the Anglo-Saxon mind. Neither the violent Plantagenets, nor the haughty and imperious Tudors, nor the tyrant Stuarts, could displace or uproot it. Though there are in this system some harsh features, it has, in a wonderful degree, secured the liberties of men; and wherever the common law is found there are found men who claim freedom as the birth-right. Why is it so? The answer is the very first principle in this system is, the people by their representatives make their own laws and tax themselves.

Strange as it may seem, this great fundamental principle of freedom was settled among the Saxons before they left their native forests; they carried it with them into Britain, and there had as their law-making assemblies, their witenagemote, and in later times their parliament. This race of men in all their dispersions claim the right of making the laws for their own government, and yield it to no earthly power. This was the very claim, the denial of which, in its full exercise, produced the American Revolution. This same principle has recently been recognized and re-affirmed in our Congress as a great common law principle, in conceding to the people of California the right to make their own laws and regulate their own institutions, without the intervention of even the General Government.

But by the common law the people are equally a part of the law-administering power. This too, was a principle settled in the very germ of the system. Long before the migration of the Saxons to Britain, Tacitus, in describing their manners in Germany, tells us that one hundred men accompanied the judge in his circuit, to aid him in his deliberations, as well as to assist in carrying his sentence into execution. This was surely rude and clumsy enough, but it shows how early the people constituted a part of the court. In England, among their descendants, the jury brought in the aid of the people in their unofficial capacity, both for accusation and for trial. When it was proposed to subvert this system and introduce the civil law, which acknowledged no such agency, the reply of the sturdy English barons was, we cannot consent that the common law shall be changed. So now, when the same thing is proposed, I hope a like answer will be given by this Convention. For one, I want the people—the unofficial people—to remain as a part of our courts of justice. I will never consent that permanent police officers or magistrates shall take the place of the people themselves, in the maintenance of public order. If I am upon trial, I want my neighbors to try me, and no less, sir, do I want them to say whether I shall even be put upon trial. The Grand Jury I wish to stand between me and the malice of my enemies.

But, sir, there is another view. In this country, the people are for themselves the consensators of quiet and order. In our system, if it is to continue, it must ever be so. A police magistracy to hunt up, or rather to hunt down offenders, and to bring them to trial is, I say it, with all deference, not an American idea. What is the Grand Jury? It is a portion of the people from the body of the county, representing the solid worth of the community, interested in upholding the laws and preserving the peace of society, detailed for the time, to overlook the county, and inquire as to the infraction of the laws. It appears to me, that this is a wise and politic institution, to make society the keeper of its own peace. But why not leave this duty to every man who may see fit to perform it? I answer, according to the homely proverb, what is every body's business is no body's business. Men, and especially the best men, do not choose to step forward as prosecutors on behalf of the public. Ordinarily, they do not do it. For example, gambling is not now an indictable offence in this city. When it was so, I am informed, indictments were frequent. Now there are no prosecutions, though, it is said, the vice has greatly increased. No one chooses to incur the odium, and perhaps the danger, of becoming the prosecutor.

But it is objected that an indictment found against an innocent person, inflicts a lasting and irreparable injury. What is an indictment? It is, I suppose, an accusation drawn up in a formal manner, and prepared by a Grand Jury. But under any system, there must be some process before trial. Before an examination by a magistrate, there must be arrest. In all this proceeding, there is some disgrace. Any charge public or private, inflicts some injury. If it is said of a man, he was indicted for this or that offence, the answer, in case the indictment is not sustained, is, he was found innocent upon trial. Just in the same way, if it is said of a man that he was arrested and carried before a magistrate, it may be answered, if such is the fact, very well, he was discharged. There is humiliation, perhaps some disgrace in either case. But it is incident to any system.

Again, it is urged that the examination before a Grand Jury is ex parte. Let us look at this objection. The Grand Jury decides nothing further than that there are sufficient grounds to put the accused upon his trial. If the person as to whom the inquiry is instituted, is present with his counsel, and the State with its witnesses, why, you have already a trial, when the only question is whether there is need of one, and the party ought not to be tried a second time. I have thought all along, that gentlemen have confounded the question of putting upon trial with trial itself.

But the secrecy of the Grand Jury investigation is another ground of objection. Here again, I repeat, the Grand Jury is not a court of trial. The right of the accused to a speedy and public trial I will never give up. It is a great common law right, founded upon humanity, a right I may remark, but little understood in countries where the common law does not prevail.

But that every preliminary investigation should be public is quite another and a different thing. Mere police inquiries, if public, would, in many cases, be useless. The publicity, would often defeat the very end for which they were instituted. The petit jury has its deliberations in secret, and your supreme judges do not call in the public, when they are settling their decisions. Secrecy, then in itself, is not an evil, even in judicial matters. The Grand Jury sitting as a mere court of inquiry, a police magistracy of the people, look over society and determine what, and how far? Why, that there ought to be a public investigation as to certain offences. Many public accusations they suppress altogether. Many frivolous and ridiculous things they arrest in their inception, and save society from the excitement, the turmoil, and disturbance of a public investigation. They thus throw the mantle over many human errors and frailties, not, in their opinion, amounting to crime, and which no public good requires to be exposed to the popular gaze.

Mr. President, not long since, I read a capital article, taken, I believe, from a London law journal, in favor of abolishing petit juries. It proved, as I thought, that a clever man may make a right good argument in favor of any thing. But seriously, I fear, when the Grand Jury is destroyed as a relic of antiquity, no longer to be tolerated, that the petit jury too may be assailed upon the same ground. As a member of this Convention, neither the one nor the other, constituting as they do, the popular branches in our courts, will I consent to give up. Not only are they tribunals of great value in themselves, but they are beyond estimate in throwing back upon the people the responsibility of maintaining law and order, and in this latter view, the Grand Jury is the more important institution of the two.

Mr. ROBINSON said; Mr. PRESIDENT:—Although I am not in general very sympathetic, yet have this natural peculiarity, that I can never attempt to address a deliberative body without a feeling of embarrassment, and I should not now obtrude myself upon the attention of the Convention did I not feel that on a question of some importance, one that has existed so long, that the memory of man can hardly trace its origin; an institution which has been brought down to us by our forefathers, and adopted by us as one of the guarantees of our rights, was likely to be successfully assailed. I have, also, a further inducement to appear at this time. On a former occasion, I offered a resolution for the adoption of a section into the new Constitution, which, as I believe, embodies everything necessary to give permanency and stability to this institution, and quiet the public mind in regard to it, and I thought I had made a tolerable good speech upon it. But now, after the reading of the learned and classic lecture of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) I find that my ideas are very much obscured. [A laugh]. But I find, also, that many of the positions of the gentleman, humble as are my pretensions, do not come up to my expectations of the man, nor my views of the question.

Mr. President, I never write what I say. I never take notes when I feel called upon to advocate or oppose any measure. But, I propose now, for a few moments, (if I can gain the attention of the body, for nothing can be more embarrassing to me than to address an inattentive audience,) to attempt an examination of this question.

I am satisfied, that when we look at the principle involved in the resolution and instructions of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) in connection with what he read from the Federal Constitution, that we cannot abolish the Grand Jury system, without contravening that instrument. I have yet heard no argument in this body which has, for a moment, convinced my mind, that the powers of the Federal Constitution did not intend to guard our rights for all time, by throwing the Grand Jury between the government and the citizen.

My remarks upon this occasion shall not be, directed to the origin of Grand Juries. The purpose for which they were first constituted has been ably argued on both sides. I shall direct my remarks to the Grand Jury system, as connected with the criminal jurisprudence of our own country. I shall offer nothing with respect to their antiquity, nothing upon the question whence we have derived the system, nor whether it has been used as a support of the demands of the crown, or in defence of the rights of the subject or citizen. And if upon this examination of its connection with the judiciary of our country, we should find it works well, that it is the best method by which we can ferret out and punish crime; if we find the system to be best calculated both for the protection of the rights of the State and the citizen, then I shall be in favor of its continuance.

It is a principle conceded by every well disposed citizen, that it is necessary for every well organized government to be able to detect and punish crime. This is the safeguard of the people. It is the safeguard of the weak against the strong—the protection of the innocent against those who are regardless of their rights. There must be some means by which to point out crime. This is the principle that shall govern my vote, when we shall come to the question whether Grand Juries, as they are now constituted, are not better calculated to subserve the ends of justice than any substitute for them which has been yet proposed.

An objection to Grand Juries has been raised with some degree of force upon this floor, upon the ground of the secrecy of their proceedings. Upon this subject I am prepared to say, with a gentleman who preceded me this morning, that the manner of Grand Jury proceedings in their retirement for these investigations, is one of the chief beauties of the system. What is there in this feature of the system which any honorable man can complain of? The only secrecy which attaches to Grand Jury proceedings is this: when they come in from all parts of the county from which they have been selected—when they have been subjected to challenge, and received the charge of the court—and the moment comes for them to proceed to deliberate upon the rights of the citizens and of the State, they retire from all confusion and everything which could be brought to bear upon them, in the way of misleading their judgment. The fact that they consider of these things in retirement as a body, cannot for a moment constitute an objection that would weigh any thing with me. I believe it constitutes the best guarantee of the rights of the citizen.

But there is another reason why I think that Grand Juries are better calculated to ferret out crime than any system which can be substituted in their stead. When the Grand Juries come together to discharge their high and important duties to the State and to the citizen, they come from every part of the county, and bring with them the knowledge of crime committed in their respective neighborhoods; so that in all the investigations coming before that body, it is at once known something of the nature of every violation of the criminal law which has taken place in the county. They are thus enabled to send for the proper witnesses, and bring every matter fully before them; and they will, also, be able to know, when those witnesses come to testify whether they are merely meddlesome and officious persons, or whether they are reliable, and can be fully depended upon.

There is another advantageous feature connected with these investigations by a Grand Jury, which I believe to be the most important thing connected with our criminal jurisprudence. It is due to the individual—I care not what may be the charge against him—it is his right, before he is arraigned, that the charge should be presented against him in a technical and legal form. It is his right that he should have notice, that he should know what the charge is, and that he should have time to prepare for his defence, and be able to tie down his prosecutor to the charges set forth. The Grand Jury find that such and such facts have transpired within their jurisdiction, and they present these facts to the prosecuting attorney, who draws up the indictment in legal form. The accused, in this way, has ample time to prepare to meet them. It may be six months before the next court, and when he does come to meet these charges, he will find the facts exactly as presented by the Grand Jury, thereby enabling him to make a clear defence, if he is not guilty.

But there is another reason that has brought my mind to the conclusion that I will vote against abolishing the Grand Jury system. I have heard learned arguments upon this question, from old and experienced heads; and I have listened to them with great attention, for the purpose of acting understandingly upon the first vote which we are to give upon the resolution before the Convention. But I have found that, at least in one point, amongst all the advocates for abolishing the Grand Jury system, there has been a grand failure. I take it as a well settled principle in argumentation, that when men of experience and great intellectual acquirements assail any institution, and when they have arrayed and set forth all the defects and deformities of that system—if they are unable to find a substitute for it—if they cannot find anything to present in its stead, which will answer a better purpose, it is a very sure indication that the old institution should be retained. And so it has been with the advocates for abolishing the Grand Jury system. Therefore, I think that the Convention cannot discharge their duties to their constituents without retaining this institution, which has stood so creditably for ages. It has been hinted at, to be sure, that, instead of Grand Juries we should institute public examinations before some one or all of the courts; but most of the advocates of change have seemed to prefer public examinations before a justice of the peace.

Sir, when a Grand Jury comes to the investigation of a charge against a citizen, and find, in their retirement, that they cannot be satisfied with respect to the law in the case, they have a right to come into court and demand at the hand of the judge an exposition of the principle about which they may be in doubt, and the court is bound to give the exposition and instruct them correctly and fully in regard to the law governing the case. But if we should institute public examinations before a justice of the peace—I care not whether the court be composed of but one justice, or whether it be composed of many, congregated in the capacity of a county court—if the case be put by a prosecuting attorney of any skill, in nine cases out of ten, whatever may happen to be the opinion of the attorney, that will be the judgment of such a tribunal. I am willing to give to our justices of the peace all their due, but I am compelled to say, generally, that, with reference to the administration of criminal law, our justices of the peace can have no opinion of their own. Take an important legal question, arising in a case of murder, to be decided by the court—if that case is not decided by the prosecuting attorney, who must, in some sense, be regarded as an interested party, it then comes to be decided by a tribunal who does not understand the question. Cannot gentlemen see any danger in this? Is it of no importance that, in a case where the State of Indiana and the citizen are parties, we should secure a correct administration of justice? Is it of no importance that the law should not have the effect which it is designed to have? I should think that, when such important interests are to be decided upon, they ought to be decided by an impartial and a competent tribunal.

But it has been objected, that one half the indictments by the Grand Juries, are acquitted before a Jury of the country, and I am glad that it is so, if they were acquitted because the charges could not be sustained. It was, however, correctly remarked the other day, by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Taylor), I think that in nine cases out of ten, if every charge could be probed to the bottom, if the Prosecuting Attorneys were capable of ferreting out every crime—a large majority of these cases of acquittal would be found guilty. The fact is, we have need so to change the law as to command the services of efficient Prosecuting Attorneys. Formerly a majority of our Prosecuting Attorney's were capable and efficient officers. But we became so exceedingly Democratic a few years ago, and I amongst the rest, as to make such a change with respect to the compensation of Prosecuting Attorneys, that any man who takes the office now, must necessarily stand at the lower end of the bar. Hence it is, that so many persons indicted by a Grand Jury, are acquitted upon their trial before the court. This, then is not so much the fault of the Grand Jury as of the Prosecuting Attorneys.

But it has been said that it is a disgrace for an individual to be indicted by the Grand Jury. Even if he should be acquitted upon his trial, it operates as a slander upon his character. Let us look a little into this objection, and see whether this hardship could be ameliorated by the change proposed. Suppose, immediately after the adjournment of the court an individual to be arraigned for some offense against the law, before one of those dignified Justices of the Peace: suppose that Justice to set down upon the investigation of a criminal case, surrounded by all the prejudices against his office, on the one hand, and by a mob infuriated against the prisoner, on the other—himself without any knowledge of criminal law, whatever, which might enable him to decide understandingly any question arising in the case, involving the guilt or innocence of the accused, and suppose he tells the man that he is guilty and must give bonds to appear before the court six months hence, or be incarcerated in jail: and suppose the individual goes to jail: and suppose, at last, when his case is presented before a jury, properly informed of the law, that no evidence of guilt should be found against him—would not that be a hardship greater than any which could be charged as the result of the Grand Jury system?

Mr. President, the real complaint against Grand Juries is, not that when a man is indicted for murder, or any of the higher crimes, his trial does not come to a desirable termination: but that their inquiries extended too far into the investigation of petty misdemeanor—that they carried up cases enough to constitute three-fourths of the criminal docket, and this, also, is another cause why so many persons indicted upon the finding of Grand Juries, pass without conviction. But, sir, I will venture to say this, that, if the people of Indiana stood near here—if it were possible for us to hear them speak as one man, upon the question, whether they would entirely abolish the Grand Jury system, and throw the business coming before them, into the hands of Justices of the Peace, it would be found that a large majority were against it.

Under this impression, Mr. President, I have offered my proposition; which is, to take from the Grand Juries their jurisdiction over petty misdemeanors; and you thereby throw these cases before the Justices of the Peace, which, perhaps they have sense enough to manage. Reform your Grand Jury in this way—throw every case of a petty offence before a tribunal where the examination can be open, and the trial had without delay, and you will hear nothing more of the clamor against the Grand Jury system.

Another reason why we should retain this system has addressed itself to my mind with some force. It is, because I see it assailed by certain classes of the community. This fact furnishes a strong argument that the system is a good one. Suppose you were to go into a common doggery—such as there might be found in this and other towns of the State—suppose you were to go to the individual having the establishment under his control, and living upon the miseries of community by vending ardent spirits, and ask him whether he was in favor of Grand Juries. He would answer you in a moment—"Down with them! I do not like their secrecy; and I am opposed to them altogether." But get at the unconcealed meaning of his heart, and it will be found that he is opposed to Grand Juries because he fears the hand of justice; because his occupation has so fallen under the condemnation of public opinion, that, if the Grand Juries are to be continued, his crimes will be faithfully presented and punished. And if you were to meet another class of men which infest every community, more or less—if you were to meet a midnight gambler, the man whose profession is to lead young men into debauchery and ruin—if you were to meet with such a man after a night of debauchery, and ask him the same question, what would be his answer? Why, he would respond in a moment—"Down with the monster! Abolish all Grand Juries; they have secret sessions; they are inquisitorial; I want them abolished." And it will be found that, in place of Grand Juries, he wants the public examination of criminals before some tribunal that has never been overburdened with honesty; he desires himself to go into court, where he may have some assurance of an opportunity to get clear; but, above all things, he desires to keep clear of the Grand Jury, who have taken the oath to indict no man through malice, nor let any escape through fear, favor, or affection. Just so it would be, sir, if you were to go into all the walks of crime. If the man that would go into your stable and take away your horse, and attempt to convert him to his own use; or the man that would put the torch to your house in the night; if a man of this class were to be brought up here, and required to answer the question, whether he was in favor of Grand Juries, his response would be—"No." I tell you, sir, I, for one, have not come up here to legislate for such men as these. I have not come up here to make a Constitution that shall be calculated to screen the guilty culprit from the condemnation of the law.

I say, sir, that these cases which I have supposed, furnish, to my mind, a strong argument for retaining the Grand Jury system; and the truth which they furnish is amply sustained by all my experience, which has been considerable, in defending criminals. This has been a part of my duty for nearly twenty years; and I believe that I never had such a client in my life, who would not declare himself to be against Grand Juries. The fact is, they are the best and the only successful means of ferreting out crime.

Permit me to say, in conclusion, that I shall vote for retaining this system, and also for limiting the jurisdiction of Grand Juries to the hearing of testimony against individuals accused of the most heinous and infamous crimes. Sir, this system is retained in the Constitution of nearly every State in this Union which has been framed since the organization of the federal government; and this is a consideration why I should be unwilling to consent that we should become pioneers in a reform which would put down this system, which has stood for ages, and with which all other law-abiding citizens have been satisfied, down to the present day. This, to my mind, is also a strong argument. But there is yet another argument. It is, because our fathers have thought proper to place this system in our bill of rights, and because I find the same thing fixed in that article of the Constitution of the United States which prescribes that no man shall be put upon trial twice for the same offense.

Mr. KENT (interposing and Mr. R. giving way) said, the original framers of the Constitution did not assert that principle. The gentleman will find that it was supplied amongst the amendments to the Constitution years afterwards.

Mr. ROBINSON (resuming). It was a mere technical correction, sir; I stand corrected, however. I confess that I never was very technical in my notions; but I was right in the main, when I said that this principle came down to us from our fathers; and since it happened to be supplied in the Constitution by way of amendment, it only further sustains my position that the principle is a most important one, because the amendment was called for. After the original Convention had discharged their duty faithfully, as they thought, years afterwards, it was found that they had been remiss in one thing. It was found, upon reviewing the whole ground, that this principle was necessary to protect the rights of the citizen, and therefore it was at length supplied by way of amendment. This was the second sober thought—the second operation of the mind of the philosopher. And for this reason it addresses itself to my mind with double force. This correction, then, only operates as an additional reason why I should feel myself bound to sustain the Grand Jury system.

There is another argument in favor of this system, to which, I believe, I have before alluded. If the honorable gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) who is learned in the law, and every way well qualified to carry forward any system of reform; who is not surpassed in intellect by any member of this body; but, after he has examined this question thoroughly and delivered here an argument against Grand Juries; (which I confess to be of the first class of argument for beauty and strength,) after looking over his printed speech, and reading it upon my pillow, I have sought in vain for an adequate substitute; I have weighed it in the balance and have found it wanting. However willing I am to bow with deference to the decisions of his superior intellect, yet, until he can come here and tell me that he has prepared a substitute which will work better than Grand Juries, both in theory and practice, I must be compelled to part company—though I cannot say this with so many tears as my learned friend, the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read). I tell you, sir, if you heard one part of that learned lecture of my learned friend, you would have thought him to have been almost the wife of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and that a divorce had just been proposed. [Some merriment.] I believe it is a custom which prevails in most deliberative bodies, that the gentleman submitting the proposition under discussion has the right to close the argument. I suppose, therefore, and agreeably to his own announcement, I believe, that the gentleman from Tippecanoe will be heard again. I want to say to him, therefore, that I desire him to bring forward some practical substitute for the system which he proposes to abolish. I want him to make it clear, that if his substitute should be made a part of the organic law, it will be without exception. But I must be permitted now, with due respect to that gentleman, to say one thing: that you may take that gentleman, with all the stores of information he has been able to treasure up, and place him in the midst of all the books he may desire, and then allow him to labor until he shall become as blind as an owl at noon-day, and after all this, it is my confident belief that he would not be able to produce a better scheme for the administration of our criminal law than the Grand Jury system; and until he does this, I shall be under the necessity of casting my vote against his resolution.

I have now to say to the Convention, that I am satisfied myself, and thoroughly settled in my judgment upon this question. I claim to be able to form my own opinions, and to act upon them. So long, therefore, as gentlemen fail to produce an adequate substitute for this system, I cannot go with them. I am unwilling to launch upon an unknown sea. Let us have some port—let us know where we are to land—in what harbor we are to anchor, before we embark. But I don't believe my objections can be satisfactorily answered. I don't believe that facts can be produced which will furnish the argument that will sustain the resolution. I do not believe that the brain of man can furnish them. Gentlemen may propose their opinions, they may recommend an experiment; but it will be all opinion and experiment, and nothing else. I am not willing to cut loose from the good old land marks, until the matter shall be settled that I can do so without injury and loss. I am not wedded to the Grand Jury system any further than as it is connected with the administration of justice, in detecting and ferreting out the evidence of crime. I am unwilling to let go this safeguard of the citizen. I must adhere to the old system, although it may be said that I am behind the times, and have no idea how far we have progressed in this progressive age. I must remain unwilling to let go this strong old safeguard of the community until gentlemen shall be prepared to submit a better system, and demonstrate that it will act equally upon the rights of all. I care not what origin the proposition may have. I shall never inquire whether the measure originated with Whig or Democrat. I despise all party names and designations here. I have brought none of them here with me. True, I have been, perhaps, a tolerably mild Whig; and when the principles of that party have been at stake, I have done battle for them. But when I left home for the duties of this hall, I put off that harness; I came here as a delegate—not as a partizan. I have cast no partizan vote here. I came here to help to make a Constitution worthy of being handed down to posterity; and when the day comes that this body shall be dissolved, and we shall return to the people, I hope to find my own harness in order, and, if necessary, to do battle with it as heretofore.

Mr. OWEN. I have but a few remarks to make, and they do not have special relation to the expediency or in expediency of abolishing the Grand Jury system. What the Convention is considering, or ought to be considering at this time, is, not that question, but the resolution moved by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) proposing that the whole subject be referred to a select committee with instructions. The instructions are, in substance, to inquire into the right of the Convention to decide this question at all; to inquire whether, if it should be our judgment that it is best for us to have no Grand Juries, we have the power to abolish them; or whether we are not estopped from doing so by considerations of honesty and good faith.

Mr. WALPOLE interposing, and Mr. O. giving way, said, I propose to correct the gentleman. The proposition which I presented intimates, not what the gentleman rehearsed for the second point in the instructions, but merely an inquiry into the fact, whether the second article of the compact of the 13th of July, 1787, between the State of Virginia and the government of the United States, does not confer upon the people of Indiana the benefit of judicial proceedings, according to the course of common law. The third point of my proposition suggests an inquiry whether this compact was not confirmed and ratified by the federal Constitution, and binding upon the people of this State.

Mr. OWEN. In reply to the gentleman, Mr. President, I read from the second article of the ordinance of 1787, the same to which he has referred:

"ART. 2. The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law."

If I have incorrectly understood the position of the gentleman from Hancock, I hope he will now correct me. I understand him, in the first place, to infer that, under the term "judicial proceedings," here employed, the institution of the Grand Jury is included; and that, as, in what must be regarded as a compact between Virginia on the one part, and the States to be formed out of the north-west territory and the original States of the Union on the other, it is declared that the people of that territory shall "always be entitled" to these judicial proceedings, it follows, that we of Indiana have no right, without the consent of Virginia, to abolish the Grand Jury system. Is not that his position?

Mr. WALPOLE. Yes, sir, that is my position.

Mr. OWEN. A strange doctrine, surely, to promulgate, at this day! I express, at the present time, no opinion as to the expediency of abolishing or of retaining the Grand Jury system. But, suppose that a majority of this Convention decide on its abolition. What is the remedy for this infraction, as the gentleman from Hancock holds it to be, of the compact? A protest addressed by the Governor of Virginia, to our Governor? A remonstrance, adopted by a Virginia legislature, that the Constitutional Convention of Indiana has transcended its powers? That will not do, certainly! I have always believed, as I now believe, that I live in a sovereign State, and that no other state or nation on the habitable globe has the right to control, or to dictate, in any particular whatever, what shall be the form of our State government, or what the minutest of its details. There are, doubtless, in connection with the compact referred to; namely, in the previous act of session by Virginia, certain conditions of a temporary character; as that "the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into states, containing suitable extent of territory." Again, "that the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by this State (Virginia) in subduing any British hosts, or maintaining forts, shall be reimbursed by the United States." That certain lands should be granted to General George Rogers Clarke, and so on. These conditions have been faithfully fulfilled, as it was right and proper they should be. But because of that, are we to infer that Virginia is also to exercise over the judicial system we may see fit to adopt and to modify, a supervisory control? And is this control to endure not for the present only—not through the generation that now lives alone, but throughout the lives of our children and our children's children, even to all succeeding generations? Nothing is farther from our hearts; nothing more repugnant to our feelings; nothing more flagrantly in violation of every right we hold dear. And nothing, I will add, more impossible to be carried out. This Convention itself, with all the power delegated to it by the people of Indiana, cannot do what the gentleman claims that Virginia has the right to perform. This Convention has no power to declare that the Grand Jury system, or any other provision in any department whatever of our State government, shall last forever. It can but decree its existence or non-existence, while the Constitution continues in force.

There is, in our present Constitution, a provision which occurs to me in this connection. I read it, from the close of the eighth article: "But as the holding of any part of the human creation in slavery or involuntary servitude can only originate in usurpation and tyranny, no alteration of this Constitution shall ever take place, so as to introduce slavery or involuntary servitude in this State, other than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

As an expression of opinion strongly, solemnly set forth by the framers of our State Constitution, that slavery is a terrible evil, unjust in itself, and fatal in its consequences, and that it ought never to be suffered to blight the free soil of Indiana, I receive, and from the bottom of my soul I respect, the clause I have just quoted. As a Constitutional provision binding through all time, it is not worth the paper it is written on!

I seldom refuse to vote for such a request as this by the gentleman from Hancock, for a reference to a committee of inquiry. Yet, very surely, I have made up my mind on the subject. And, as surely, I think, has the Convention done so, in advance of all such reference. I cannot but think—and I know the gentleman will believe me when I say, that I make the suggestions in no offensive spirit—I cannot but think that when the gentleman calmly reviews his position and the consequences to which it inevitably conducts, he will not press his motion for a select committee.

Mr. WALPOLE. I wish the gentlemen would argue the point involved in this matter, now.

Mr. OWEN. I have said all that I deem necessary upon the subject.

Mr. KENT said—

Mr. PRESIDENT; It will be recollected by the Convention, that the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, have reported a section virtually abolishing the Grand Jury system. When we reach that section by the regular order of business, the whole question will again come up for discussion. Now, if we desire to avoid duplicating this discussion, would it not be advisable to postpone the further consideration of the subject, until we reach it by the order of business adopted by the Convention. Believing this course will save time, I move to lay the resolution and pending amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution and accompanying amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. HALL. I ask that the order of business be suspended, in order to give me an opportunity to introduce a resolution. I will read the resolution for information and that the Convention may see my object in asking a suspension of the rules.

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday of this week this Convention will resume the holding of afternoon sessions.

I think, sir, that the time has now arrived when we should resume our afternoon sessions; the committees have, perhaps, had ample time to prepare their reports, and we can now spend more time in regular session without prejudicing the public interest.

The order of business was suspended.

Mr. HALL introduced his resolution, and remarked that he would be glad to have the day fixed so as to suit the Convention, if the day he had named was not acceptable.

Mr. PETTIT proposed that afternoon sessions should be resumed on Monday next, one week from this day.

Mr. HALL remarked that, under the rules he supposed his resolution, being an imperative one, would lie over one day.

Mr. WOLFE. I do not see the necessity of that.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman will turn to the rules adopted by the Convention, he will find that any resolution proposing to change the rules or the order of business, must lie over one day.

Mr. WOLFE. I think every member is satisfied with the resolution, and desires its adoption. It is high time that the Convention resumed afternoon sessions. The reports are nearly all prepared, and we shall get along just twice as fast after the adoption of this resolution. I would move a suspension of the rules that it may be adopted now.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Convention proceeded to the order of the day, being the consideration of article number one.

Mr. BORDEN. Would it be in order to propose a new section to this article?

The PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. BORDEN. In order that the time of the Convention may not be consumed unnecessarily, I would inquire of the gentleman from Clarke, if the committee of which he is a member has had under consideration the subject of the election of a State Printer and a Warden of the State Penitentiary? If the committee have the subject already under consideration, I will not take up time by offering the section I have drawn up.

A MEMBER. The committee are preparing to report upon that subject.

Mr. BORDEN then declined offering his amendment.

The article was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote taken on Thursday last upon the section relative to the tenure of office of the State Auditor and State Treasurer. I wish to get a reconsideration of the vote whereby the word "two" was stricken out and the word "four" was substituted, making the term of office four years instead of two, as reported by the committee.

Mr. BORDEN was understood to remark that by unanimous consent the vote upon reconsideration might be taken now.

Mr. CHANDLER then gave notice that on to-morrow he should move a reconsideration of the vote above mentioned.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to re-commit the article, with instructions to the committee to report a section fixing the terms of Auditor, Treasurer, and Secretary of State, at two years, and rendering them ineligible more than six years in any period of eight years.

Mr. WOLFE moved to lay the motion to re-commit, upon the table until the vote upon reconsideration was taken,

Which motion was agreed to.

The Convention then took up the report of Mr. OWEN from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State.

The first section was read, and is as follows:

There shall not be imprisonment for debt except in case of strong presumption of fraud.

Mr. ROBINSON offered the following amendment:

Strike out after the words "except in case of" the words "strong presumption of," and insert after the word "fraud," the words "to be proven by the party alleging the same."

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not intend to make a speech at this time, but I desire to state my objections to the section as it now stands. Under its provisions a citizen of Indiana may be imprisoned for debt. It is consistent with our views of government that imprisonment for debt should be regarded as of barbarous origin. But the language of this section is too general in its character. The word "presumption" is a very general and comprehensive one; it is not precise and definite in its meaning. It is a word that will be differently understood and defined by different men. What would furnish a case for the presumption of fraud with one man would not satisfy another man. You leave the citizen liable to be imprisoned upon the bare "presumption" of fraud, and that word to be construed, perhaps, by an incompetent tribunal. It seems to me that the most pernicious and unlooked for results would follow the engraving of this section, in its present form, in the new Constitution. But if we adopt my amendment, it renders the matter certain; it leaves no room for mistakes as to whether the presumption of fraud is strong enough to warrant imprisonment. The party that seeks to have another incarcerated, will be compelled to show a sufficient cause to warrant imprisonment. Fraud will be that sufficient cause.

It is an old doctrine, that wherever a debtor has attempted to defraud his creditor a summary procedure should be given to the creditor. But the crime—for it amounts to that—of fraud should be clearly proven. A man that asks that his fellow citizen should be committed to prison, should first prove a fraud. The term which I have used is, therefore, more certain and specific. Fraud can be proven, and there is not that latitude and opportunity given to do wrong, and through malice of the accusing party or ignorance of the tribunal, injure the citizen. I think it is going far enough to imprison for debt when there is clear evidence of fraud. I believe that it is a settled principle in legal jurisprudence that when fraud is alleged the burthen of proof rests upon the prosecuting party. My amendment is right, because it prevents uncertainty, and no citizen can be imprisoned until a clear case of fraud is made out.

Mr. DOBSON. I would propose the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson).

Strike out all after the word debt, so that the section would read simply "There shall be no imprisonment for debt."

Just one word, Mr. President, in regard to—

The PRESIDENT. Unless the gentleman from Decatur accepts the substitute for his amendment, the proposition of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) cannot be entertained.

Mr. DOBSON. Can it not be entertained as an amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It cannot, because it destroys that which it proposes to amend. It cannot be entertained until after the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Decatur has been disposed of.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope that the gentleman from Decatur will accept my substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot accept it; I am opposed to it because it fails to secure a principle which I wish to see incorporated in the new Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON. Then I hope the Convention will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur, and then my proposition will be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I really hope the Convention will not vote down my amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the gentleman's amendment will not prevail, and then, that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) will be adopted. The clause, then, will simply prohibit imprisonment for debt. There ought to be no imprisonment for debt. The imprisonment should be for fraud. I think fraud may be separated in idea from debt. We attach to the idea of imprisonment, that it is a penalty inflicted for the punishment of crime. We punish the fraud, and whether proven by the party defrauded, or others, is equally deserving of punishment. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur, it would only limit the proof of the fraud to the creditor.

Mr. BIDDLE. Is the motion of the gentleman from Decatur divisible?

The PRESIDENT was understood to say that it was not.

Mr. BIDDLE. I know it is not divisible, where the motion is to strike out and insert, but this motion is to strike out and add other words at the end of the section. I would vote, with the gentleman from Decatur, to strike out the words he proposes to, but I should not vote for his addition. And my reason is this: The principle is well settled that the person alleging an affirmative must prove it, and therefore his addition is surplusage. The bare fact that the creditor charged fraud would place him in a position where he must prove it, without any constitutional affirmation of his obligation to do so.

I concur with the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) in his dislike of the use of the word "presumption" in this connection. We all know that men would differ very widely as to what should constitute a sufficient evidence for a "strong presumption" of fraud. I should require the person alleging to prove the fraud. By the common law he must do that.

Mr. HOWE offered the following amendment:

Strike out the words "strong presumption of," so that the section would read, "There shall not be imprisonment for debt except in case of fraud."

Mr. ROBINSON. Having offered the amendment now before the Convention, and believing it to be right, I desire to say a few words in explanation.

It is known to every legal gentleman that my objection to the use of the word "presumption," in this connection, is a good one. It is too uncertain, and capable of different constructions by different minds. It will be conceded that the word "fraud" is very closely assimilated to the term "crime;" every legal gentleman knows this. In many instances fraud itself becomes criminal. Now, sir, criminal proceedings, as the courts now administer the law, compel the crime charged to be proven strictly. There is but little difference between a crime charged directly and the charge of a criminal act. A crime may be presumed from strong circumstantial evidence, but my objection to the word presumption is, that this question (involved by the Constitutional provision that there shall be no imprisonment for debt except in case of strong presumption of fraud) will very often, indeed in most cases, have to be submitted to the inferior tribunals of the country. Now, I am frank to say, that if I was assured that this question was always to be submitted within the jurisdiction of the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) I should have no fear of a correct decision, because his court is a forum capable of deciding all such questions accurately. But, then, it will very often be the case, that an important matter will be submitted to the inferior, though honest, tribunals of the State. My object, then, in moving to strike out the word "presumption," is, that it will necessarily come before those tribunals unaccustomed to the strict construction of language which is supposed by the framers of this section. Of course those who take a different view—who do not apprehend the dangers which I see—will vote against my proposition. I am inclined to think that the word "fraud" is not a necessary part of the section. As I before intimated, if the gentleman from Cass was to preside in all the courts where this question will come up, he would require the charge of fraud to be strictly proven without my amendment being there; but when the question is referred to other and less competent tribunals, I wish so to guard it, that they will not commit a man for fraud until it is proven. My object is to guard the citizen against encroachments upon his rights, either through design or ignorance.

Mr. DOBSON. I know, Mr. President, that my proposition is out of order, but I wish to make a plain and distinct statement of this matter of imprisonment for debt. I am wholly and decidedly opposed to imprisonment for debt. I will not argue the point any further than to say, that when we give the Legislature power to pass laws to punish the commission of fraud in a proper manner, we have given them latitude sufficient. But so far as imprisonment for debt is concerned, I want it distinctly provided against in the Constitution. There is not a man to be found in Indiana who will openly advocate imprisonment for debt. That clause should have been stricken out long since. When you punish a man, let it be for a proven fraud, never because he cannot pay his debts; make these things separate; do not confuse and mix up imprisonment for debt with imprisonment for fraud. When you arrest a man under the provisions of that section, as amended by the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) which do you send him to jail for, the fraud or his poverty? Recognize fraud as one thing and debt as another. Just say in so many words, "There shall be no imprisonment for debt." I will go with the gentleman to imprisonment for fraud; but never grant the power to a creditor to put his debtor in prison on a charge of fraud, but really because he is poor.

Mr. President, it is for such reasons that I say I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur will be voted down; then mine will be in order, and I believe it will so commend itself to the judgment of the Convention that it will be adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise, sir, to keep the floor but for a moment, and to say that the position of the gentleman from Owen meets with my hearty approbation.

I say to the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) that if we cannot succeed in voting down his amendment, and then adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) I should then rather vote for his amendment than the section as it now stands. I want to put under and abolish at once and forever, all imprisonment for debt.

In my own estimation, although "the books" do not recognize fraud as a crime of the grossest dye, yet the courts go a great ways to blacken and blast a man's character that has committed a gross fraud. A poor man, who is charged by his creditor with a fraud for the sake of getting him in prison, may never regain his position in society. I shall, therefore, in order to make the section short, vote to leave it thus: "There shall be no imprisonment for debt." In order to do this, we have first to vote down the original amendment of the gentleman from Decatur. But I say to the friends of that amendment, if it has any, that I will help them to amend the section rather than leave it as it now is. But inasmuch as the proposition of the gentleman from Owen is, in my judgment, still better, I will first try to get that. It is making it a plain, unambiguous and unequivocal matter, so that there can be no mistake as to its meaning. I think that those who have known me through life, will bear me out in saying that all my actions warrant me in declaring that such is my character. I wish to do things openly, and to meet everything in the same open and candid manner. As the boy said, "I want to take the bull by the horns and push him off the bridge, or have him push me off." [Laughter.] If I must take medicine, give it to me in all its strength and naked bitterness; don't coat it over with molasses. [Renewed laughter.] I want no covert action in anything.

Inasmuch as this section leaves it open as to how much evidence shall create a "strong presumption of fraud," I am opposed to it; I want the section to read, "there shall be no imprisonment for debt." Therefore, I shall vote against the pending amendment, in order that the gentleman from Owen may present his proposition, which I wish to see adopted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have considered the matter since, as one of the members of the committee who reported this section, I presented it, and I agree with the gentleman from Owen.

Debt, is a misfortune—fraud is crime. I think that the distinction between misfortune and crime should be plainly and unmistakably made. If we strike out the words proposed, we can provide in another place for the punishment of fraud. I would prefer to take merely the first clause of the section—"there shall not be imprisonment for debt." I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur will be voted down. If not, I would suggest to him that he will attain his object by striking out the part he proposes to, without insisting upon the addition he proposes.

Mr. EDMONSTON. For the purpose of getting a direct vote upon the question, I ask for a division of the question; the first question being then upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. PETTIT. No; that would leave the words, "except in case of fraud," in the section. Better move to lay the original amendment on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman from Dubois withdraw his amendment for one moment?

Mr. EDMONSTON. Certainly, if it will oblige the gentleman from Decatur.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to—

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention give the gentleman from Decatur leave to speak again—he having spoken twice upon this subject?

SEVERAL VOICES. Yes, if he will be brief.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will endeavor to be very brief.

As a legislator, I am always willing to concede a good deal for the sake of gaining the main object; and if it was only necessary for me to support my amendment for the sake of securing my personal position, and if the substitute proposed accomplished my object, I should not insist upon my amendment for an instant. But, sir, my main object is not to abolish all imprisonment for debt; it is not to secure a constitutional provision that the creditor shall never, under any circumstances, imprison his debtor. There are circumstances connected with the collection of debts when the debtor should be imprisoned—I mean when there is evidence of fraud. If the Convention votes down my amendment, as the gentleman from Owen proposes and asks to be done, and you abolish imprisonment for debt under any circumstances, and, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) proposes, punish fraud as a separate and distinct matter, what will be the result? Let me ask that gentleman: suppose he arrests a man, A. B., that justly owes C. D., he is arrested not for fraud in not paying his debts, although you may have sufficient evidence that he has property and money, because there is a constitutional provision forbidding any imprisonment for debt under any circumstances, but you arrest him for fraud. I ask, what good will it do C. D. that A. B. is imprisoned or even convicted of fraud? Of what advantage or even help is it in the main object, the securing of C. D.'s lawful claim? The man may be arrested and convicted of fraud, the State may be satisfied, the vindictive portion of the laws may be appeased, but where is the collection of the debt? What has become of the main point? The creditor is neither gratified nor benefitted by the imprisonment and suffering of, as may be the case, his rich debtor. He demands and desires to enforce the collection of his debt, not the punishment of the debtor, farther than assists in that collection. I am not one of those who believe that a man should be allowed to go abroad and cheat whom he pleases and where he pleases with impunity. I desire to provide that he may be summarily dealt with in extreme cases. Strike out of the section the word, "presumption," then, and the practice under the provision would be, that no man could be imprisoned for debt in Indiana without it was proven that he had committed a fraud. Now, if you arrest a man for debt, the Legislature, in the absence of an express constitutional provision to the contrary, will always furnish some stringent enactment by which a man can be arrested for debt, and, if fraud is proven, imprisoned. It is often important to inquire, in connection with the recovery of debt, into the question of fraud. If fraud is proven, the debtor should go to jail until he reveals the secretion of property or suffers for the violation of law. If fraud is proven, but the possession of property at the time of arrest is not clearly proven, then he should be imprisoned until he shows his inability to pay the debt. Then, in order to secure the rights of the creditor and the prosperity of society, strong measures are necessary, and these the Legislature will always enact in the absence of a constitutional prohibition. What do I propose? Nothing more than this, and I think that this Convention is not in favor of cutting loose all hands in regard to this matter, and allow men to cheat and impose on the community without let or hindrance. You indict me, as a debtor having property which I will not disclose, for fraud, but what becomes of the debt while you prosecute against me a criminal action? The debtor has made the speculation, he has got the money, but you cannot connect a criminal with a civil action (under the operation of this constitutional prohibition) together. The jury will not convict for fraud and render judgment for the amount of the debt.

One moment's reflection will show to every member that I have proposed the only tangible remedy. You arrest a man for debt and allege fraud; the State punishes the fraud, and you, if the debtor has property, secure your debt. But with the section as it is, is a simple allegation of fraud, to be tried by every inferior tribuna in the country. It should be proven by the party alleging. I am not willing to take from the creditor the right to collect his debts by extreme process, by the aid of imprisonment, if he clearly proves a fraud. I will not give a fraudulent debtor an opportunity to escape with impunity, by merely requiring that there shall be strong presumption of fraud to imprison him, leaving it to the judgment of inferior and inexperienced tribunals to judge of what constitutes a "strong presumption."

Mr. President, in conclusion I must say that I shall insist upon my amendment, for the reasons I have given. If I am fairly voted down, I shall submit without a feeling that I have been in the least uncourtously treated. But, I cannot, consistent with my view of duty, and my belief in its policy, withdraw my motion. I now submit it to the sound sense of the Convention, if I am wrong, as I before said, I shall not construe it as a mark of disrespect if I am voted down.

Mr. HOWE. I wish very briefly to make a statement of the present position of this matter, and the effect of the vote that is about to be given.

If the Convention votes to strike out all after the word "debt," an effect may be produced not clearly foreseen by members. The question is, whether we will, by a Constitutional provision, take away all remedy against fraudulent debtors, as we shall by voting down the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur, and then agreeing to the motion, or rather adopting the substitute of the gentleman from Owen. The original amendment (Mr. Robinson's) proposes that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of debt coupled with fraud; therefore, if that amendment be voted down, and the substitute (Mr. Dobson's) adopted, the effect will be to abolish all remedy against fraudulent debtors in any case.

Mr. PETTIT. Punish the man separately for fraud.

Mr. HOWE. The gentleman says, "punish them separately for fraud;" but how punish them? Will you reach him with a capias, or in a civil case? I cannot go so far, nor will this Convention, when it comes clearly to understand the matter. I repeat it, so that there may be no misunderstanding when the vote is taken—the effect of the adoption of that substitute will be to abolish, in civil cases, all remedy against fraudulent debtors. I think that my amendment expresses the view that the Convention will finally take of the matter, and that it gives us as good language as we can have in this case, for, in this Constitution, as in the drawing up of statutes, the object is to use the fewest words consistent with a clear expression of meaning. If the words, "no imprisonment for debt except for fraud," give us all that we want, if they fully express our meaning, then the addition of more words would be a mere surplusage.

Mr. BARBOUR. If I understand the gentlemen from Tippecanoe and Owen, they are not willing that there should be imprisonment for debt under any circumstances.

Mr. PETTIT. That is most certainly my desire.

Mr. DOBSON. The gentleman has correctly stated my position, as opposed to all imprisonment for debt.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. PRESIDENT: I am not a little surprised to hear so many members oppose imprisonment for debt, in all cases whatsoever. I can assure gentlemen that those sentiments are not the sentiments prevalent among the people. Can it be possible, sir, that it is proposed that the person who has in his possession your money, and, because you cannot reach it by a common execution, that you shall not have the aid of the strong arm of the law to reach it, and recover your just debt? Before you can imprison the body of the debtor, you must establish before a jury, that he has money or means with which he could discharge your debt, and that he keeps the same concealed, with intent to defraud you. Fraud is now punished as a crime, yet this is no remedy for the creditor against a fraudulent debtor. And, if you should attempt the prosecution of the fraudulent debtor criminally, he might possibly slip through the fingers of your justice of the peace. Although it might blacken the character of a man convicted of fraud in a court of justice, yet the moral sense of the community would not be very highly shocked at the injury or justice done such an individual. If a debtor is really guilty of fraud in concealing his means and refusing to pay his honest debts, what wrong or injury is done in compelling him to disclose and deliver up his concealed wealth. It is no satisfaction to the creditor to prosecute his debtor criminally. He wants his money, and it is right he should have it, and the law should aid him when the debtor has the means, but fraudulently conceals the same.

Mr. HENDRICKS said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: The reason of the law authorizing the imprisonment of the debtor, in any case, seems to be misconceived. In no case is a man, under our laws, imprisoned because he is poor—because he is in debt. Nor is it the object of the law, to gratify any bad feelings of a hard creditor, by allowing him to arrest and throw into prison an unfortunate debtor, who may be unable to discharge the debt; to give the creditor the control of the person of his debtor, to detain in prison, in satisfaction of the debt.

Such seems once to have been the object of the law in England, as we gather from the language of the writ of execution against the person; when all process was in the Latin language, and which has now become the name of that writ; "capias ad satisfaciendum."

Nor, sir, is it the object of the law, in allowing process against the person, in a civil cause, to punish the debtor for any fraud he may have committed.

For neither of the purposes which I have mentioned, should there ever be imprisonment in a civil suit.

The true object of the law in giving process against the person, is to compel the fraudulent debtor to make satisfaction to his creditor, when he has the ability to do so, to force him to surrender any means which he may fraudulently conceal, or withhold from the payment of his debt. If the proposition of the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) shall be voted down, I have an amendment to the section which I will present. For the information of the Convention, I will read it. "There shall be no imprisonment for debt after the debtor shall have delivered up his estate for the benefit of his creditor or creditors, in such manner, and to such extent, as shall be prescribed by law."

This, sir, will attain the object, and the only legitimate object of imprisonment in a civil cause.

As it is now the hour of adjournment, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Which motion was agreed to, and the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the delegate from Lake (Mr. CRUMBACKER).

The journal of Monday was read and approved.

BANKS.

Mr. HAMILTON presented a report from the committee on currency and banking.

The report having been read,

Mr. HAMILTON remarked, that it might be proper for him to state to the Convention, that, when the article which had just been read was first presented to the committee, he did not entirely approve of it, nor did a majority of the committee. It is, however, said Mr. C., submitted in the belief that it will more nearly meet with the approbation of the Convention than any other proposition which could be agreed upon by a majority of the committee. At the proper time, I shall move to make some amendments, and among them, one for the taxation of Bank stock.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Mr. President, I wish to inquire, through you, whether there is not another section that was agreed upon by a majority of this committee?

Mr. HAMILTON. It is true; I had intended to present it first, but it escaped my notice. I will present it now.

The report was read.

Mr. WATTS. I wish to disclaim all connection with the report made by the minority of this committee, and also with the majority report. I could indorse neither.

Mr. RARIDEN. I move that the reports be laid on the table and printed. I should like to have the rules suspended, in order to ask a reference of the reports to a committee of the whole, and have them made the special order.

Mr. COLFAX rose and said, that he wished to state—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from St. Joseph and others, that debate at this stage of proceedings is out of order.

Mr. COLFAX. I hope I shall be indulged in making a single remark. For some time it was extremely doubtful whether any proposition at all could be agreed upon by a majority of this committee, and whether all the reports would not be minority reports.

The PRESIDENT then put the question, whether the Convention would receive as many minority reports as might be made from the committee on Banking and currency.

The Convention decided to receive all that should be offered; whereupon several minority reports were presented from the same committee.

The Convention then proceeded to the orders of the day, and, on motion by Mr. BASCOM, took up article number one.

Mr. CHANDLER. Pursuant to previous notice, I now move a reconsideration of the vote previously taken upon the first section of this article. I will read the article and state the effect of the vote taken:

"SEC. —. A Secretary of State shall be chosen by the qualified electors, and be commissioned by the Governor for two years, or until a new Secretary be elected and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Secretary of State more than four years in any term of six years. He shall keep a fair register, and attest all the official acts and proceedings of the Governor, and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes, and vouchers relative thereto, before either House of the General Assembly; and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined upon him by law."

The vote taken on Thursday last was to strike out the word "two," where it occurs in the first sentence of the section, and insert "four." I move a reconsideration of that vote.

The question being put,

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention reconsidered the vote.

The question then being upon the motion to strike out the word "two" and insert the word

"four," where it occurs in the first sentence of the article, the same was disagreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON gave notice that he should move a reconsideration of the vote by which the word "six" was stricken out of the same article, where it occurs, and the word "eight" inserted.

The PRESIDENT. The pending motion is to re-commit the article to the committee on State officers, other than the executive and judiciary, with instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that the vote on the motion of the delegate from Brown (Mr. Chandler) to reconsider, placed the article in the same position in which it came from the committee.

The PRESIDENT. But one amendment was reconsidered by that vote.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I desire, Mr. President, to explain my motion to re-commit. The only respect in which my motion differs from the article as originally reported from the committee is in providing that the State officers named in the article may be eligible to an election for three terms of two years each, instead of two terms. It instructs the committee to adopt the two years term principle in respect to the Secretary, Auditor, and Treasurer of State. If this proposition should meet the views of a majority of the Convention, it can be most readily accomplished by a re-committal. I offer the proposition in a spirit of compromise, inasmuch as there appears to be a great diversity of opinion on the subject, and not much prospect of agreeing to a plan without some compromise. Some gentlemen are of opinion that these officers should be elected for one term of four years and be ineligible; some are in favor of fixing the term at four years, with the right to be re-elected as often as the people choose to vote for them; others are in favor of terms of two years, to be ineligible after four years; and still another class are in favor of the two years terms and to be re-eligible without any limitation. I think, sir, that my proposition offers a medium ground upon which a majority might place themselves. Limit the term to two years, and leave the power with the people to continue the incumbent three terms, if, in their judgment, it be proper to do so. This is nearly in accordance with my own views, and I have thought it possible that the Convention might adopt it as a compromise.

Mr. President, while I am on the floor permit me to say that I know from experience that the office of Auditor of State is one, the duties of which are laborious, responsible, and important, and the qualifications for which do not seem to be fully appreciated. I assure gentlemen that they are mistaken when they suppose that any citizen can go into that office and perform its duties intelligently without any previous training or experience. You may place any man there, I care not how great his ability and talents may be in other respects, and if he has had no experience in the duties of that office, he will feel like a stranger, and stand greatly in need of the aid which may be afforded by some one conversant with its complicated duties. A man of the most ready mind and penetrating intellect will continue to learn something in the Auditor's office for many years, and I think the people should be left free to continue the same individual as long as my amendment proposes, if he be found honest, capable, and obliging. It will be observed that my proposition by no means requires an individual to be kept in either of the offices for six years. It proposes only to leave with the people the unrestricted right to re-elect him for three terms of two years each if they are satisfied the public interest will be promoted by such re-election. I have voted uniformly for short terms, and will continue to do so, believing, as I do, that power should be frequently returned to the people as its legitimate source.

I offered the proposition, as I before remarked, with the hope that it might harmonize the views of a majority of the Convention. It is similar to the original report of the committee, except that it is a little less restrictive upon the power of the people. It avoids both extremes as to the tenure of office. I may be allowed to say that I advocated a plan like this before the people in the canvass preceding the election of delegates, and I believe the people whom I in part represent concur very nearly with me on this subject.

Mr. NILES. Mr. President, if I understand the gentleman's proposition, it would be more objectionable to me than the proviso originally reported by the committee. If I fixed a limit at all upon the right of the people to elect whomsoever they please to these offices, I am not prepared to say but that I would adopt the one term principle. I am inclined to believe that, whatever minor inconveniences might result, that is the true doctrine in reference to officers who control the public revenues, and I only think that they will be more likely to be re-elected by being limited to two or three terms. But I hold that it is entirely safe and according to the theory and principles of our government to leave that matter wholly with the electing power—the people. My friend from Posey, as I hope I may be permitted to call him, (Mr. Owen,) stated that the question now before the Convention is, whether it is proper to continue the Auditor and Treasurer together in office, more than four years. With great deference to that gentleman, I insist that that is, as the lawyers say, a false issue. The question, after all, resolves itself into this, and only this, is it safe to trust the people to judge and act for themselves in this matter? By unanimous consent we give the election of all officers to them. The question now is, can we safely trust them? I contend that we can and should, and I believe they will ultimately, in reference to such offices, adopt the doctrine of one term and short settlements.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) says that a limitation like that reported by the committee, is necessary to secure the freedom of the elective franchise, on account of the influence which these officers can wield by means of their patronage. I admit that they have some power to misuse their trust. So has the President of the United States. He is invested with a power of patronage far greater, in my judgment, than can be wisely committed to any one man; his right arm reaches out into every county and neighborhood in the Union. But, sir, let him be found exerting that influence for personal aggrandizement, and securing a second election by means of that patronage, and the one term rule in relation to the Presidency shall become as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians.

But gentlemen say these elections will be controlled by caucuses, and unfit men will be imposed upon the people. Let it be so; and let the people, if need be, loose something by their confidence; the lesson will be worth more than it will cost. Let the caucus, if it see fit, impose a swindler upon the people for a second or third term, and the power of the caucus will begin to fail, and by and by the people will scatter to the winds that most odious of all oligarchies. I repeat again, that wisdom purchased by such experience, would be worth all its cost.

I insist then, sir, that if we engraft this principle upon the organic law of the State we send out from under our hands a doctrine, an idea, precisely like that which led many of the temporaries of Washington to desire to invest him with the purple—the doctrine that free government cannot be sustained, or, in other words, that the people are not fully to be trusted in what is altogether their own business. I hope we shall not do it.

Mr. OWEN. I always receive with much deference and respect any suggestion coming from the gentleman who has just taken his seat; but I find myself obliged, upon this occasion, to dissent from his position. His assertion is, that when I declared the true question in this case to be, whether the Auditor and Treasurer of State ought to remain together in office longer than four years, I made a false issue; the true question being whether it will be safe to trust the people to decide for a longer term of four years if they see fit?

I cannot but think here is the same confusion of ideas to which I have already, within a day or two, had occasion to reply.

There are two modes in which the people can decide a question; but in both, the people themselves decide, and none other. By one mode the question is to be decided for a quarter of a century, a third of a century, and perhaps for a half century. By the other, the question may be decided every year. In the first instance the decision is made in the formation of the organic law; in the second, in the statute law.

If the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) is so thoroughly convinced, as he informs us he is, that the public officers ought not to remain together in office for a longer term than four years, why scruple to say so in the Constitution? If the people fully concur with him in opinion on this point, why should they not declare it in the Constitution? If he is sure, and they are sure, the thing is right, why not settle it once for all, and have done with it? If a provision be of doubtful expediency, let it be embodied in law, which may be changed from year to year. But if we are perfectly satisfied of its expediency, let us give the people an opportunity to adopt it when they meet next year at the polls, to ratify or reject this new Constitution.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. PRESIDENT: I understand the question now before the Convention, to be upon the motion of the gentleman back of me (Mr. Maguire,) to re-commit this article to the committee with certain instructions?

The PRESIDENT. That is the pending question.

Mr. STEELE. I shall go against the reference. The section as originally reported meets my approbation and is better than the amendments proposed. I wish to say, that it appears to me that the delegate from Laporte (Mr. Niles,) is clearly right in the position he has assumed in reference to the eligibility of public officers and the right of the people to elect a man as long as they see fit. I heartily agree with him that it is safe to trust the people at all times and under all circumstances and that we should not, in this new Constitution restrict them in the freest choice of their public servants; that the people should not continue a man in office for four or eight or twenty years, if they have confidence in him and desire him in preference to any other man. I know that the distinguished gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen,) says, that the people are here in this convention; it is true that they are represented here, but notwithstanding that, the work which we do here, must be submitted for their approval next year at the ballot box.

For one I am decidedly against restricting the people in this matter. I know that gentleman may consider me stubborn on this subject; I am determined. You know it is in the nature of an old ox to be always stubborn. I believe that the people have the right to select their own officers and keep them in their service as long as they choose and I will maintain it here and elsewhere. I will maintain it now and forever. I do not believe that in forming a new Constitution, we should insert those provisions that will beget frequent electioneering and scrambles for office. If elections are to be every two years and the officers not eligible for a second term, we shall have an hundred times the strife and electioneer ing that we otherwise should. And there is another consideration to be urged against such a provision. We all desire that our work done here shall be approved and ratified by the people, we want this Constitution to be adopted. But I can tell delegates that if they will adopt a provision restricting and muzzling the will of the people in the choice of their officers, there are thousands of the citizens of Indiana who will vote against your new Constitution and I do not know but that among them will be your humble servant. I think with the gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Maguire,) that we had better compromise the matter. I think the people would be benefited by our adopting such a compromise. But sir, I shall vote against the reference of this article at this time and I shall vote against the article itself on the final passage if it contains the amendments which have been offered, and I shall journal my vote upon the call for the yeas and nays that my position may be known to the people whom I represent.

Mr. BIDDLE. It is well known how I shall vote on this question. I do not rise to make a speech, but with the indulgence of the Convention I will tell an anecdote. (Several members, "go on" "go on.") My friend from Laporte, (Mr. Niles) since this discussion began, (cries of "louder" "louder.") I was saying that since this discussion began my friend from Laporte, whom I value very highly, and to differ with whom always gives me pain and perplexity—pain on account of our personal relations, and perplexity with his logic, which he weaves as close as sail cloth—made me a social visit at my room.—After some time spent in general conversation he rose to depart saying: "Well, my dear sir, come and see me; and I will just tell you, I have a basket of the most delicious apples you ever saw; I fear I shall do wrong by eating too many unless you come and watch me." I replied "I shall surely come; but my dear friend will you allow me to point your remarks with a moral?" "Certainly, certainly," said he, smiling. "If a person of your philosophy cannot withstand the temptation of a good apple, how do you expect others of much less virtue than yourself to forego the allurements of a fat office? (Laughter.) And remember, it was nothing but an apple that tempted Eve. She fell and brought death and wo on all mankind!" (much good humor.)

Mr. WOLFE. I am satisfied that the Convention is prepared to vote upon this question, if a vote can be obtained. I will, therefore, move to lay this subject upon the table until we can then get to a decision.

Mr. KILGORE. I have listened to the arguments advanced on this question hitherto very patiently, but have not been disposed, until the present time, to participate in the discussion. It does seem to me, however, that the gentlemen with whom I differ have mistaken the object for which this Convention was called. I understand that the great duty which we have to perform, and I believe such is the general understanding of gentlemen, is to establish an organic law for the State. It is no part of our business or mission here to place restrictions upon the rights of the people of this State. We desire to devise a plan of government, and it becomes a necessary part of the political machinery that we should divide it into different departments, and to each of these departments we assign appropriate duties. Those duties, sir, are not to be performed to the prejudice or the restriction of the sovereign people, but for the good of the whole. To the legislative department we assign one duty, to the judiciary another, and to the executive another. To each of these departments we delegate certain powers and privileges, which are to be exercised within certain limits prescribed by the law. We throw around them restrictions in order to guard the people from any unjust abuse of the privileges conferred upon them. These restrictions are a necessary part of the political machinery; and when we have prescribed some mode by which our government is to be conducted, we have done all that the people have asked at our hands. We may create additional departments, and we may confer upon those departments whatever power we may deem necessary or proper for the good of the people. We may declare what shall be the qualifications of the members of the Legislature, and in organizing that department may fix the tenure of office. In organizing the judiciary we may declare what number of judges and officers the courts shall be composed of, and the peculiar duties to be performed by them. We appoint to the executive certain duties to be performed by him, and there we stop. There we should stop. The great political machine is then completed. Every step we go beyond that point is a wrong one. We have assembled here to form a new Constitution, because the people conceived that the old Constitution threw around them certain restraints that ought not to exist. One of the greatest of those restraints was the prohibition against the disposing of the fines and forfeitures in any other manner than that specially named in the old Constitution, viz: For the benefit of county seminaries. This was a restriction upon their power, and it met with almost universal condemnation, and I venture the prediction that if that subject had not been discussed upon the stump by two distinguished political leaders, candidates for governor, at almost every cross road in each of the counties of the State, and if the necessity had not been urged upon the people of throwing off these restraints imposed upon them, this Convention would not have been called at all. They were, also, restricted from electing their own officers. That duty was assigned to another head, one of the departments of which I have been speaking. The people looked upon it as a restraint upon their liberty, and called for a redress of their wrongs. They asked that delegates might be elected to revise the present Constitution, so as to give them the power and control over the Seminary fund, and also the power to elect their own officers. These two restrictions were the topics mainly discussed throughout the State, and were the principle cause that induced the people to vote for the calling of this Convention. We are here then for the purpose of removing these restrictions, and shall we, instead of trying to remove them, add additional restraints. True the subject of the tenure of office was not agitated before the people, but when we attempt to limit that tenure, and decide as to who they shall elect, and who they shall not, we are throwing a new restriction around their power and privileges. It is one too that is unnecessary to the well-being of society. These officers are mere functionaries, a necessary part of the political machinery. The people are the most competent to determine as to the tenure of office, and shall we limit their power on this point. It is a restriction thrown around the people to say to them in regard to these officers, thus far shalt thou go and no farther, in this particular.

Gentlemen have remarked that the tenure of office has been fixed in other State Constitutions and some gentlemen have referred to the precedent the people have established in relation to the election of the President. They declare that public opinion has sustained the two term policy; and that this principle applies not only to the President, but to all the minor officers of the nation. The President is an officer who can exert the most unbounded influence. The Secretary of State, Auditor, and Treasurer have not one iota of patronage, and it is perfectly clear that the President holds an immense patronage, and is capable of wielding a powerful influence. Yet with all that power and influence the people have willed by common consent that he shall not be eligible more than two terms to that office. If the people have thus regulated the exercise of their judgment in relation to so important an officer, possessing so much power and influence, may we not safely confide in the people, and trust them to regulate this matter according to their judgment? This principle is intended for the good of the people, and not for the good of the office-holder; and in the faithful discharge of the duties imposed on the office-holder the people who elect him are deeply interested. It is perfectly immaterial who the officer is, so long as he does his duty. Every inducement is held out to an officer to perform the duties entrusted to his charge faithfully—and if satisfactory to the people, they should have the power to re-elect him at any time.

It was said by gentlemen the other day that the immortal Jefferson objected to the Constitution of the United States because the doctrine of rotation in office seemed not to have been recognized so far as related to the office of President of the United States. Mr. Jefferson lived in another age, and he could not, with all his political sagacity, foresee the great improvements that would be made upon the theory he laid down at that time. He could not possibly foresee the great improvement in the doctrines he so strenuously and ably advocated; that of rotation in office and universal democracy. In relation to the election of President, he thought that the Constitution was couched in such terms that he might, if the people so willed it, be kept in office during his lifetime; yet we find the people have settled that matter differently. They have settled in their own minds upon two terms as the extent of eligibility to that office; and shall we fear to trust the people of this State to elect a Secretary or Treasurer? Shall we say to them, we will permit you to elect officers for one or two terms, and no oftener? Let the doctrine of rotation in office be our doctrine, but for heaven's sake let the people establish the doctrine. They are in favor of rotation in office, and let them carry out the principle of their own free will, but do not force it upon them and prevent them from exercising a power which they should be free to exercise.

One gentleman remarked that the people would be liable to be led astray and cajoled into the support of an incumbent on account of his great power and official influence. Another gentleman also said that the caucus organization is to be dreaded in the selection of these officers from the people. Well, sir, the action of caucusses is the same, and the action of one is just as much to be dreaded as the action of another. It is perfectly immaterial whether these officers shall be elected for one or two terms, and if the question is left open as to whether the holding of an office for one or two terms renders an aspirant for office eligible or ineligible, the caucus can settle the matter. If the term of holding an office terminate at the end of four years, and it is found that the incumbent is not eligible for re-election, the caucus can select the one to succeed him. If the matter of re-eligibility to office is left open, as I trust it will be, the caucus can settle the question satisfactorily. The members of the caucus which convenes at this capital for the purpose of selecting suitable officers for the people will have some friends who necessarily must have some part of the loaves and fishes. They will determine the office-holder's tenure of office; no difference whether it meets the wishes of an incumbent or an aspirant; they will settle the matter in their own way, according to their political economy; and when the caucus lay their hands on him he becomes a victim.

I desire, Mr. President, then, to be understood as far as this question is concerned, that when any effort is made to take it out of the hands of the people, I shall be found in opposition to the effort. Why, sir, is there not as much propriety in saying that a member of the Legislature, one of the people's representatives shall be eligible two years out of four or six, as to say that the Secretary, the Treasurer, or the Auditor, shall be eligible for a certain time and no longer? Why is there not just as much propriety in the application of the principle to the one as the other? The members of the Legislature are the mere servants of the people, and have certain duties to perform, and so in relation to the State officers; and, if the State officers may not be re-eligible to election, why should it not be the case with the members of the Legislature?

Let us, sir, carry out the doctrine of rotation in office in its fullest extent. Let it not be violated in a single instance; for, if it is right in one case, it is right in another. I look upon it as radically wrong to take this power from the hands of the people. Sir, there is great danger that we, as the representatives of the people, may abuse the power which, for the time being, they have placed in our hands. We may incorporate this restrictive principle into the new Constitution, and it may be odious to the people. But sending it down for their sanction connected, as it doubtless will be, with other wholesome and popular provisions to be voted upon and adopted, or rejected, as a whole, they may, and perhaps will, for the sake of those other provisions, vote for its adoption notwithstanding the objectionable feature. But that is no good reason why we should seek to impose upon them a restriction which will ever call forth their disapprobation.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It appears to me, sir, that this is a very extraordinary discussion and I confess I am getting somewhat tired of the manner in which it is being carried on. A portion of the Convention are in favor of limiting the tenure of office, and rendering those holding office, after the expiration of their terms ineligible, with the view of preventing officeholders from exerting any great power or influence over the country, from their continued establishment in office. This principle as far as I can judge, appears to strike every gentleman as a correct one, although there are certain of the members who express their approbation of it in a very contradictory manner. What is the argument? Gentlemen get up here and insist that this will prove a restriction upon the sovereign rights of the people—though at the same time they acknowledge the principle itself is correct, and the people themselves will require it. This is the position occupied by gentlemen.

I did not rise, sir, for the purpose of arguing this question, but simply to make a few remarks in reply to my friend from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore). That gentleman in alluding to Mr. Jefferson's views, stated that Mr. J. had found fault with our present National Constitution, because the principle of rotation in office had not been engrafted in it, that he had contended fifty years ago, that this was a democratic doctrine, and should be embraced in the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman from Delaware further remarked, that Mr. Jefferson's views on this question was not applicable to the present age. Sir, who does not know that Mr. Jefferson was a century ahead of the people in his ideas, and that we have not got now where Jefferson was then.

There was another remark of the gentleman, in relation to the question of rotation in office, he stating that the people, by common consent, had fixed the tenure of that office of President, and that it should be used as a precedent; and inasmuch as this has been done by the people, he considers they will do the same thing when it is proper to be done in regard to minor officers. He argues, in short, that the people have restricted the office of President of the United States. Now, I must be allowed to say, sir, with all deference to the gentleman, that the people have had nothing to do with it. How was it with the illustrious Washington? Not a long time previous to his election as President, the people wished to clothe him with the purple—the mark of kingly power; and when that patriotic man desired to retire from his office to the bosom of his family, what was the voice of the people? Why, an unanimous spontaneous demand upon him to remain in the office—and, if he had lived fifty years, the same course would have been pursued by the people. Such is the case now. Let men hold a responsible electioneering office, and the people will cry out, hold on, although it may be that these very men, while apparently very faithful in the discharge of their duty, are imposing upon the public, and their iniquitous conduct cannot be found out while they continue to hold office.

Gentlemen argue that, if this course is right, why not apply it to all officers of the State—executive or otherwise. Well, sir, I am for making the principle apply to all officers of every grade, the judiciary not excepted. By all means, sir, make the judiciary ineligible to office after they have served a certain period—this will make them independent, and they will have no selfish motives to induce them to electioneer while sitting upon the judges' bench.

This is my view of the matter. The people demand short tenures of office, and require ineligibility after those terms have expired, especially in that portion of the State from which I hail. They demand, most emphatically the election of all officers, short tenures of office, and ineligibility. The true republican doctrine, very simple in its nature, I contend, was shadowed forth by the illustrious Jefferson, half a century ago; in his views he was a century ahead of that period. Illinois and several other States, if I am correctly informed, have taken the true position upon these questions, and I hope the people of the State of Indiana, assembled here in Convention, will adopt the same policy. For, I contend, sir, that the people of Indiana are themselves here, and we are sitting here to form a Constitution for the State of Indiana, that is rest of Constitution and law. If I may be permitted the expression, here are a set of men cast away, as it were, upon an island, in the midst of an ocean, surrounded only by their natural rights. We are here for two purposes alone; and what are they! The first purpose is as clear as possible—to ascertain the rights of individuals. We are then to point them out, so that the legislature may not interfere with them. We should ascertain the rights of the people, and, after that, place limitations upon them, so far as to indicate how public authority shall be exercised, and the manner in which the duties of the public functionaries of the government shall be executed.

Mr. KENT. Mr. PRESIDENT:—Without intending, or even desiring to discuss, at length, the question now before the Convention, I will briefly respond to the remark which has been frequently made by gentlemen during the debate, that it is absurd and anti-republican to restrain the sovereign will, and particularly in the selection of candidates for office.

I imagine, sir, that there is no discrepancy of opinion in this body, as to the soundness of the position that this Convention represents the political sovereignty of Indiana, at least in the revision of the Constitution, and that when we shall have accomplished our work, and the new Constitution is submitted to the people for their approval, or rejection, their decision will carry with it the highest political authority of the State. If then this instrument provides that no person shall be eligible a second or third term for the same office, and the sovereign will shall adopt it, how, I ask, is this elementary power of the government restricted? Certainly not by the adoption of the Constitution; for in that very act the electors, from whom we derive the authority to occupy seats in this Convention, declare it shall be the supreme law of the State, not only for the purpose of limiting and controlling the different departments of the State government, but even the sovereign will of the governed.

But those gentlemen who oppose the proviso in each of the sections under discussion, forget that this sovereignty, of which so much has been said, will ever retain the inherent right to amend or revise the Constitution. And I hope an article will be inserted in the new Constitution, providing that whenever a majority of all the members elected to both branches of the Legislature, shall adopt an amendment or amendments, that the same shall be submitted to the electors at the next general election thereafter, and if a majority shall ratify and approve such amendment or amendments, the same shall become a part of the Constitution. [Several voices—"consent! consent!"] With such a wholesome provision in the amended Constitution no apprehension whatever need be entertained that the people will long endure a bad, or even an anti-republican form of government, as some gentlemen have so eloquently contended ours will be, unless the ineligibility clause in the sections now before the Convention is stricken out.

It was but a few days since that the Convention decided by a vote of 124 to 5, that the sovereign will should not be heard annually, but biennially through the Legislative department of government. Nearly one hundred sections have already been reported to this Convention, from standing committees, many of which will, no doubt, be inserted in the new Constitution. Among these sections we have one, declaring that the sovereign will shall not elect to exceed one hundred representatives and thirty-four Senators.

Another section declares that there shall not be imprisonment for debt except in case of strong presumption of fraud. We have, also, among these sections, another class of provisions, of a declaratory character. In these, if adopted, we say to the sovereign power, that there shall be elected a Governor, a Lieutenant Governor, and a certain number of State and county officers. In fact, it is hardly possible to insert a clause in the Constitution, but what will limit and control in some form or other the sovereign power, and this is well understood to be nothing more than the sovereign will, controlling itself by the adoption of a written Constitution.

One word, Mr. President, as to the expediency of providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of Secretary, Treasurer, or Auditor of State, more than four years in any term of six, or even eight years.

While I have no complaints to make of court house influences, or the action of political cliques, I hope that the proviso will be retained, and that the same wholesome principle will be carried out with regard to county offices.

An able French author, in a work on Democracy in America, attributes the instability of parties in this country to the almost infinite desire for office. We all know that in every district, and almost every county, there is a class who make politics a trade, and I think no one will question the allegation, that this class are not the most capable or deserving of office.

All admit the importance of having faithful and competent officers, and that the policy which will best secure this object, should be adopted. I am quite sure, however, that we shall not be able by any change in the Constitution, entirely to remedy the evil complained of by gentlemen.

But, Mr. President, I am convinced that the proviso will have a tendency to increase the difficulties of office-holders, in the formation of combinations to secure their continuance in office, and, sir, if this were the only good we could reasonably anticipate, by the adoption of the article reported by the committee, it should receive my cordial support. But may we not indulge the hope that other benefits will result from this ineligibility provision? Will it not create a more general and laudable desire among the people to qualify themselves for official distinction in the affairs of government, while it will greatly lessen the power and influence of the mere politician, that class of aspirants to office whose love of country and fidelity to party is measured by the spoils of office. [Several voices—"Consent to that doctrine!"]

Mr. LOCKHART. It seems to me that it must be evident to the Convention, that it is unnecessary to continue this discussion any further. The proposition now under consideration, is the same which has been decided before, two or three times, and by a large majority, laid upon the table. I have myself, voted for several amendments, which have been proposed, and I am not yet satisfied with the provisions of the section. But I am fully satisfied that its further discussion is unnecessary, therefore, I call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN requested the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

And the call being withdrawn,

Mr. HOLMAN said, the question is upon re-committing the article, with instructions. I wish to inquire whether it would be proper now to amend the instructions.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. COOKERLY. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The first question, then, will be upon recommitting the article.

The question being put, the Convention refused to recommit.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon the engrossment of the section.

Mr. BORDEN. To give an opportunity for re-considering the vote taken upon the first amendment to this section, (Mr. Carr's,) I move to lay the section upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope, that, by common consent, the rule requiring one day's notice to re-consider, will be disregarded now, for the obvious reason, that the language of the section, as it stands, does not harmonize—is not consistent.

The PRESIDENT. By disregarding the rules, a motion to re-consider may be entertained now.

By unanimous consent of the Convention, the vote of yesterday, adopting the amendment, proposing to strike out the word "six" from the fourth line of the section, and inserting in lieu thereof, the word "eight," was re-considered.

And the question being taken on the said amendment, it was rejected.

The question again recurring upon ordering the article to be engrossed,

Mr. LOCKHART proposed to amend the second section by inserting, after the word "Auditor," the words "of State."

Which was amendment was agreed to.

The question again recurring on the engrossment of the article,

Mr. HOVEY said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I would not at this late stage of the debate trouble the Convention with any views of mine, were it not from the fact, that I feel constrained to differ with those heretofore expressed by my honorable colleague (Mr. Owen). Nor, do I expect to change the mind of any delegate upon this subject, but desire to express my views, for the purpose of justifying the record of my votes, which has, and will be made to the section under consideration.

The provisions of all Constitutions, might, I think, be classed as declaratory, restrictive, or mandatory. Declaratory, where some well acknowledged principle or right is asserted, as in the "bill of rights;" restrictive, where the exercise of some natural right is prohibited, as that the legislature shall not pass certain laws; and mandatory, where the Constitution enjoins upon some officer or body the performance of some particular duty, as for instance, that the Legislature shall pass a homestead law.

I think, then, it may be safely said, that the most dangerous part of a Constitution, is its restrictive sections, and that we should not adopt anything of that character, without the most deliberative consideration. Every restriction is in derogation of the natural rights of man; no difference how inconsiderable it may be. And, I think, it would be laying down a correct rule to say, that no shackles should be placed upon the exercise of those rights, without experience has taught their absolute necessity.

Under this rule, sir, I would then inquire, whether practical experience has taught us, that it is necessary to make a Constitutional provision to rotate these officers?

By the Constitution under which this State has existed ever since its formation, the offices of Secretary of State, Auditor of State, and Treasurer of State, have not been clogged with the restrictions now proposed. And, I would ask, when, where, and how, have the people of this State been injured by the old principle of re-eligibility? These officers have been re-eligible for the last thirty-four years, and yet gentlemen are unable to point to the time when any injury has resulted from the practice under that principle.

But gentlemen say, if we permit them to be re-eligible now, that they will corrupt the purity of our elections—that they will wield the privileges of their offices for selfish purposes, and by their corrupting influences, secure their re-election.

Now, sir, as it is understood that these officers are to be elected by the people, what do such arguments amount to?

Strip them of all sophistry, and they nakedly stand forth in this brief sentence—"the people are incapable of self-government." Incapable of self-government, because they can and will be corrupted. Sir, it seems to me, this is assuming much in favor of our penetration and wisdom. We "the wise men" of this Convention can see all this; we can see all the corrupt twistings of these office seeking sharks, but the good people of Indiana are so blind that they cannot perceive them—they will suffer themselves to be swindled and not know it. Sir, I utterly disclaim the conclusion to which such arguments will lead. I believe the people to be as incorruptible and as capable of perceiving the tricks which have been alluded to, as the members of this Convention, or any legislative assembly. Yes, even more incorruptible, as it is more difficult to corrupt a large body of men than a small number. And, I think, the inference is irresistible, that if these officers elected for the last thirty-four years by the Legislature have not wielded the corrupting influences attributed to them, there will be much less danger when elected by the people.

I regard, therefore, the argument of "corrupting influences" as preposterous, and do not think it can bear the slightest scrutiny.

There is another argument that I am fearful the people will think has had much to do, if we adopt the proviso in the section under discussion.

It was dimly shadowed forth a few days ago, when the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) spoke so feelingly in regard to the one-armed, and one-legged men, who are and would be aspirants for these offices. Sir, I am fearful the people will think there are a good many of those one-armed and one-legged gentlemen here, and that we are preparing a field in which we may reap the spoils.

The gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Kent,) made use of a very ingenious argument, in saying that all restrictions were encroachments upon the natural rights of the people, but as they, and not this Convention, had the right to adopt or reject them, they would be self-imposed restrictions.

That is true, but we prepare the restrictions for them, and it certainly is not right to force them to take objectionable sections or reject the whole of our labors; but such I am fearful will be the final result.

Sir, in conclusion, I would say, that if this Convention adopt the ineligibility proviso in this section—which I believe to be anti-republican—they ought in all consistency to carry the same doctrine out, in the tenure of all other officers, senators, representatives, &c., for fully as good arguments can be used for the application of the principle to the one class as to the others.

And yet I feel certain that some of those who favor this proviso now, will not be willing to apply it to senators and representatives, and if they do not—I will leave the inference with the people and the Convention.

Mr. SHERROD. I desire to make but a single remark. I have been no less surprised than amused at the strange doctrine that has fallen from the lips of honorable gentlemen upon this floor, and especially from the gentleman (Mr. Hovey) who has just taken his seat. Now, sir, I am decidedly in favor of the proviso, just as it is, although the gentleman has denounced it as anti-republican and anti-democratic. I must beg leave, with due deference to the opinions of that gentleman, to dissent from this declaration. I contend, sir, that the principle of this proviso is not only democratic, but also republican.

Mr. HOVEY (interrupting). I said it was anti-republican; I made no use of the word anti-democratic.

As to the definition of the words anti-democratic, and anti-republican, I cannot see that there is any great difference; the distinction, I think at least, is rather fine spun. Sir, you can define my position as you please. I contend that this proviso embraces the same kind of republican doctrine preached by a Jefferson, and the same kind that was denounced by his opposers; the same kind of doctrine sir, upon which the prosperity, the happiness, and glory of our common country depends.

I yield to no man upon this floor in my devotion, and advocacy of what I believe to be the true democracy of the country, that democracy sir, upon which the perpetuity of our institutions are based, and which guarantees to all an equal right to liberty and security, in his person and property. And while I say this, I have brought my own mind to the conclusion, that the adoption of the principle advocated by the opposite side of the House, would be striking at, if not the main pillar, one of the great principles upon which democratic government rests.

Sir, the history of all governments, from the foundation of the world up to the present time, proves conclusively, that in order to secure a good government the people have deemed it necessary to place certain restrictions and limitations upon their own power.

We have not only the history of our own government in proof of this fact, but turning our eyes for a moment to the Republics of Christendom, whatever else we may see, we discover one thing at least, that the same restrictions and limitations are found to be necessary there.

And here sir, I would ask, why it was that the people of Athens did not assemble in mass to enact their laws, and take into their hands the government? And why has the axiom been handed down to us, that if every Athenian was a Socrates, then every Athenian assemblage would be a mob? It was because they could not trust themselves to the excitements and temptations, to which all men were liable; they were afraid to trust themselves to the popular hurricanes that sweep over all countries. Sir, the very foundation of all governments rests upon the restriction upon popular rights, and the people have wisely determined to take the authority from the masses and confer it upon certain agents.

If such was not the fact this Convention had better bring its deliberations to a close—it had better adjourn and go home—[cries of consent consent,]—and the sooner the better. Why, sir, what is our business here, if it is not to act as the agents of the people? I contend that this Convention has been assembled here to place certain land marks in the Constitution, by which the ship of State may sail safely and majestically through the rocks and quicksands and vortexes of popular excitement. But gentlemen seem to say, that by so doing, we are enacting a sort of gag law for the people. As I remarked before, we are assembled here to act as the agents of the people, and when our labors are submitted to them in the shape of a Constitution for their adoption or rejection, I assure you they will examine it closely; they will ascertain whether its provisions are in harmony with the spirit and genius of our institutions; whether we have kept an eye single to the purity of the ballot box, the elective franchise, the great lever upon which the destinies of all free governments must turn. And I would here remark, that when gentlemen talk so loudly about gag law and anti-republican doctrine, they should recollect that the Constitution when altered and amended has to be submitted to a greater tribunal than this Convention, before it can become the supreme law of the land. It has to be submitted to the sovereign people of the State, and gentlemen may rest assured, if they think that we have transcended our limits by placing a gag upon them in the shape of a Constitution, they will hurl it back upon our heads, and say “depart from me ye workers of iniquity.”

Sir, I am decidedly in favor of this proviso, but I cannot agree with all of the remarks of some gentlemen, who are also the advocates of this principle. Gentlemen have talked here, as though we have had heretofore little better than a set of scoundrels in the State offices. It has been remarked, that men did not aspire to these offices for the honor they conferred, but for the stealings.

Now, sir, I regret that such charges have been made upon this floor. I affirm that it is a burning shame, and scandal upon the State of Indiana for any gentleman to intimate that we have ever had a set of thieves and scoundrels in office. We may occasionally have corrupt men at the helm of government, but gentlemen should be careful how they make such sweeping remarks. I have had the honor to vote for a number of our State officers, and I should regret to find, and be very slow to admit, that I had ever voted to place such a man in office.

Sir, I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to reply to some remarks of gentlemen which I could not concur in.

Mr. NEWMAN, who was imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he thought it useless to occupy so much space with this article. In view of the several votes taken upon the subject, said Mr. N., I feel satisfied that it is the mind of a majority of the Convention to prescribe that these three officers shall serve for three years, and until their successors are elected and qualified, and that they should have served four years; therefore I have prepared an amendment, by way of substitute, proposing to condense both articles into one. I move to strike out all after the word “article,” and insert the following:

Strike out all after the word “section” in the first line of the article, and insert: “There shall be elected by the qualified voters of this State, a Secretary, Auditor, and Treasurer of State, who shall hold their several offices for two years and until their successors shall be elected and qualified—they shall severally perform such duties as shall be enjoined upon them by law, and no person shall be eligible to either of said offices more than four years in any period of six years.”

Mr. HOYEY proposed to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words “and no person shall be eligible.”

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment upon the table. We have voted upon that question two or three times already.

This motion was agreed to, and the question recurred upon Mr. NEWMAN’S substitute.

Mr. READ of Clark. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out the words “of State” where they occur so often, so as to read “Secretary, Auditor, and Treasurer of State.”

Mr. NEWMAN. I accept the modification.

Mr. BORDEN. I rise, merely to suggest to my friend, the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Read,) that the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology would regulate the article in this respect.

M. READ of Clark. I would remark in reply that the same committee might as well regulate every other matter of amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wayne has accepted of the modification.

Mr. NEWMAN assented.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne.

Mr. WOLFE. I would suggest the propriety of prescribing some qualification for these officers, such as what shall be their age, and how long shall they have resided in the State before they can be eligible; and whether they shall be white or black.

Mr. NEWMAN's amendment was then agreed to; and the question recurred upon ordering the article as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

A MEMBER. Is it in order to amend the article at this stage of the proceedings?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. The matter reported by the committee having been all stricken out and a new article substituted, the matter substituted must stand as the judgment of the Convention.

Mr. READ of Monroe said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: The principle of ineligibility after a certain term of service as applied to the State administrative officers, is a new one, and has not yet been introduced, so far as I am aware, into any State Constitution. While I would not choose to adhere to any principle of government for no other reason than that it is old, I would not reject it simply because it is new. But new modes of political action should, before being adopted, be fully and calmly discussed.

I am in favor of the principle of such ineligibility as is embraced in the report of the committee and embodied in the amended form of that report, by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman).

This principle is objected to upon two grounds. First, that it is a restriction upon the power of the people. If it is so, I see no force in the objection. A written Constitution is from beginning to end a restriction upon power. It restrains the powers of officers—it restrains the powers of majorities—it prescribes the mode of exercising the powers it grants—it declares who shall elect—and who may be elected. A constitutional government is essentially a government of restraints—of self-imposed restraints. By the existing Constitution the Governor is ineligible after a second term. It is now proposed to extend this principle to the administrative officers, so that the principle is new only in the proposed application.

The second objection is, it rejects and throws away the best experience of the country. I beg, on this subject, to read from Judge Grimke's work on the nature and tendency of Free Institutions. [Cries of "read, read."] It is, I may observe, a remarkably calm and reflective view of popular government, and an able vindication of our American institutions.

"It has been supposed that where these changes are frequent, the persons elected must be, for the most part, inexperienced and incompetent. Public office itself, creates, to a great extent, the very ability which is required for the performance of its duties. It is not at all uncommon, when individuals have been snatched up from the walks of private life to fill responsible stations, to find that the affairs of society are conducted pretty much upon the same principles and with as much skill and intelligence as before."

Mr. President, I hold that the zeal and earnestness with which the new incumbent enters upon the duties of his office, often more than make amends for his inexperience. But there is another important view which this writer presents. "It is," he says, "of the greatest importance where the electoral franchise is extensively enjoyed, that as large a number of citizens as practicable should be initiated into the mode of conducting public affairs, and there is no way by which this can be so well effected as by rotation in office."

We all hold to the doctrine of rotation in regard to public political offices. I mean in theory we hold it. But when it comes to practice, each particular case is claimed as an exception to the general rule. All parties talk about rotation in office—the outs perhaps more than the ins; if there is any sincerity in the declarations which we hear in behalf of the principle, let it go into the Constitution, and be established as a rule of action.

Mr. President, I thought the allusion of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) to Jefferson as "a man of a past age," peculiarly unhappy. Why, sir, if this Convention should now just adopt the reforms proposed by Jefferson in his Kercheval Letters of 1816, and then go home, we should have adopted the identical reforms which our constituents require.

The article was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

LENGTH OF THE DAILY SESSIONS.

On motion by Mr. BASCOM, the regular order of business was suspended, and the consideration of the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HALL, was taken up.

The resolution was read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution heretofore adopted abolishing the afternoon session of this Convention be, and the same is hereby, rescinded: and that hereafter this Convention shall hold afternoon sessions.

Mr. KILGORE remarked that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. PRESIDENT: I will move to fix Monday next as the day, upon which the Convention shall resume afternoon sessions. Let me say that there are several important committees which have not yet reported. They cannot meet in the evening to hold important meetings and the afternoons have not yet afforded sufficient time to mature all the reports. I will mention that the Committee on the organization of courts of law, met yesterday afternoon with a view of coming to a definite conclusion of their labors. We were in close session from two o'clock until six and we were unable to finish our report, but shall require further sessions. There are several important committees in the same position. Several gentlemen are upon different committees and their action is further delayed on this account, as one or the other of the committees to which they belong cannot get a quorum. Therefore, I hope the Convention will fix Monday next for the day upon which this resolution is to take effect. I am convinced that the action of this body instead of being delayed thereby will be expedited.

Mr. BASCOM. I hope that the Convention will not consent to postpone the operation of this resolution until Monday next. How much benefit is it expected that one hundred and fifty men will reap from the committee labors of some dozen? Gentlemen should not be allowed to waste the time of this large body on the pretence—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Wells will leave off such remarks upon other gentlemen.

Mr. BASCOM. Well, we have got work enough now lying on our table to keep us at work until some time in December, if the committees should not report until then. We shall never accomplish the business for which we were sent here if we only work one half the time. If we go on and hold sessions as we ought to, twice a day, we could, after we had got up even with the business now on the table, suspend afternoon sessions if it was necessary in order [several voices here called for the question] to give these committees more time. For my part I am tired of walking around the streets all the afternoon, with nothing to do.

The question upon Mr. PETTIT'S motion to resume afternoon sessions on Monday next, was then taken, and the same was agreed to without a division.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the "bill of rights," the pending question being upon the motion to strike out from the first section the words "strong presumption of" after the words "there shall be no imprisonment for debt except in case of" and before the word "fraud."

Mr. WATTS. Mr. PRESIDENT: I am opposed to the amendment, and to the amendment to the amendment. In my opinion the section is just right as it is and I shall therefore oppose any alteration. I do not think, Sir, that the interests of the honest man are well guarded without such a provision. Without it an individual might go into the country anywhere and purchase property upon a credit; he might sell that property and convert the proceeds into money, (and it is well known to every member, that you cannot reach money in a man's pocket by an execution,) and he may use that money in defending himself in a suit at law, which the creditor, of whom the property was purchased may prosecute on an allegation of fraud. There would be no way to secure the rights of the defrauded creditor. There are men of so hardened and desperate a character that you must bring them to the jail door before they will disclose the possession of property and deliver it up for the satisfaction of their honest creditors. We must, if we would consult the interests of the mass of honest citizens, allow imprisonment for debt when there is strong presumptive evidence of fraud. I do not think the term so difficult to be understood, or so liable to misconstruction, as has been represented by the gentleman from Decatur and others. A chain of circumstances will generally indicate, with sufficient clearness to prevent the doing of injustice to the innocent, whether the debtor has concealed means with which he might discharge his debts, or whether he is really unfortunate and unable to satisfy the demands against him. There is scarcely the possibility of injuring the innocent man. On the other hand, without that provision the fraudulent debtor is secure in the possession of property, the creditor cannot compel him to disclose its possession and deliver it up, and he will seldom have the disposition to prosecute him in a criminal court for fraud.

I shall not consume time by making a speech, but I repeat my conviction that the section is right as it now reads and should remain unchanged. I shall therefore vote against the proposition to amend.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order to bring the Convention to a direct vote upon the principle involved in the amendment and to test the feeling of members, I will accept the amendment to my amendment, made by the gentleman over the way (Mr. Howe). As amended, my proposition would now stand thus:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud."

This may effect my object in moving to amend the section, although it is not so certain and specific as I could desire.

Mr. DUNN. I would inquire of the President if it would now be in order, to move to strike out the whole section and substitute another new one?

The PRESIDENT. It will be in order, but I suppose it is not strictly in order while the present motion is pending.

Mr. BUNN. I will read my substitute for information. I propose to strike out all of the original section and insert the following:

There shall be no imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud, and the debtor shall not be continued in prison, after he shall have delivered up his estate for the benefit of his creditor or creditors, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

I have but a word or two to offer in presenting this substitute. I find that there is a division of sentiment—a great difference of opinion relative to the form which should be given to this important section. A part of this body is opposed to imprisonment for debt under any circumstances; another party is in favor of imprisonment for debt in cases of fraud; and no member is in favor of imprisonment of the debtor after he has delivered up his property for the benefit of his creditors.

There is a great difference between a negative and a positive provision on this subject. My proposition will not require the Legislature, even in cases of fraud, to pass laws for the imprisonment of debtors; but it will restrain the Legislature from providing for imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud. I am clearly of opinion that this Convention should impose as few restrictions as possible upon the legislative department, and only those which are clearly and absolutely necessary. Now, sir, I think it wrong to declare that the Legislature shall not have the power to enact laws providing for imprisonment for debt under any circumstances whatever. And yet I am aware that the feeling of many in this body is that the Legislature should be prohibited from legalizing imprisonment for debt, no matter how fraudulent the action of the debtor may be proven to be—no matter though he has the money in his pocket which would discharge all his debts, but openly sets the creditor at defiance. They are willing to adopt an amendment to this section which would leave the fraudulent debtor to go free, and his creditor without redress, save his power to prosecute the debtor in a criminal court, but where he cannot connect a civil action so as to reach the property of the debtor. My desire is to give the creditor some process whereby he may secure his rights; for, Mr. President, it seems to be partially overlooked that the creditor has rights worthy of protection. And I ask that we shall allow the Legislature to protect him under proper restrictions.

The seventeenth article of the bill of rights of the old Constitution provides, in substance, that there shall be no imprisonment for debt after the debtor shall have delivered up his property for the benefit of his creditors. It is a very wise provision; and I have copied substantially that feature of the provision. I am as much in favor of restricting the power of imprisonment for debt, as I am desirous to protect the rights of the creditor. I do not think that the Legislature should provide for the punishment of the debtor for fraud after he has delivered up his property for the benefit of his creditors; he should then be discharged from custody as a debtor.

Mr. President, I cannot understand the basis upon which gentlemen are acting, who are so desirous of prohibiting imprisonment for debt under all circumstances. I cannot see what obligations we are under to vote the freedom of the State to the fraudulent debtor, by saying in the organic law we are now framing, that the Legislature shall have no power to secure the rights of the honest creditor, by giving the power, in extreme cases, to arrest a dishonest debtor and compel the disclosure of property, where he has it in possession, and its delivery for the discharge of his lawful obligations to his fellow-citizens. If we limit the power of arrest for debt to clear cases of fraud, to be proven to the satisfaction of the court and jury, no danger can arise of injury or oppression of the debtor.

Those familiar with the business affairs and transactions of the State, and especially those who live, as we do, upon the borders of the State, and know the facility with which fraudulent debtors secure property and escape to a neighboring State, where collection becomes almost impossible, know the absolute necessity that exists for some law for the protection of creditors. We very often see men, in the possession of property purchased upon credit, selling off that property which is subject to execution, and converting the proceeds to money and funds which cannot be reached by execution, and preparing to leave the State rich, it may be, from the proceeds of property which they have virtually swindled from our citizens. Under the operation of a constitutional provision, as proposed by the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) and others, the creditor in such a case must look on quietly but powerless to resist and assert his rights. But, on the other hand, with a law, the substance of which I have embraced in my amendment, providing for arrest and imprisonment in case of fraud, the creditor, when he should discover a state of things like that I have described, could, upon an affidavit made, require the debtor to appear and answer to a charge of fraud; and upon making proof of fraud, the debtor could be lodged in jail until he delivered up the property for the satisfaction of the creditor.

With these views, I shall vote against the pending amendment; and if that is voted down, I shall then propose to strike out the whole of the original section, and offer the substitute I have read.

MR. ROBINSON. Before the vote is taken—

THE PRESIDENT. Will the Convention give the gentleman leave to speak a third time upon the pending question?

Consent was given, and

MR. ROBINSON remarked, that he only desired to explain his position and views in as few words as possible.

I have (said Mr. R.) always been willing to sit quietly and listen patiently to gentlemen who deemed it their duty to explain their views and their reasons for their action. I am not fond of speaking, and I am never on the floor except when I feel it to be my imperative duty to explain the position I occupy and the reason for my votes.

Having proposed the amendment upon which the question is about to be taken, I desire briefly to explain why I hope it will be adopted. We have in this country, not only a class of unfortunate debtors, but also a class of unfortunate creditors, and both are entitled to protection and legislative and constitutional regard. I am no more disposed to concede all the benefits of legislation and constitutional provisions to the creditor than I am to the debtor. We cannot provide, in this instrument, for particular and isolated cases, but we must frame it with regard to the general interests of the people. There is, in this country, a class of creditors who deserve the appellation of "Shylocks"—men who would take from an unfortunate creditor, not only his entire property, but would strip him and his family of every article of personal necessity and comfort—aye, sir, would tear the man from his family and incarcerate him in prison, if, by so doing, an additional dollar could be forced from him. I make no reflection upon the gentleman from Dearborn. I know his honesty of purpose and goodness of heart too well, but there are men in the community—there are such Shylocks in the land as I have described.

Well, sir, in order to protect the unfortunate debtor—because, I say, there are many really unfortunate debtors, and it is untrue that every man who becomes embarrassed in his circumstances, and unable to pay his debts, is destitute of moral principle—to protect this class, I would provide against imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, proven by the party accusing. There are thousands of insolvent debtors with as pure hearts and as honest purposes as any delegate upon this floor, but fortune has frowned upon them—adversity has come upon them like the winter's blast, stripped them of their property, and they are reduced, oftentimes, in an hour, to abject poverty. And what man is there on this floor, who will raise in his place and say, that such a debtor should be arrested and imprisoned, in violation of the spirit of our free institutions and the declarations in our Bill of Rights?

Then, sir, believing as I do, that the amendment I have offered to the article now before this body, sufficiently guards the rights and interests of the creditor, and at the same time throws around the debtor an equal guard and protection, I hope, that in this day of enlightened and philanthropic public opinion, it will not be voted down.

The effect of my amendment is this: you can connect an investigation of fraud with an investigation for the recovery of debt. And is there a delegate here who will say that an unfortunate debtor, whose fathers may have fought in the revolutionary struggle which secured us the right to govern ourselves, shall be imprisoned for no crime but that of poverty, because some Shylock asserts that there is a presumption of fraud in his business transactions? I believe that no such sentiment exists here. If I did believe it, if I thought such a sentiment prevailed here, I should almost be decided to leave this chamber! But there is no such sentiment here. We will say to the creditor, you shall not imprison your debtor because he is poor. We say to him this: We open the door to you to sue for the recovery of your debt, and you may connect the investigation for fraud with the action for recovery. And if it is proven that the debtor is dishonestly keeping the money in his pocket that should be given up to his creditor, he may be imprisoned until that money is given up. So long as I entertain our notions of liberty, so long as I know that all men are liable to become poor, I will not give a vote the effect of which will be to allow the creditor to arrest and imprison a poor man at his discretion. It is giving him power enough and protection enough when you allow him to arrest on a charge of fraud and to imprison when that charge has been proven in court.

My objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) is this, it is not the adoption of the old law according to the letter, but it is the adoption according to the spirit. Under its provision, you commit the debtor to jail, and throw upon him, while he is lying within the walls of that jail, the burthen of proof that he has made a correct schedule of his effects, that he has delivered up all of his property for the benefit of his creditors. I am in favor of compelling a man to pay his just debts, where it has been proved that he has the ability to pay. The proposition I have offered shows that such are my principles. But when we are making an organic law—when we are laying down rules for posterity, not to be altered for the space of half a century—I do think that if this Convention will sufficiently reflect, they will, while they are securing the rights of the creditor, pay equal attention to, and equally secure, the rights of the debtor. The amendment now pending, which is my own, amended, by my acceptance, by the amendment of the gentleman on my right, (Mr. Howe,) comes as near to this equal protection as any proposition that can be submitted. As amended, the section would read:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud."

I have now discharged my duty in presenting and explaining this amendment, and I will conclude by expressing the hope that the Convention will adopt it instead of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. NEWMAN. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson, is more appropriate than any other which has been offered since the article was reported from the committee. The original proviso is in these words—"except in cases of strong presumption of fraud." I would have the charge of fraud established before the debtor should be imprisoned. I think that we should accomplish the object evidently aimed at by a majority of the Convention, and that it would be eminently safe to say, "there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in case of fraud." As to the method of proof, that is a question of evidence, and will properly come up before the legislature for settlement. If a clear case of fraud is not proven, then I do not want imprisonment to take place at all; therefore I am not in favor of the term "strong presumption of fraud." I want it more than a presumption, however strong, I would require proof. As to the residue of the substitute, providing that the person of the debtor shall not be kept in prison after the surrender of his property, I approve of it.

My friend from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) is mistaken if he supposes that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, preserves the spirit of the old Constitution. It differs materially from that. First, we establish the principle that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except for fraud. Then comes in another and additional provision, that the person of the fraudulent debtor shall not be continued in prison after he has delivered up his property for the satisfaction of his creditors. I am in favor of that humane provision, but I am not in favor of the provision originally reported in the article before us; neither would I support the whole of the article in the old Constitution.

Mr. DUNN offered the amendment which he had previously read.

Mr. DOBSON inquired if the amendment which he had offered on yesterday but which was decided out of order, would not now be in order?

The PRESIDENT remarked that no proposition decided to be out of order, was now before the Convention.

Mr. DOBSON then moved to amend by striking out all after the word "debt."

The question being taken upon adopting the amendment, the Convention refused to adopt it.

The question then being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,)

Mr. OWEN. Before the vote is taken upon this amendment I desire to endeavor to perfect the section by offering the following amendment:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt, but a debtor, fraudulently concealing or refusing to surrender his property, may be imprisoned."

In the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, we have an indefinite provision. What is it that shall be held to constitute a fraud? Shall the contracting of a debt be considered a fraud? Or, shall the concealing of property? If the first, the person should be punished for obtaining goods under false pretences. Now, in order to make the proper distinction, I move the adoption of the amendment I have already read.

Mr. KILGORE. I move farther to amend by adding to the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, the following words—"and until he surrenders the same," so that the section as amended, would read,

There shall be no imprisonment for debt, but a debtor, fraudulently concealing or refusing to surrender his property, may be imprisoned until he surrenders the same.

Mr. OWEN. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. NEWMAN. I rise to a question of order. When the pending question is upon a motion to strike out an entire section, and to substitute a new one, is it in order to propose amendments to the original section?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to make a proposition as perfect as possible, before a vote is taken upon striking out.

Mr. NEWMAN. This proposition to amend is the same in substance, as the substitute offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn). The propositions are substantially the same, except in so far as the amendment relates to the fraudulent concealment of property.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. COLFAX. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORDEN. If there is a feeling against an adjournment, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. DUNN. The object of the gentleman from Posey can be accomplished by accepting my substitute, and I think its statement of the declaration and provision is the best. I prefer that the Legislature shall have full scope in this regard, and do as it may think best.

The question on Mr. Owen's amendment was then taken, and the same was, upon a division, agreed to, by a vote of fifty-six to thirty-six.

Mr. DUNN. I now move to strike out the entire section.

I would remark that there is a palpable contradiction of terms in the section as it now reads. It commences with the positive declaration that "there shall be no imprisonment for debt," and afterwards provides that there shall be.

Mr. OWEN. The intention and design of the amendment that I have proposed, is, that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, but that there shall be imprisonment for fraudulently concealing property.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Dunn's motion to strike out and insert, and, upon a division, the same was disagreed to, by a vote of fifty-five to forty-nine.

On motion by

Mr. EDMONSTON, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 6th.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. READ of Monroe rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, I rise not to a correction of our journal—hardly to a correction of our reports. But if good jokes are to be interpolated in our debates, we have as many in this corner as in any part of the Hall, and I would be glad to know how they may go into our reported debates. A scene is represented to have occurred in another part of the Hall, of which the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) is made the hero, which did not occur. This I know from the gentleman from Wayne himself, who, a half hour after I read certain extracts from Gen. Jackson's address, came to me and told me he had a notion to make the remark which I see is imputed to him in the report as published in the State Journal of yesterday. What was said is not reported; what was not said is reported. The only remark which was made, was by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) who said: "now, if this isn't as good a trick as I ever had played upon me, I don't know." But if scenes which did not occur are to be represented as having occurred, I wish to know how, that in this corner we may have our part.*

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman find any fault with the journal and of the proceedings.

Mr. READ. No, sir; it is the journal of the debates that I speak of.

The PRESIDENT. That is a matter between the gentleman and the reporters.

Mr. CLARKE of Tippecanoe said, he was of the impression that the remark referred to was made by the gentleman from Wayne. He had a recollection of hearing some such remark, although it was probably not heard by the gentleman from Monroe.

Mr. READ. I am informed by gentlemen around me that no such remark was made.

Mr. COLFAX said he recollected that the gentleman from Wayne was sitting near him on the occasion referred to, and he distinctly heard that gentleman make a remark, containing some allusion to Moses; what the precise nature of the remark was, he was not able to say.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I rise, sir, to a privileged question. In the report of the debate which occurred on Monday of last week, in regard to a resolution proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) between myself and the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) I am represented as acknowledging myself as having fallen from grace. [A laugh.] What was said was this: the gentleman from Delaware put the question to me whether I had not been a supporter of Mr. Van Buren, and whether he had not advocated the doctrine of giving the right of suffrage to colored persons. I remarked that that was before Mr. Van Buren had fallen from grace.

*NOTE BY MR. READ.—[Mr. Rariden informs me that he did make the remark imputed to him, while sitting at the Clerk's desk—that probably not a dozen heard him.—D. R.]

Now, sir, so far from my falling from grace, I am gradually becoming more confirmed in the faith—still looking forward to that happy period when the democracy will all find themselves combined in one solid phalanx.

Mr. KILGORE. My worthy friend must be aware that it is not I who have set him wrong. I had not the pleasure of seeing the speech until this morning. I think the gentleman is quite orthodox. I would be the last man in the world to charge my friend from Dubois with falling from democratic grace; because he is, as I very well know, one of the most ultra democrats in the State.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick submitted the following communication:

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 6th, 1850.

To the Constitutional Convention:

The undersigned, having been elected the Printer to your honorable body, has obtained the paper from the Secretary of State to commence the printing of the Journal and Debates, which he holds himself in readiness to perform when the Convention may order the same.

In the mean time, he would most respectfully suggest that he is laboring under great inconvenience on account of the Convention not deciding the amount of printing they will require.

He has given bond in the penalty of $5000 for the faithful execution of the work. Unless the Journal and Debates are printed, the printing for the Convention will not amount to $300.

From the penalty in his bond, he thinks he was justified in anticipating that he would be entitled to all the printing connected with the duties of your body.

But he makes no argument in vindication of what he supposes to be his rights, leaving the whole matter to the unbiased judgment of the Convention, hoping that early steps may be taken to determine the amount of printing he may be required to execute, that he may make his arrangements accordingly.

(Signed,) AUSTIN H. BROWN.

The communication having been read,

Mr. GRAHAM said, that without expressing an opinion in regard to his own views and feelings on the subject, or as to the course he should take when the subject should come before the Convention, he would move that the petition be referred to a select committee, and as that committee would probably be composed of legal gentlemen, I shall desire to be excused from serving upon it.

THE PRESIDENT. Of what number shall the committee consist?

Mr. GRAHAM. Of five members.

Mr. BORDEN. I think, sir, that it is due to ourselves that this question should be decided. If it is the intention of the Convention to have the journal of their proceedings published, they ought so to decide. If they intend to leave it to the Legislature, they ought to avow their determination, in order that gentlemen may know what to rely upon. I think it is due to the Printer, who has been elected by the Convention, that the decision should be made.

I have myself, as is well known to the Convention, advocated the position that the State Printer should do the printing; but I am not inclined to throw any obstacle in the way of deciding the matter. If it is the intention of the Convention to give the printing to the Printer who has been elected by the Convention, they ought so to say, and not leave the matter at loose ends, as it is at present.

I understand that there is one printing establishment now printing our debates; and in those published debates are many errors. I am, for instance, represented as expressing the opinion that the Convention had not the right to order the publication of the debates and proceedings. I never said that; all I said was, that the printing of the Convention was authorised by the Legislature; but that I had no doubt the Convention might fix the number of copies to be published of their debates and proceedings. I do think that it is better to come to a decision as to whether the State Printer shall publish our debates and proceedings or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I concur with the gentleman as to the propriety of coming to a decision in regard to this question of printing. My mind in regard to the matter has been long made up, that the Convention has power to determine all questions connected with its proceedings, and to take such action in relation thereto as they may deem expedient. I some time ago offered a resolution, which has been laid on your table, for the purpose of determining how many copies of the debates and proceedings should be published. There seemed to be some opposition to it, and the resolution still remains upon the table. I certainly think we should come to some understanding in regard to this matter, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Allen. The debates are now being published in a newspaper; but there is no provision for the publication in a permanent form. It has been the universal custom of all Conventions to have the control of this matter, and not leave it to the Legislature. And I fear that if it be left to the Legislature they will pass it over; and perhaps neither journal nor debates will be printed in book form.

Now I give notice, and I do not do it by way of bravado, for I do say it is perfectly useless to employ a Stenographer at an expense of several thousand dollars, and not have the debates published in a permanent form—I give notice that I will move to dispense with the services of the Stenographer, without meaning any disrespect to that gentleman, unless the Convention determine to order the publication of the debates and proceedings in a permanent form, so that they may be of some benefit to our constituents. Sir, the course that has been pursued by Kentucky, New York, and other States where Conventions have been held, has established the precedent; and we, as I have remarked, have elected a Printer to do the work of this body exclusively, and it is our duty to say to him, so that he may know what to rely upon, whether we will have our debates and proceedings published in a permanent form or not, and if published, how many copies we will have. I wish this question to be decided; and I have no objection that it shall be referred to the select committee, not for the purpose of investigating who has the claim to the printing, whether the State printer or the printer who has been elected by this body, but to ascertain and state what number of copies shall be printed. I therefore move to take from the table the resolution which I have heretofore offered, and to refer it to the select committee, if one be appointed.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman's motion is not now in order. There is a motion already pending.

The question being put on the motion of the gentleman from Washington, to refer the petition to a select committee of five, it was, upon a division, ayes 70, noes not counted—decided in the affirmative.

Mr. FOSTER. I now move to refer the resolution to the same committee.

THE PRESIDENT. There is no resolution pending.

Mr. FOSTER. Excuse me, sir. I move to take from the table the resolution that I have mentioned.

THE PRESIDENT. The question will be on dispensing with the regular order of business for the purpose of taking up the resolution which the gentleman has indicated.

The question was put, and by unanimous consent the regular order of business was dispensed with, and the resolution was taken up.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the resolution was referred to the same committee.

The resolution is in substance as follows:

That the Printer to the Convention be authorized to print — copies of the debates and proceedings of the Convention in book form.

Mr. BORDEN had moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "Printer to the Convention," and inserting "State Printer."

Mr. BORDEN said, he wished to make one further observation in relation to this subject. It would seem, said Mr. B., from the manner in which the debates have been published so far, that nothing goes upon the journal of debates but such resolutions and propositions as are debated, and that such as are not debated are not published at all. This will lead inevitably to the publication of two volumes. Now I observe that in other States were Conventions have been held, all the proceedings and debates are uniformly incorporated in one volume, and I do not know why it should not be so here. I do not see the necessity for having two volumes. And I call the attention of the Convention, at this time, to the subject, because I think it is due to those gentlemen on this floor who do not participate in the debate, that those propositions which they present should go into the published proceedings, as well as the propositions which are debated. This condition of things has been brought about, as gentlemen will recollect, by the adoption of a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) not now in his seat.

The question being taken on the motion to refer, it was agreed to, and the resolution was referred to the select committee.

Mr. BORDEN, from the committee on the practice of law and law reform, reported the following section:

Sec. —. All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name of, and by the authority of, the State, and the style of the process shall be "The State of Indiana."

The Section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

Mr. BARBOUR from the committee on county and township organization reported the following section, which was read and passed to a second reading to-morrow:

Sec. —. No county shall subscribe for stock, in any incorporated company, unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription, nor shall any county loan her credit to, or borrow money for the purpose of taking stock in any incorporation.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of article Second, reported from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

Mr. HENDRICKS inquired if that portion of the article which had been amended on the motion of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) was susceptible of further amendment.

The PRESIDENT. What is the character of the amendment which the gentleman desires to propose?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The section as it now reads, is to this effect:

"There shall not be imprisonment for debt, but a debtor fraudulently concealing his property, &c.," I propose to make it read "There shall be no imprisonment for debt, but a debtor refusing to surrender, &c."

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman proposes to strike out anything that has been already voted upon and adopted by the Convention, it is not in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, sir, I will move to amend by adding the following words:

"To such extent as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. OWEN. Will it be in order for any one voting with the majority to move a reconsideration of the vote by which a portion of the section has been stricken out, so as to give the gentleman an opportunity to introduce his amendment?

The PRESIDENT. The rule requires that such a motion shall lie over one day.

Mr. BORDEN. It may be done, I apprehend, by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman give notice of a motion to re-consider?

Mr. OWEN. No, sir. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. KILGORE. It seems to me that this matter may be easily disposed of. I believe that a motion was made yesterday, by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) with the view of making the section as perfect as possible. I ask if the object of the gentleman over the way (Mr. Hendricks) cannot be accomplished by proposing to amend by adding to that which has been inserted?

The PRESIDENT. That is the motion which the gentleman has now made.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Shelby, it was not agreed to.

Mr. OWEN moved to strike out the section and insert the following:

"There shall not be imprisonment for debt; but laws may be passed for the punishment, by imprisonment or otherwise, of a debtor who shall fraudulently conceal, or refuse to surrender, his property."

Mr. OWEN said, he would state to the Convention why he made this motion. It would be remembered that it was on his motion that the section was amended yesterday. It had been suggested to him since, by the gentleman from Hancock, he believed, and by other gentlemen also, that as the section now stood it was not positive and definite. It was not positive and definite, because it did not show what the remedy was, whether by suit to be prosecuted by an individual for the recovery of a debt, or at the instance of the State, as a criminal prosecution. I believe (said Mr. Owen) that the section, as I now propose to make it, will have, in every respect, the same force, except that it separates entirely the two subjects. I say there shall not be imprisonment for debt, but I provide further, that a law may be passed by the Legislature making the fraudulent withholding or concealing of property a criminal offense. It seems to me that that is the proper mode of disposing of the subject.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. Is it in order to call for a division of the question?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order. A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

Mr. DUNN. I think, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) ought not to be adopted. The effect of it will be to deprive the creditor of all remedy or means for the recovery of his debt. It is but a poor consolation, when he sees his debtor pocket his money and refuse to pay him, to be told that he may be punished for fraud, by an action on behalf of the State. I think that we ought to protect the rights of the creditor. It was for that purpose that I introduced my resolution yesterday. I am in favor of imprisoning all the fraudulent scoundrels in the State.

[Cries of "consent."]

Mr. OWEN. I desire to say only a few words, if no other gentleman wishes to speak before the question is taken on my amendment. The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) says he is in favor of imprisoning all the dishonest scoundrels in the State; I am afraid, sir, if such a thing should take place, that our penitentiaries would be very much crowded. [Laughter.] But to look at the matter seriously. The question is not whether the dishonest debtor shall be imprisoned, but whether he shall be imprisoned upon the action and at the pleasure of the creditor, or at the instance of the State, and according to the provisions of the criminal law. Now, in my judgment, it is not a matter which ought to be left in the hands of the creditor, smarting, it may be, under losses—actuated, perhaps, by motives of revenge. The imprisonment should be, not for debt, not even for the sake of extorting the disclosure of hidden property, but simply as the punishment of fraudulent conduct towards the creditor. It is with these views that I have moved the amendment.

Mr. WALPOLE. The amendment, Mr. President, proposed by the member from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) will be of no service to the creditor. Almost from the organization of our State Government there has been a law, making it indictable and punishable for a person to assign or transfer his property to defraud creditors. I have not known of a prosecution under the law, and doubtless hundreds of cases of fraudulent transfers have occurred. I am of the decided opinion that should the amendment be adopted, it would encourage fraudulent transfers, rather than suppress them. The gentleman's sympathies seem to be all on the side of the debtor that fraudulently transfers or conceals his property. Will he sustain fraud, and allow the unoffending creditor to be deprived of a remedy against the person of his fraudulent debtor? Such will be the effect of his proposition—a proposition that I cannot consent to, and hope will not be adopted. Our sympathies, as well as those of our legislators, for years, have run in one current to protect the debtor, without discrimination between the unfortunate and fraudulent.

Is not the creditor to be protected against fraud? Shall he have no remedy against the person of the debtor in cases of fraudulent transferring and concealing of property, which he should surrender?

I will go as far as any gentleman, to protect the unfortunate debtor from imprisonment for debt, in a word there should be no imprisonment for debt; unless the debtor fraudulently transfers or conceals his property and estate; then the exemption should be withdrawn, the creditor then should have the benefit of law to operate upon the person of such fraudulent debtor, until the property or estate, or as much as may be necessary, be surrendered to discharge the debt.

The state of public opinion requires this—with less it will not be satisfied.

The position of a law maker is not worth having when those holding such places pander to such influences as protect fraud. The gentleman says he is for making fraud an indictable and punishable offense. I have said what I suppose is well known to every member, that this is and has been the law for many years; that conviction under the law will result to the benefit of the State, but not to the creditor; it will not cause the debtor to surrender up his concealed property or estate, to satisfy the demand of the creditor; the debtor may still keep the concealed property or estate, notwithstanding the course taken. Let us then provide that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud. The creditor will be satisfied, the unfortunate debtor will be protected and satisfied, and no one will object unless it be the debtor who fraudulently transfers or conceals his property and estate.

Mr. DOBSON. It seems difficult to arrange a section on this subject to the satisfaction of the Convention. My original idea was that we should just insert in the new Constitution the short, plain section, no imprisonment for debt, for that practically expresses the public sentiment of this State.

I would remark further, that the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) will carry out that idea, no imprisonment for debt, and will also imprison and punish the debtor for fraud. I am opposed to imprisoning a man for debt at all, but fraud on the part of the debtor I would make a criminal offence, and when he surrendered up his property I would discharge him.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) says, that there is upon the Statute Book a law of that kind, and that it has not been enforced for five years.

Mr. WALPOLE (interposing). It has never been enforced to my knowledge, during that period.

Mr. DOBSON. Of course that is what I understood the gentleman to say. I would inquire of the gentleman if he has ever seen at any time, a man imprisoned, in Indiana, for debt.

Mr. WALPOLE. I have, but it was a long time since. It was the case of a very unfortunate debtor. [A laugh.]

Mr. DOBSON. Public sentiment has been growing more and more enlightened upon this subject for the last several years. When I first came into the State it was a common thing to imprison for debt. The corporation limits then were the bounds. The next step was to have the limits of the county for bounds; and that is the case I believe now. You might as well, after dropping a pebble in the water, expect that the extended circles produced by such action, will come back again to the centre, as expect public opinion to come back to the jail walls again. Thus we are retaining a principle upon the Statute Book which is not enforced. We hold out to the world that we imprison men for debt, when we never do it. There has been no imprisonment for debt, to my knowledge, for several years.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) desires to have all the debtor's property before he will let him out. When he surrenders all his estate then he is in favor of discharging him. I thought, sir, that it was the law of the land that the debtor should be secured a homestead at least.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson (interposing). I will explain to the gentleman from Owen, that I expressed myself in favor of discharging the debtor after he had surrendered up such property as was prescribed by law.

Mr. DOBSON. I was simply replying to what I supposed to be the gentleman's argument. I think, sir, there would be a better state of society if we should punish the debtor who committed fraud like any other man who should commit an offense against the law. The distinction should be made between an honest and a fraudulent debtor, and if the fraudulent debtor is to be punished at all, let him be punished at the instance of the State as he would be for any other crime; and not by the individual creditor—that punishment to be for the fraud, and not because he was in debt. There may be many dishonest individuals in the State—but the law is sufficient now to punish them, and if not it can easily be made so.

Mr. HOLMAN. The section as it now stands amended, proposes to give the creditor a remedy for the collection of his debt by imprisonment, when that debt is coupled with a fraud. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) proposes that there shall be no imprisonment for debt as a remedial agent—but that fraud coupled with debt shall be prosecuted solely as a criminal offense. In England it was not unusual under the common law that offenses now punishable in this State only as criminal offenses, were left to the control of the prosecutor. For instance, in the case of a man guilty of an assault and battery; prosecution was instituted under the common law by information at the instance of the party injured, and the prosecuting witnesses might at any time compromise the matter as to the private injury sustained, and dismiss the prosecution. In that instance the law guaranteed the right of prosecuting in the form of a criminal complaint for the purpose of punishing and redressing private injury, and gave to the party injured the right to compound. I consider the principle under consideration somewhat similar. The idea of imprisonment for debt is abandoned. The time was when debt and inability to pay were regarded as criminal and punished as such. A more enlightened policy now prevails. There may be imprisonment for debt coupled with fraud, and that imprisonment be made use of only as a remedial agent, and not for the punishment of the fraud as a matter of merely criminal prosecution.

It has been well remarked by gentlemen, that an enlightened policy in regard to this question has been rapidly growing up amongst our people. For the last ten or twelve years a feeling of liberal and enlightened humanity has been increasing, not only in this State, but in the other States of the Union. I presume that in none of the States is debt and inability to pay regarded as a crime; and yet in most of the States and throughout the civilized world, debt coupled with fraud is placed, to some extent, on the same footing with criminal offenses, and the law with its coercive influence, to a limited extent, comes to the aid of the creditor in the enforcement of his claim against a fraudulent debtor. I am inclined to think that imprisonment simply for debt, unconnected with fraud, should never be tolerated, but where fraud is coupled with the indebtedness, manifestly it is to the interest of the people of Indiana that some remedial agent should be adopted calculated to reach the fraud and give the creditor a sufficient remedy. There are statutes making it highly penal to transfer property with a view of defrauding the creditor, or to obtain goods under false pretences, yet the enforcement of those statutes against the perpetrators of either of those offenses could produce no personal benefit to the party injured, the penalty imposed would go to the State, and the party injured would be without remedy unless an execution could effect the object by the seizure of property, or the party committing fraud could be reached by process against his person. If it is intended that the debt shall be collected and the fraudulent debtor have means with which to pay, but nothing on which to levy an execution, his effects can be reached only by his imprisonment, and he would then be compelled to surrender the means under his control, in order to obtain his discharge. Favoring a law of this character, calculated only to reach the fraud, I think the section as amended should be adopted.

I do not think, sir, that the people of Indiana are prepared to countenance fraud, or give it protection by destroying the agents by which it may be reached, and I believe they are opposed to imprisonment for debt, unless that debt is coupled with some fraudulent act.

The amendment of the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) proposed that the debtor shall deliver up his property to the extent and in such manner as may be prescribed by law, and a section also has been reported providing that it is the privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life. This is a safe and wholesome provision, and I have no doubt will be adopted, and it will secure to the debtor whether honest or not, a reasonable support for his wife and children. Humanity and the true interests of the State demand this, for the State is certainly interested in securing every citizen from want. But to say that no remedy whatever, except by execution against property, shall exist when fraud is coupled with a debt, as a direct remedial agent, is unjust, and unfairly overlooks the rights of the creditor, and is a measure which I trust will not receive the sanction of this Convention.

I am opposed to imprisonment for debt, but I am willing to give to the creditor a sufficient remedy against the dishonest debtor, who while able to pay the just demand against him, would hide himself behind the inability of the law to reach the fraud he may be willing to perpetrate upon the rights of an honest and unsuspecting creditor. But poverty should never be punished as a crime.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Posey by striking out the word "property," where it occurs at the end of the amendment, and inserting the words "estate, and the person of the fraudulent debtor shall not be continued in prison after he shall have surrendered his estate for the benefit of his creditor or creditors, in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

This change, Mr. N. contended, would give to the section a more enlarged signification than if it contained the word "property." It did seem to him, that gentlemen on the opposite side to themselves meant to get at the same thing they were contending for. They desired that there should be a reasonable provision made in the statute of frauds for the preservation of the creditor from the fraudulent designs of a debtor. I contend, continued Mr. N., that it is better to adopt the section before us, if, on consideration, it shall be made to read, that, whenever the creditor conceals his estate, he shall be imprisoned; and that he shall be discharged only when he makes compensation for the injury done to the creditor; that is, he may be discharged in the manner prescribed by law upon surrendering such portion of his estate as the creditors may require, and fulfilling such duties as the law may impose upon him. If these things are done, I say, he may be discharged, whether he has acted fraudulently or not.

The unfortunate debtor, who may have acted fraudulently, should have the means of extrication, so that he may again mix with the world, and become, if possible, a good and useful citizen. And whenever he makes such a surrender as, in the eye of the law, may be deemed sufficient to satisfy the demands of the creditor—at the same time such an one as will not deprive his own family of the necessities of life—whenever, I say, he has thus complied with the terms of the law, he should be discharged. Gentlemen do not seem to wish that the fraudulent debtor shall be continued in prison without any means of discharge. They desire that he may go free upon a satisfactory compromise with the creditor, or after making such disgorgement of his means as society and the law shall say is right; and it appears to me that the amendment I propose will accomplish that object. The fraudulent debtor, be it understood, shall not go forth from prison holding a large amount of property, but a fair proportion of it shall be applied for the payment of his creditors. My amendment, which I think will effect this object, which I will read again, provides that the "person of a fraudulent debtor shall not be confined in prison after he shall have surrendered up his estate for the benefit of his creditor or creditors, in such manner as may be prescribed by law." If this amendment is inserted in the original section in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Owen, as I have proposed, it will, I think, attain the object all seem desirous of accomplishing.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the original amendment by striking out all after the word "debt," in the first line, and inserting the words "except in the case of the debtor who fraudulently conceals or withholds his property or effects, he shall be imprisoned." That, he said, would cover the whole ground.

The amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I had no desire, Mr. President, to say anything whatever on this subject. I have no doubt that it is the unanimous opinion of this Convention that no man shall be imprisoned simply for debt. That is the settled opinion of every gentleman here, I presume. The object seems to be to incorporate something in the Constitution providing that imprisonment for debt shall not exist, but that a fraudulent debtor shall not be released until he shall have delivered up his concealed property.

I think, sir, that the way in which we are going on will make a section that will not be, very suitable to the views of any of the members; and it strikes my mind that the better plan will be to re-commit the section to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State. I move, therefore, sir, that the section be recommitted, with instructions to report a section embracing the doctrine contained in the following article, without being particular as to the language:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt; but in cases of fraud, established by law, the fraudulent debtor shall not be entitled to the benefits of this act."

The PRESIDENT. The question now before the Convention is upon re-committing the section under consideration to the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, with instructions.

Mr. NILES. So far as I can gather the views of the Convention, there seems to be no difference of opinion on two points: first, that an honest debtor shall never be imprisoned for debt; and secondly, that the creditor shall not be deprived of all civil remedy against the fraudulent debtor. The property of a debtor, which is fraudulently concealed or secreted, cannot be directly reached by ordinary process. The right, then, temporarily to imprison the person of the fraudulent debtor, is the only method of compelling him to pay his debts. Should this indirect remedy be refused, it is evident that no civil remedy would exist against him. We desire, then, in the fewest possible words, to protect the honest debtor from imprisonment, and to permit the only possible civil remedy against the fraudulent debtor.

Now, I wish to recall attention to the section as reported by the committee, and which, with the omission of the three words "strong presumption of," seems to me clearly to be just what we want. It would then read: There shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in case of fraud. As remarked a day or two since by my friend from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) I should greatly prefer that language to the amendments now under consideration; and were it now in order, I would move its adoption in that form. We should then fully protect the honest debtor, but would leave it discretionary with the Legislature to authorize such civil remedy against the fraudulent debtor as they might think wise and proper. We cannot presume that they would adopt harsh and vindictive measures, or give unreasonable power into the hands of the creditor.

Mr. READ of Monroe. There appears to be a great uniformity of feeling in regard to the question whether there shall be any imprisonment for debt. I presume there is very little difference of opinion in this Convention in regard to the policy, propriety, and humanity, of imprisoning a man for debt.

The PRESIDENT. The question before the Convention is upon re-committing the subject under discussion with instructions. The gentleman from Monroe will please confine his remarks to the propriety of re-committing.

Mr. READ. I suppose it will be perfectly in order to present an argument against the reference, if I can demonstrate that something better can be done than to make such a reference.

I know of no necessity for referring the section for such a purpose, because I do not think it will answer the object contemplated by the mover. There is no imprisonment for debt now under the statute, except in cases of fraud, and I would be willing to restrain the Legislature, if it is thought proper by the Convention, in terms something like this: "No imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraudulent concealment or alienation of property." It is a wrong thing when the creditor is in pursuit of his debt to maintain in security the person of his debtor, if he has fraudulently concealed or transferred his property to avoid paying his debts, and protect him in the enjoyment of his liberty. The fact of a debtor being honest will always protect his person. I do not desire by this provision to divert the attention of the creditor from his debtor. When the creditor aims a blow at him, it must be through the administration of the law, or else it is a blow struck at the natural liberties of the people.

My theory of government is this: that when we become members of a civil government, we surrender our right to redress our own wrongs. One of those wrongs is, where a debt is incurred and attempt is made by fraud to avoid payment of it; and here the government stipulates to give us ample and speedy redress for our wrongs. I do not pretend that the power to incarcerate a debtor for a debt honestly incurred is a power that government should guarantee to us; but I do assert that the exercise of that power is one of the means for exposing a debtor who fraudulently conceals his property for the purpose of avoiding payment of debt. If there be an allegation of fraud, I hold the same process is good against the debtor for the collection of debt, and that he should be incarcerated until the allegation of fraudulent concealment shall be investigated. By this very means, which is connected with the administration of justice, if a debtor is pursued wrongfully and without cause, the man who wrongs him is made liable in a court of justice for all the injuries he may inflict on the debtor. How, I ask, can we fulfil the obligations of government, unless we provide ample means for developing frauds of this character. If you take away the power of incarcerating the person of the fraudulent debtor, you deprive the creditor of the only mode in which he can obtain the restitution of his concealed property.

I propose then, sir, to leave this power of attaching the person of the debtor to the courts of justice. It has been heretofore, as it is now, left to courts of justice under the law and the Constitution. I have heard of no difficulty resulting in this State, so far, from the operation of those provisions.

There is another question involved, and that is, the humanity of this provision. There is not one man in twenty-five that ever wants to take the benefit of a law exempting the body from imprisonment under any circumstances; and will you, by passing such a law, mar this beautiful system of ours, which is so well calculated to disclose fraud. Will you defeat the ends of justice for the purpose of saving the personal liberty of one twenty-fifth part of the community?

What I would prefer above all things, sir, is that you change the present Constitution so that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraudulent concealment or alienation of property. The proposition then stands, that there shall be no imprisonment for debt itself, but imprisonment only for debts on fraudulent concealment, &c. My object is to make the imprisonment one of the means for disclosing the fraud. I desire to give the honest creditor every means for finding out the fraudulent debtor; and this, too, for a reason I have not mentioned, and that is, because the current of popular feeling runs in favor of the debtor, and therefore, he is enabled, in many instances, to get clear. Therefore it is, I desire to make imprisonment for debt one of the means for disclosing fraud and preventing the escape of the individual who practices it. I do not care, sir, how ample you make the means of reparation, for the benefit of the upright creditor. If the debtor is reasonably and unjustly pressed, he has his remedy in the courts of justice. The law hitherto, in my opinion, has been too much relaxed in favor of the debtor.

Mr. RITCHEY. I hope that this section will not be referred again to the committee who reported it. I think we are as well prepared to act upon it now as if it were to be referred and reported back again and a new discussion had upon it. This question is to be decided upon discussion, and I believe it has been discussed now until nearly every member of the Convention has given his opinion, particularly in regard to imprisonment for debt. I desire, without any reference, to see a vote taken on these various amendments.

For myself, sir, I agree with the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) that all this Convention should do is to declare, in the new Constitution, very nearly in the language of the report first presented by the committee, that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, and then leave it for the legislature to provide remedies for the collection of debt, and the punishment of the fraud. I think that such a clause would be more appropriate in our Constitution than one more detailed or abstruse. I am not sure that I am willing to say that there should be no imprisonment for debt; but in cases of fraud, I am clearly of opinion there should be an incarceration of the person of the fraudulent debtor—and I think the provision, providing that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, should be connected with one providing that there should be no imprisonment, except in cases of fraud on the part of the debtor.

I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) because it makes a fraudulent debt a criminal case, and the creditor who commences the prosecution for debt, has to wait until the meeting of the grand jury—if this Convention does not abolish the system—and if they indict the fraudulent debtor, then he has to wait the result of the criminal prosecution. Suppose the grand jury, after the matter is laid before them, return the debtor, then the creditor may have to wait six months for the meeting of the court that is to try him, before the affair can be settled. The grand jury must, of necessity, have an investigation of the affair, before the prosecutor can carry it into court. Now, I prefer, sir, that the creditor shall have his remedy at once, and that that remedy shall be had through the medium of a civil process. I prefer that there should be a process for the collection of debt so formed, that the question may be determined as soon as the creditor makes his complaint, whether the debtor shall be imprisoned or not. With all deference to the gentleman who moves this re-commitment, I think we are just as well prepared to vote upon it now as at any future period; and a vote taken now, will save the time of the Convention.

Mr. WATTS. I wish to say a word or two, sir, in opposition to the motion to re-commit, with instructions. I think this Convention should make a distinction between debts honestly contracted, and debts fraudulently contracted. If we are disposed to disregard all distinctions between debts honestly and debts dishonestly contracted, why, then, we may pass the motion to re-commit with instructions.

It would, sir, be but a poor consolation to me, after having been swindled out of a large portion of my means, to seek my remedy against the swindler in a court of justice, through an action of fraud. The swindler would possess my means to defend himself in the suit thus brought against him, and I, dispossessed of nearly all my means, would rather decline going to law and using up the balance of the property I might have left.

I admit, you cannot imprison an honest man now; nor can you at any time. You could not make a law in this State to imprison one. Public opinion would not sanction it; it would frown it down. No honest man could be got further than the jail door—for he surrenders up his effects under the insolvent law—that law leaving him a sufficiency to live upon, and, after that, you cannot imprison him. Nothing, sir, will make the fraudulent debtor disgorge his ill-gotten gains, but the fear of being shut up in jail. A man defrauds his creditor out of his property and you say he must go to a court of law to obtain it. Now, sir, of late I have been constrained to think that I never again will resort to a court to obtain justice. The only good resulting from going to court is, that it puts an end to litigation, and I will tell you how. A man resorts to court for a redress of his rights, and, through the medium of some technicality, he is thrown out of court, and has the privilege of going home and working harder than ever, to make up for his losses. This is what I call putting an effectual stop to litigation. [Laughter.] I am in favor of courts for that reason, considering that there is a manifest impropriety in going into courts of justice, for the sake of obtaining justice. [Merriment].

I trust that some more effectual and speedy remedy will be provided for the punishment of the fraudulent debtor, than that of entering into a suit at law. I hope the motion to re-commit will not prevail.

Mr. COOKERLY expressed himself as opposed to imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud. Not wishing to detain the Convention, after the lengthy debate that had taken place on the subject, he desired to know whether this subject had been re-committed or not? If it had, he wished to offer a resolution of instruction.

The PRESIDENT. A motion to re-commit with instructions, is pending now.

Mr. COOKERLY. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken upon re-committing the section under consideration.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I desire, Mr. President, to say a word or two before the question is taken upon the motion to re-commit. The instructions, which I had the honor to offer, provided, first, that the honest debtor shall not be imprisoned for debt; and secondly, that the dishonest debtor, if the fact of his fraud is established by law, shall be imprisoned, for that dishonesty. I am not particular, however, as to the instructions.

The gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) thinks it is not important to recommit. I think it is. After all that has been said upon the subject I think that the committee who framed the section first presented for our consideration, will have learned something in respect to the opinions of the members of this Convention, and will be better prepared to frame a section embracing the views of a majority of the Convention, and in better style, and with less words, than it will be possible to make it if we continue to amend, and then pass it as amended. I think it is due, also, to the committee who first reported this section that it should be re-committed, and that the committee have time to reconsider this subject, and present to us a section in better shape. I am quite willing to withdraw the instructions, that the section be re-committed without instructions.

Mr. WALPOLE. I move to refer the section to a select committee, with instructions to report the same back, so that it shall read: "there shall not be imprisonment for debt except in case of fraud."

The PRESIDENT. The motion to refer to a standing committee has precedence.

Mr. WALPOLE. Then I will move to amend the motion by adding the following instructions: "and that said committee shall make no other corrections in the section as originally reported, except that of striking out the words 'strong presumption of.'"

Mr. FARROW. Is it in order to amend now?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to amend the instructions.

Mr. FARROW. Then I move to amend the instructions as follows: add after the word "fraud," "Provided, The privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted."

A motion was made to lay the amendment to the instructions upon the table.

This motion was agreed to; and the question recurred upon the adoption of Mr. Walpole's instructions.

They were agreed to without a division; so the first section was re-committed.

Mr. BASCOM. Is it in order to amend the second section now?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir. The consideration of the second section is next in order.

The second section of the report was then read by the Secretary; it is as follows:

SECTION.—In all civil cases where the amount in controversy shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars, and in all criminal cases whatever, the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

Mr. BASCOM. Mr. PRESIDENT: I offer the following amendment to this section: strike out all between the word "civil" in the first line, and the word "criminal" in the second line, and insert the word "and."

Mr. WALPOLE. I propose to amend the amendment by substituting these words: "in all civil and criminal cases, the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate."

Mr. BASCOM. I accept the modification.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I propose to amend the amendment as follows: strike out the words "cases where the amount in controversy shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; and then Mr. Bascom's amendment was adopted.

Mr. RITCHEY. I would suggest a further amendment of the section by striking out the words "civil and criminal," so that it will read "in all cases whatever," &c.

The PRESIDENT. At this stage of the proceedings it will not be in order to strike out, the Convention having striken out the whole section and inserted new matter, which must stand as the judgment of the Convention.

The second section was adopted; and the consideration of the third section of the report being announced, it was read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

SECTION —. No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of free-holders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal.

Mr. KILGORE. I propose to amend the third section as follows:

Strike out all after the word "taken" in the second line and insert "or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, or without a just compensation being made therefor."

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to strike out and insert a new clause in lieu of the whole section, by way of amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I offer the following: strike out the words "without the consent of his representatives, or," and insert after the word "being" the word "first."

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, I hope, sir, that this section will not be amended in any particular. I have carefully examined it, and am satisfied that it provides just what ought to be provided to protect the property of individuals from inroads which are frequently made upon them by persons acting under corporate powers; the language of the section is: "No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of free-holders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of repeal."

This section, sir, is carefully worded, and in such a manner as to prevent those practices of oppression which have grown up under the operations of incorporated companies in this State. It has been customary for them to enter upon the premises of a private citizen and take away even the soil from the farmer, and the individual has been left without any means of protecting himself from such an encroachment. Now it is proposed in this section that they must first tender to the owner a just compensation for his property, together with the expenses of the proceeding, and if he does not accept of the money so tendered, it shall not bar the right of appeal. Both parties have this right of appeal. But formerly these companies might enter and destroy a man's property, and if the owner entered into litigation for his rights, it has often happened that before the suit was terminated, the company were found to be either irresponsible or they had left the country, and so the owner would be helpless as to his remedy. I think if gentlemen will look at this matter they will see that every such case of oppression which can possibly arise is provided for by this section. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will allow it to remain as it is, to protect our constituents from the consequences of oppression which have been so often felt and inflicted by those acting in behalf of incorporated companies.

Mr. KILGORE. My object in proposing this amendment was to leave this provision of the Constitution as nearly in the shape it was before as possible. I suppose that there is not a single section in the old Constitution upon which there has been more litigation than upon the one now under consideration, and the decisions of the courts thereupon are well understood, so that now if we propose a radical change in this provision, it could not but operate prejudicially to all the interests of the State, except the interests of the individual who chooses to remain wholly unwilling to surrender anything for the public good. The section is reported now, and as it now stands requires that the party who seeks to take private property shall first have the damages assessed by a jury of free-holders. To that clause I object as being anti-democratic. This compensation must be first assessed and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, before a single step can be taken. I do not know what is to be understood by the expenses here. The owner can certainly ask no more from the company than that his damages shall be paid to him. I do not see how he could ask for expenses, or what expenses could be incurred. If he gets his damages it seems to me that this is all he should ask for.

We have been latterly engaged in constructing works of public improvement in various parts of the State, and frequently we have had to encounter troublesome customers, demanding an exorbitant price for their land. Well, in assessing the value of such lands, in the first place we ought to consider the probable advantage that would accrue to the owner by the construction of the work. But in the change which is here proposed, this matter is left wholly out of view. Before we have a right to take and possess property for works of public improvement, a jury is to be empaneled and the full value of such property is to be assessed and tendered to the owner, together with the expenses arising out of these proceedings, before we can take the first step toward giving to the owner the advantage of a thoroughfare through his property. This, I contend, is unfair. If the public is to be benefited by such a work of improvement, the owner, as a citizen, will also be benefited. Besides, every man owes something to the community, and if the value of the owner's farm is to be enhanced by it, the property taken can be nothing but an imaginary wrong to the owner. Surely, then, he should not ask that damages should be assessed and tendered, together with the full value of his property, before a single step can be taken in the construction of such a work. Take the case of the construction of the great thoroughfare between this place and Lafayette, and suppose all the owners of property upon the road are willing to give the right of way for a fair valuation, except one farmer who is disposed to resist. What is to be done? Must everything stand still till a jury can say what shall be the damages and expenses which may be incurred, notwithstanding the value of the property of the individual may be enhanced fourfold? We have had frequent adjudications of this question, and it has uniformly been held that in assessing the value of property taken, it is proper to take into consideration the advantages which are to accrue to the owner. I am willing, however, to leave this matter with the Legislature, to provide such regulations and restrictions as they may see proper in the charter of every such company. But let us not change the Constitution in this respect, for it might prove to be very troublesome.

Mr. BIDDLE. If I understand the order, the first question is upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn is out of order—being a substitute for the whole section: whereas the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) proposes to strike out only a portion of the section.

Mr. BIDDLE. That raises the same point. I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, because I am satisfied with the section as reported by the committee, with some exceptions as to phraseology, which, I think, can be bettered. I am not particular whether payment shall be made before or afterwards, but I am opposed to any proposition by which property can be taken from an individual without compensation, and I deny that the State can take property, in such a way, for any purpose whatever. What is the difficulty? It is because under the old Constitution, the courts have decided that the representatives may bind the citizens.

It is well known, Mr. President, by a law of the land, regulating criminal prosecutions, unless conviction follows, the witnesses and officers of the court shall not be entitled to cost: and we shall labor under the very same difficulty if the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware shall prevail.

I lay it down as an undamental principle, that no State authority can take away one cent of the property of the citizen, without compensation. I agree that the State may command the services and property of the citizen, against his will, but not against his will and without compensation therefor.

As the law now stands, any person may be taken the length and the breadth of the State, from one extreme to the other, without any compensation whatever, and their attendance may be compelled, and often is, by recognizance and attachment. And this law has been held by the Supreme Court as constitutional, for the reason, as I have before said, that the representatives may bind the citizen. It is my wish, therefore, to strike at this power, so that the State shall not have power to take from the citizen his property or command his service, which it is not lawful for one citizen to take from another. The moment that a State undertakes to govern without doing equal and exact justice to all, that moment such a government becomes oppressive. It is sufficient that the State shall take his property and command his services against the will of the citizen. This may be necessary to the State sovereignty. But to take his property and command his services against his will and without a just compensation therefor, is a flagrant violation of one of the first principles of justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment to the amendment: strike out the words "without the consent of his representatives or," and insert after the word "being" the word "first," and it will then read: "No man's personal service shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law or applied to public use without just compensation being first made therefor."

Mr. HOLMAN said, I am opposed to any man's property being taken and applied to public use without his consent unless a just compensation shall have been first made for the injury he will sustain. A reasonable construction of the section on this subject in the old Constitution is, that no man's private property should be taken or applied to public use without one of two things, either that it should be done by the consent of his representatives, or that a just compensation should be made for the same. I think that under no circumstances should one man be deprived of his property and the public benefited without the party benefited being required to justly indemnify the party who is to be deprived of his property without his consent.

I am in favor of the amendment because it fully secures the citizen and at the same time the language of the old Constitution is almost literally retained. I am opposed to changing the language or phraseology of the old Constitution any more than is necessary to effect the necessary reform. Our people have grown up under the Constitution of 1816; they are familiar with its language and the courts have given it its proper legal constructions; its provisions are also familiar to our citizens, and neither the language nor the provisions of that instrument should be changed unless there may be a necessity for the innovation, and then only to the extent that experience has proved to be necessary.

The committee that reported the section under consideration have thought proper to make a material change both in the phraseology and spirit of the section on this subject in the old Constitution. I think the slight change proposed by the amendment fully remedies the evil, if any existed, under the Constitution we have met to revise.

Where the language in the old Constitution is sufficiently clear and explicit to express the purpose intended, and the principle itself so expressed is to be retained, I think prudence would dictate that the language itself should be literally retained. If changes are to be made let them be as limited as a just regard to the end to be accomplished will admit of.

I hope the Convention will manifest a desire to retain the language of the present Constitution where it can be done, and that we may not be carried away too far by a reckless spirit of innovation and a wild desire for unnecessary reform. I think the only just objection that existed to the section in the old Constitution relative to the appropriation of private property to public uses are sufficiently remedied by the proposed amendments.

Mr. PETTIT. It is because the language of this section is explicit in its character, and obliges the corporator to first pay the damages to the owner, that I approve of it as reported by the committee. My object is to address the Convention a few minutes with reference to the evils and impositions which have grown out of the examinations of the language of the section in the old Constitution, which this is to take the place of.

It is probable that a man of plain and straightforward intentions, could have understood this in the first place, but it has been refined upon by the decisions of the court, and frittered down until it means nothing at all. It has come to be no security at all to the citizen. The language of the section is, "that no man's particular services"—I confess that I do not know what is meant by "particular services," but the section is: "That no man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken, or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, or without just compensation being made therefor." Now, one would naturally consider that section to be sufficient guarantee against all cases of oppression of this kind—seeing that no man's services or property can be taken by the State, or by his fellow-citizens, without a just compensation being made therefor. Notwithstanding this provision, we have laws compelling a witness to go from end to end of the State, to testify in a criminal prosecution without compensation, unless the trial results in the conviction of the prisoner, a law which I look upon as being not only oppressive, but manifestly inconsistent with this provision of the Constitution.

Sir, if the object of punishing crime, or a violation of the law, is not sufficiently desirable to be worth paying the expenses of a trial, the practice should be dropped. There is no reason why a man, who happens to be unwillingly and unwittingly present, where a violation of the law has been committed, should be dragged all over the State as a witness, without pay. I say there is no reason in this, and therefore, I concur with the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle), in saying that this ought not to be done without compensation, even if it were done by the consent of his representatives.

But, contemplating this section in another light, I have thought that it secured to the citizen the pre-payment of the just value of his property, before it could be taken for public use. But I have been mistaken with reference to this provision, for the judges have made nothing at all of it. They have followed the decisions of the judges of the State of New York, who have decided that the State may go on and take any amount of property from the citizen, only promising to pay for it. The courts have gone so far as to say that this is sufficient; for it is not to be presumed but that the State is both honest, and just, and willing, and has the capacity to pay; because it has the power actually to sink the whole of the property of the State, in order to the payment of the public debts. The judges of our State have been following exactly in the wake of these decisions. They have said that our State, though floundering under the weight of millions of debt, and, though really not worth a farthing, shall have credit, and that her faith and credit shall be good. Well sir, I am sorry to say, for a moment, that the faith and credit of our State is not very good. But if this decision were only constitutional, it would not be so erroneous as perhaps it is. The courts of New York have, however, gone still farther; they have said that the Legislature may vest their sovereignty in corporations, so far as to authorize them to go on and take individual property, and condemn it for their own use, by merely promising to pay for it. To be sure the Legislature have required corporations to provide a fund for the payment of this class of debts, but they leave it for the individual to get his pay out of the State if he can.

It is for this reason that I want to retain the precise language of this section, as it was reported by the committee. No more precise and unambiguous terms than these could be devised; so that neither the State, nor any other authority can take away a man's property or his services, without first tendering a full and complete compensation therefor. It is for the very reason that it is democratic, and just, and equal, that I want this section retained. If it is necessary for the public benefit that private property should be taken, those who are benefitted by it ought certainly to make payment to the owner. A single individual ought never be compelled to suffer for the public benefit. Where is the justice in giving power to an incorporated company, to go on and destroy the property of an individual, and to say to him, wait sir, till our road gets into operation, and we will pay you? Why make such an individual suffer for their benefit? Or, if the whole State make this work, and this principle be allowed, the State will not stop to indemnify the citizen.

There is no language, as I have said before, which can so completely secure this object, as that employed in the section reported by the committee. It meets my most hearty approbation. The language of the old Constitution was uncertain; and the decisions of the court have made it yet more uncertain.

"No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation." This is the first sentence of the section. This would cover the case referred to by the gentleman from Cass, though it does not provide that compensation shall be pre-paid. But the law under this provision would take care that all witnesses should be paid if the party were convicted, and, whether convicted or not, if the witnesses should not be paid within a reasonable time, say within three or six months after the trial, the provision would be, that the amount of their fees should be charged against the State Treasury. The language of the section would authorize a law to this purpose, although it would not authorize a law to provide that the fees of all such witnesses should be pre-paid, but only that the faith of the State should be pledged for their payment.

But the next clause of the section is peculiarly fitting. It secures every man, in his property, against the hand of the Legislature, or his representatives. It says, "That no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation, assessed by a jury of freeholders."

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) thinks this language is anti-democratic, because it excludes those who are not freeholders. But the reason of this is obvious; because in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it will be real property that is taken—property of the freehold. These men—freeholders—holding a similar kind of property, and being acquainted with its value, it is no more than appropriate that a jury of such men should be called for the purpose of assessing such compensation. It seems to me that no reasonable objection could possibly be raised against this provision. The section goes on to provide further "That these damages shall be first assessed, and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding; to the owner." This affords the citizen security in the following case: The agent of a corporation comes to me in these proceedings and says, "I want to condemn your land for the purpose of running a railroad through it; I want a strip of some eighty or a hundred feet, through your land or town lot." I reply, "No, sir, you can't have it." But he continues: "I can have it under your State Constitution, by first tendering to you the damages and expenses." "Very well," I reply again, "I submit to the authority of the Constitution; but what are the expenses of calling a jury of assessment, and all that sort of thing?" But the amount of these expenses may not be material to me. The honest sum of the damages are to be tendered, together with the cost of proceedings, by the person to be benefitted thereby, before he can have the privilege of passing his road over my ground. "But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal." This part of the section is not very material; but I see no reason for changing one single letter, section, line, or sentence of the section, and I call upon all those who propose to indemnify the citizen for the property so taken, to stand by this section. It is no bantling of mine; I did not report it. But still I say to gentlemen of the Convention, that in my judgment, no better section could have been devised. It will give protection and security to a vast portion of our fellow citizens if you will stand by it and sustain it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I concur, generally, in the sentiments just uttered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). I do not think that companies formed for the purpose of building railroads or other works of public improvement, could be allowed, under the old Constitution, to take the property of private individuals for the purpose of constructing their work, without making full and satisfactory compensation. But, sir, we shall find, upon a close examination, that there is some wisdom in the provisions of the old Constitution, notwithstanding the advancement in knowledge and power since its formation. I ask gentlemen who favor the adoption of this section, as reported from the committee, to suppose it incorporated into the Constitution, and ratified by the people, and I then wish to know how you will lay out and build a county or a township road, build a bridge, or construct any other public work of the commonest necessity? Why, sir, before you can fell a tree, touch a stick of timber or a perch of stone—even before your county surveyor could run out the road—you must wait for the supervisor to assemble a jury of the freeholders of the vicinity, have them assess the damages to the owner over whose land the road was to be built, or whose timber or stone is to be used. The greatest inconvenience to the public, and no corresponding good to the citizen, will inevitably result from the adoption of such a provision. Your different roads must be built, your streets laid out and graded, and your bridges built, for there are not enough of these works already completed, so that in the future no more will be needed. Therefore, we need to adopt some provision that will secure greater facilities for the construction of works of public convenience and utility. I rose merely for the purpose of calling attention to this view of the subject, and to ask of gentlemen if they will vote for a Constitutional provision, under the operation of which you cannot proceed to lay off a county road, or touch a stick of timber for the construction of a bridge, until the supervisor shall have assembled a jury and assessed the damages to the owner, and until those damages are paid, or their amount tendered?

Mr. HOWE. I have but one or two words which I wish to say upon the question. I am opposed to the section as it now stands, and for these reasons:

In framing a new Constitution it is our duty, in my humble opinion, to look carefully at the teachings of the past, to pay a great regard to the lessons of experience, and to look at things from a practical point of view. If, in the past, any right, whether public or private, has been violated, to set about devising a remedy for that violation. The object of written Constitutions, of solemn organic laws, is to guard the right of the citizen, to define his relation to the government, and to restrict the tendency of the one to encroach upon the rights of the other. The formation of a Constitution is a purely practical matter and nothing else. Then let us look at the question now before us in that light. The paragraph which it is proposed to amend is this:

"No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed, by a jury of freeholders, and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if it be rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

What will be the practical working of such a provision as that? It will surely be to prevent the proceeding on the part of the State, or by incorporated companies to whom the State has granted her right of eminent domain, with works of a public character, upon which the future growth and prosperity of the State so greatly depends. The worst difficulties and obstructions will be thrown in the way of the construction of plank roads, of bridges, and of railroads. Mills, and other improvements, which have hitherto been built over all the State under the ad quod damnum law. The supreme court has repeatedly held it to be good, and millions of dollars have been invested under it in this State. This law is founded on the right of the State, called the right of eminent domain, delegated to individuals. Look at the proceeding of individuals and companies under the present ad quod damnum law, as it is called, and compare it with the effect which will result from the operation of this section. Under that law an individual who has built a mill and a dam may require, in order to secure his property, additional land. Heretofore he could apply to have it condemned, and by paying the assessed damages could obtain it, and thereby secure the interests of the community, which are always in consonance with public improvements. But now, with this provision in the Constitution, a jury of the freeholders of the vicinity must be summoned before he can enter upon the land. No matter how great the exigency, the damages must be assessed, and the amount tendered. But if the party refuses to accept the amount, he has the right of appeal, and the improvement and completion of the mill property is delayed for years until the decision of the appeal, and the chances are that the work must be abandoned and go to ruin. Suppose a large amount of money already invested in the foundation of a valuable mill; under this article if the party rejects the tender of the amount of assessed damages the mill and the dam may rot down for want of the necessary additional amount of land or water power for the improvement of the property. So with a railroad, a plank road, or any similar work.

Let us look at the matter in another light. Suppose no investments in public works and improvements to have been made in the State; suppose that we are to commence anew; the effect of this provision would be that if the tender of the amount of assessed damages is rejected, all proceeding in a work of public improvement is suspended until the appeal is decided, which may not be for years; for every gentleman knows how long such cases are often pending in the different courts. Again I call attention to the fact that the object of a Constitution is to guard those rights of individuals which are liable to be imposed upon. In regard to the taking of private property by the State, or incorporated companies, in nine cases out of every ten amicable settlements are effected between the owner and the company, or the State; but in the one case in every ten the party owning the land or other property, may be disposed to be unreasonable and hold out, and what is the consequence? Why, by refusing to accept of what his neighbors deem a reasonable compensation he may effectually stop the improvement; for the only feasible route may lie for one or two miles across his land, and an appeal may be pending for years.

I do not know what influence has produced a report so discouraging to the spirit of public improvements. I ask gentlemen whether they can lay their fingers upon any case in the history of the State where individuals have been wronged and injured by the State, or by companies to whom the State has granted the right of making a public improvement. There is scarcely a case on record, or in the memory of gentlemen. View this matter practically, then, and we shall see that the effect of this provision may be not only to stop the progress of public works, but practically the exercise of the right of "eminent domain" which the State grants and has a right to grant to individuals or companies, is virtually abolished.

MR. MORRISON. I would ask whether, under the writ of ad quod damnum, there is not now the right of appeal from an assessment of damages?

MR. HOWE. There is an appeal from the judgment, but not from the assessment.

MR. MORRISON. Then how can the effect of this provision be so much worse than the effect of an appeal under the old writ?

MR. HOWE. I have explained the effect of the provision now under discussion as contrasted with the old practice.

MR. OWEN. MR. PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe) has well said, that this is eminently a practical question, and that we must look to its actual workings. The objection he makes is a proper and valid objection against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) but it is no objection at all to the section as it stands. It is worded so as to obviate the very difficulty of which he speaks.

"No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of free-holders, and tendered together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

The money shall first be tendered, but, if refused, then the company or person may take the property without being compelled to await the result of the appeal; while the party appealing may pursue his remedy, perhaps, to the Supreme Court.

We desired in this matter, to take a middle course. Had we left the provision as in the present Constitution, then a company might condemn and take possession of a valuable piece of property,—might afterwards become insolvent, and, not having been required to tender the amount of assessed damages before taking the property, what remedy would the owner have in such case?

The gentleman from Lagrange asks what cases of injustice to private individuals, under the provision of the old Constitution, are known. If he had lived in some parts of the State, where works of public improvement have been carried on extensively, he would have learned that such cases exist; nay, are frequent. There are cases where citizens have been damaged to the amount of five hundred, or even of a thousand dollars; for which they received no compensation whatever. We wished to steer between the provision of the old Constitution, followed by results like these, on the one hand, and the possibility of works of public improvement being arrested, on the other. Suppose we had said that no property should be taken, in case of an appeal from the assessment of damages, until the appeal is decided. That appeal might be pending in the courts for one or two years, and, in that case, important works of public improvement be wholly stopped, greatly to the damage of the public. We desired so to frame this section, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) has well said—and his remarks were so clear and so comprehensive as to leave little necessary to be added by me—that a public improvement might not be stopped, and, perhaps, abandoned, on account of the obstinacy, or unreasonable demands of a single individual; the owner, perhaps, of land stretching for a mile or two across the only practicable line where a particular railroad or other improvement, could be run. But we desired also so to frame the section, as that it might provide satisfactory remedy to every owner of property condemned; and that he might actually receive his money before his property was taken, unless, indeed, he saw fit to reject the tender of an assessment of damages made by a jury of his neighbors.

It is clear that, as the section is now worded, it is not necessary for a company desiring the right of way over a man's land, to wait the issue of an appeal from the award of a jury.

MR. CLARK of Tippecanoe. There is an aspect of this question which has been, in my opinion, entirely overlooked by gentlemen who have discussed it. They argue the question as though it were the sole province of the State, in the exercise of its sovereignty, to grant certain powers and privileges to incorporated companies. There are other duties which belong to the State to perform towards citizens in their collective, political, and social condition. Whilst we are careful to recognize individual rights, and protect them, we must bear in mind that the State is the representative of the collective body,—the guardian of the general welfare, as also, the protector of individuals. It must not be deprived of all sovereignty over individuals or their property, or, in many instances, it would be powerless to do what is required of a sovereign state to perform. Suppose this provision stands as reported by the committee, and a war breaks out,—a war with a foreign country, or a domestic insurrection. It will become necessary, in a state of war, to take the property of individuals,—to take their cattle and grain as provisions for the army, or their horses and wagons to transport them; under the operation of this provision as reported, the State would be prohibited from taking one dollar's worth of property, without first summoning a jury to assess the damages, and without first tendering the amount of such damages. The section reads:

"No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of free-holders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited," &c.

The statement of the effect of that section which I have made, must not be overlooked. The State may at some time be called upon to protect herself, and to that end she is necessarily invested with authority over the property and over the person of the citizen; yes, over his life, if necessary. Will gentlemen say that the property and services of the citizen shall not be required of him without the preliminary of a jury to assess damages for the property, and without compensation for his services, when the public exigency may require both? We demand, for the public benefit, the personal services of a citizen in a variety of ways. We demand that he should pay his taxes, either in labor or in money. Shall we pay him for paying his taxes? We demand the personal services of the citizen at militia trainings. Shall we pay him for militia duty? We demand his labor for the improvement of roads in his immediate district. Shall we pay him for that labor? I say, again, that there is a multitude of public duties, for the performance of which the State demands the personal services of the citizen, and the individual member of the body politic is bound to render those services in return for the protection which the State guarantees and extends over his person and his property. I may be willing to go with gentlemen, and say that the State shall not surrender her sovereign authority to corporations, and declare that corporations shall not take private property without compensation in money being first made, but I will not tie up the hands of the State to the extent of this provision, which, I believe, would make her powerless for self-defence in times of public exigency. I know that gentlemen say that, on occasions of public danger and peril, the Constitution itself may be violated. Mr. President, I am not prepared to subscribe to that doctrine. Shall we create a necessity for the government to annul the Constitution? Shall we knowingly leave a question open and unsettled, whereby, in times of State emergency, this Constitution is bound to be disregarded and set aside? I call particular attention to this aspect of the case. The provision in the old Constitution, which corresponds to the one now under consideration, was framed with a view, evidently, of the possibility of great emergencies, when the State should have the right and the power to command the services of the individual, and to take his property for the public use.

I am no lawyer, but it is clear and plain to my mind, that, if we provide that no man's personal services shall be demanded, instead of providing that no man's particular services, as is the language of the old Constitution, we cannot require an individual to work out his tax on the road, or to perform militia duty. I take it that the word particular, in the old Constitution, means, not that general service which every citizen is bound to render, but something specific—something that is required of him as an individual, in contra-distinction to what is required, generally, of all citizens.

I think, Mr. President, that I have succeeded in pointing out several reasons why we should scrutinize this section, and not hastily adopt the report of the committee. There is good reason for the peculiar language of the old Constitution upon this subject; and here let me remark that governments have an experience as well as individuals. Many of the provisions of the old Constitution are the result of the common experience of all governments—and therefore we ought to be careful how we rashly destroy the old charts, and venture upon unknown paths.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. For the purpose of taking the sense of the Convention upon this matter, I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desired to submit a few remarks before that motion was made. I wish that the mover would withdraw it for the present.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire the attention of the Convention for a moment. The language of the amendment under consideration is somewhat different from the language of the corresponding section of the old Constitution, both in respect to the personal services of the individual, and as to the compensation to be made for private property taken for public use. The old Constitution provides that no man's particular services shall be required without just compensation. The amendment now before the Convention provides that no man's personal services shall be required without compensation. I suppose that this difference in the language between the old and the new Constitution is intended for something. The construction given to this provision in the old Constitution was, that you could not require any particular or specific service of an individual, as distinguished from those general services which every citizen was expected and required to perform without compensation.

Under the new provision, the State could not require a man to attend a general militia muster, or to perform labor on the highway, without compensation. "No man's personal service shall be required without compensation," is the language of the section before us, and not his "particular" service. If, then, you adopt this section, there is no personal service that can be required of an individual. The government cannot even require him to act as one of a posse comitatus. And yet there are many personal services required of individuals which never have been paid for, and which, I presume, it is not the intention of those who framed this section, should be paid for hereafter. The language of the old Constitution has a settled construction, and I can see no reason why we should depart from it now. We clearly understand what it means, and there is no door left open for the admission of controversy as to its intent and practical effect. For these reasons, Mr. President, I prefer the language of the old Constitution to that of this section.

The next branch of the section is:

"No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

Every member of community holds his property, whether real or personal, subject to the rights and requirements of the State. It is a duty which the State owes to itself and to all the members who compose it, to maintain its sovereignty and its authority inviolate. It is a right inherent in sovereignty to take private property for public use without compensation being first made. The State is amenable to no one, save to a sense of right. Although this right of the State to condemn private property for public uses is undoubted, yet we provide that compensation shall be made, but not when to be made. And this is a point to which I invite the attention of gentlemen. The old Constitution does not provide a time when this compensation is to be made by the State. And now, shall we so frame this new organic law that a jury shall be empaneled, and damages assessed, and compensation tendered, before the property can be taken, and must the public interests suffer? Why, the case put by the gentleman from Tippecanoe is a strong one. Suppose the State involved in war, an invading army is marching upon our frontiers; the public service is in pressing need of horses or of cattle, or perhaps of stone and timber for the construction of fortifications, must the State wait until a jury has assembled and assessed the damages to the owner for the taking of this property? Surely, we have no precedents of individual hardships, suffered through the neglect of the State, to make ample remuneration for private property condemned for public uses, that we should go to the other extreme and engraft a provision like this upon the new Constitution. I undertake to say that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred where private property is taken, the owner receives more than a fair and just compensation. But, be this as it may, no instance can be found where compensation has not been made according to law. The State was never so poor, involved as she has been in embarrassment and debt, that she could not pay every dollar of compensation awarded as damages for the conversion of private property to public uses. It is of comparatively small moment to the citizen whether this compensation is made now or at another time, before or after the property is taken; but it is of great consequence to the State that the progress of her public works should not be retarded for a day. It is a matter of comparatively small importance whether the compensation for the property be made at the time it is taken, before it is taken, or afterwards. The construction of the old Constitution has been well settled, and if gentlemen will allow me, I will read from the sixth volume of Blackford's Reports, a part of the opinion of the Supreme Court in a case arising under the Statute of 1832, respecting the Wabash and Erie Canal. It will be observed that the construction insisted upon by the court, is the same that I have stated.

The court say:

"It is presumed that, at the present day, no one will question the right of the Legislature to apply the property of individuals for public use, when 'urgent necessity' or the 'general interest' may require it. Chancellor Kent, in the second volume of his Commentaries, page 139, says: 'The right of eminent domain or inherent sovereign power, it is admitted by all publicists, gives to the Legislature the control of private property for public uses, and for public uses only.'"

And to his own high authority, and those he quotes, may be added that of Blackstone 1, Comm. 139. Whether this right is subject to any restrictions by the common law, or the law of nations, (and it probably is,) need not be examined on the present occasion. With us there is no doubt on the subject. Our Constitution requires—

"That no man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken and applied to public uses, without the consent of his representatives, or without a just compensation being made therefor."

Again: The Supreme Court of this State, in the same case, says:

"Indeed, if such laws be not valid, the unquestionable right, inherent in every sovereign power, of applying private property to public use—the spirit of the social compact—that individual interest must bow to the public good, in many instances would be of but little service to the community. In the construction and preservation of locks, dams, levees, and other improvements, accidents from various causes, which no human sagacity could foresee, and no human power prevent, are constantly occurring. To repair injuries arising from these causes, and to check the progress of destruction, instant exertion is necessary. If, in such emergencies, nothing could be done until a bargain could be made for materials, or their value ascertained by the slow process of appraisal, the right of the public to promote the general welfare by the use of private property would be, indeed, but a crippled and feeble prerogative."

In the language of the Supreme Court there is a great deal of force. The power of the State, which is wielded solely for the public welfare, ought not to be crippled by awaiting the slow process of the empannelment of a jury of freeholders, the assessment of damages, and the tender of the amount thereof, before it can proceed in a work of great public importance. There is no danger but that the individual will receive abundant and sufficiently prompt compensation for the damages he has sustained; there is no danger that the State or a company will be so poor that they will be unable to pay the amount of damages, if awarded under the law. The individual has at least this consolation, which takes away every feature of hardship from the case. The right of property does not vest in the State or the company until the compensation is made. The title to his land does not pass out of him until the payment of the amount of damages assessed.

But, Mr. President, another remark, before I refer to an amendment which I desire to present. The language of this section is:

"No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation, first assessed by a jury of freeholders, and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

I call particular attention to the last sentence of this section. Now, I had thought, in the words of the homely old adage, that "what was sauce for the gander was sauce for the goose." If it is to be left optional with the individual to accept the tender of compensation or to reject it and appeal to the courts for a higher award, then it ought also to be optional with the State or the company not to tender the award of damages to the individual, if the State or the company considers the amount too exorbitant. But not so thought the committee who have reported this section. They have placed the advantages all on the side of the citizen; he can appeal from the assessment, but the State cannot; the property may be assessed at ten times its real value; it may be so exorbitant a price that the courts would, upon appeal, promptly set the award aside; but there is no redress for the State.

Mr. President, it is our duty to protect and guard the interests of the State as well as those of the citizen. There is no danger, as I before remarked, but that ample remuneration will at all times be made for damages occasioned by a public work to a private estate; the State is never disposed to take advantage of the citizen—may I not be allowed to say, what is notoriously true, that the reverse is the case? But, under the provisions of this section, the amount of damages must be tendered; the party may decline the tender, but there is no remedy for the State, if, in its estimation, the damages are too high. The real damages in a case may be one hundred dollars, and the jury may assess them at one thousand dollars—and, sir, such strange cases have often happened—but the State must tender the money, no matter how palpably unjust and exorbitant. The language of this section, which it is proposed to fix in the organic law of the State, is: "without just compensation, first assessed and tendered." The tender must be made before the State can enter upon possession of the property.

Now, sir, if an individual shall have the constitutional right of appeal because an assessment is deemed too low, I submit whether justice does not require that the State should be secured in the same right of appeal if it deems the assessment too high?

Mr. President, for one, I prefer the language of the old Constitution, with a slight amendment, which I shall propose. I wish to see it provided in the new Constitution that "No man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken or applied to public use, against his consent, without a just compensation in money, irrespective of extrinsic benefits, being made therefor." The only evil which could arise under the provision of the old Constitution was, that individuals whose property might be taken for public purposes were paid for it, not in money, but in imaginary and illusory benefits which were supposed by the assessing jury to result from the construction of the public improvements over or near his property. It has been held by the courts, in States having constitutional provisions similar to those contained in our present Constitution, that the State or a company proceeding under a charter from the State might have property condemned for public use, and when the damages were assessed, the jury might take into consideration the benefits which the individual had conferred upon him by the building of the public work. I am glad to find that very recently this construction of the constitutional provision has undergone revision; and in the State of New York, from which we take most of the decisions having relation to internal improvements, it is now held that compensation for damages must be paid in money. If a State or corporation, to whom has been granted her right of eminent domain, takes two or three acres of a man's land, they take something that is real and valuable—something that is substantial and visible—and he should be paid therefor in money; he should be paid whatever that land is worth in market, and not receive compensation in the imaginary and uncertain profit that may arise from the construction of the work. The great evil under the provision in the old Constitution resulted from this mode of paying assessed damages. I know, personally, of an instance where property, estimated to be worth two thousand dollars, was taken from an individual for the purposes of a public improvement, and the damages were assessed to that amount; but the owner had the misfortune to own other land adjoining the public work, and lying on each side of it, and after the damages to his property were assessed, that this additional ground was benefited by robbing him of a part of his estate, to an amount equal to the damages assessed. Such a construction is radically wrong; if you take a man's property—that which is real and intrinsically valuable—compensate him in money, and without regard to the benefits supposed to be conferred upon any other property he may own by the construction of a public work, why, sir, you might as well, with as much propriety, take a citizen's horses or his cattle in time of war, and when, after peace was declared, he laid his claim before the government for compensation, say to him, "you must consider yourself repaid by the result of the campaign; your compensation is in your part of the general advantage gained by resisting the enemy!" You take five acres from a man's farm, or half an acre from his town lot for the purpose of a railroad, and you take that which is valuable and productive to him; what justice is there in replying to his claim for damages, "Sir, your adjoining ground is greatly enhanced in value by its proximity to this railroad?" He does not wish to sell his adjoining land, and it will produce him no more now than before the road was cut through it. It ought, therefore, to be provided, in accordance with what I am glad to see is becoming the settled construction in New York, which has hitherto taken the lead in internal improvements, that compensation for private property taken for public use shall be assessed at its value in money and paid in money, irrespective of extrinsic and illusory benefits supposed to be conferred upon him because he has the misfortune to have a little ground left contiguous to the public work. Otherwise, you provide that the citizen may be robbed of that which is real, and paid in that which is not of intrinsic value.

If it would be in order, Mr. President, I would propose an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order, but the gentleman from Jefferson may read his amendment for information.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is as follows:

"No man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken, or applied to public use, against his consent, without a just compensation in money, irrespective of extrinsic benefits being made therefor."

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman);

Pending which,

On motion, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, Nov. 7, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LONG.

THE CONVENTION PRINTING.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Auditor of State with reference to the Printing of the Convention, and the compensation therefor.

On motion by Mr. BORDEN, it was Ordered, That the communication be referred to the select committee appointed yesterday, upon the subject of the Printing for the Convention.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. PETTIT, from the committee on the organization of the courts of justice, submitted a resolution which was read and passed to a second reading on to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIT, in behalf of a majority of the same committee, also submitted a report, which was read a first time and passed to a second reading on to-morrow.
